Army; and I am very strongly of the opinion that you would not get as good service from the courts if you had enlisted personnel as you get now, particularly if you were to put private soldiers, who would be inexperienced, on the courts; who would probably either be led wholly by the officers and look up to them, or else would be always inclined to fight against any severe punishment for their fellow soldiers. In any case, might be afraid of ostracism when he returned to his tent mates and his company mates, if he had not done the popular thing. I fear that it would be impossible to prevent it being known how the different judges voted on the court, because you would probably not have the same feeling of responsibility in that on the part of the private soldiers who are less educated than the officers, as a rule, even in our temporary Army, and in the Army to which we may look forward in the future. The selection of efficient men for officers takes the best men out of the ranks; so that the men whom you would get would probably not be experienced, and not be as suitable.

And then it does seem to me that we must look ahead to the possibility of a crisis sometime, and there might be danger, in a crisis, in having a court so constituted. If, for instance—I will refer again to a situation which might meet us if we were forced to have our Army go through an experience like the Russian retreat in 1915 or the British retreat from Mons, and it was necessary to impose severe punishment to hold the men up to the mark under very hard circumstances—it would be more difficult, it seems to me, to enforce necessary discipline by the use of private soldiers on the court.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. You are assuming all the time that with enlisted men on the courts there would not be the proper legal instruction given. But what I would suggest is an independent judge advocate general acting as adviser, when there would be no more danger than there is under the jury system.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. I fear there would be. There is a difference, it seems to me. To begin with, it is not a national calamity for a jury to refuse to convict a saloon keeper guilty of selling liquor on Sunday, though he is clearly guilty; but under some circumstances it might really amount to a national calamity for a military court to refuse to convict men absent without leave. Then, again, you take your jurors from the general body of the country, and they represent the general intelligence and education of the country. You are likely to get good men on your juries frequently, as well as others. In the Army you do not have the same fair cross section from which to take them. When you take them from the Army, the cream of the intelligence is already drained off to make into officers, and in the old Regular Army the best men have been chosen for officers, and even in the temporary Army the best men are promptly made noncommissioned officers and get a chance for a commission.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. I thought this Army presented a pretty fair cross section of the American people.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. I think so, Senator; but is it not true also that as soon as the men get into the Army this straining process commences, and before very long you will find the best men getting out of the ranks, simply because they are needed in the commissioned personnel, and the whole theory is to make the best use of the men you have; so that you would be taking your jury from what, I would fear, would rather be the inferior material?

Senator WARREN. Of course, you are only alluding to them as inferior in the line of legal capability?

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. Oh, surely; or general experience. I can not believe that one who has enlisted under the draft, say, and just come into the Army within the last two or three weeks or months, can have the same breadth of view, the same capability for making a competent judge, that an officer can. We have difficulty enough, we all of us, I think, can see, in getting, even among the officers, sufficient competent men to do that work. I fear you would simply multiply the difficulty if you went out into the field of enlisted personnel generally.

My thought would really be to rather follow the British again in that lead where they provide, for instance—and we have followed it to some extent in this amendment to the Manual of July 14 last—the British will not let an officer sit on a general court-martial until he has held a commission for at least three years, and in order to make sure that they may have experience they put members on the court “for instruction” only; that is, members who simply sit with the court and go with the court into closed session, but have no vote and take no part in the proceedings.

Senator WARREN. Would not that be pretty restrictive in times of war, as in the case of the late war, when our Army was constituted so largely of new men? Would you be able in such case to establish the courts with men that had served three years?

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. No; you can not do that in a hard and fast way—they could not do it on their field courts—and for that reason all that you can do, it seems to me, is to make a hard and fast restriction for armies not on active service, or in times of peace, and to provide that on active service those regulations shall, so far as possible or practicable, be obeyed, but pointing out and insisting, so far as possible, on putting men on the court who have had experience for a certain length of time.

Senator WARREN. Now, as I understand from your testimony and from the testimony of others, there seems to be a necessity of one law for actual war and one law for times of peace, or else a law with alternative provisions, or else we must trust largely to regulations under the law, with the law so constructed that from time to time the effect would be largely changed by regulations under it, and it seems to me that our difficulty is very largely by reason of having a part of the Army in war and a part in peace largely made up of new and inexperienced men.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. I thoroughly agree with that, Senator. It seems to me that really our country has arrived, perhaps, at the time when it might be wise to consider following again the experience of countries that have had colonial armies, like Great Britain and France, providing the difference between the two kinds of status, the status of what we call war, and the status of what we call peace, making the distinction not between technical peace and war, but between the “Army on active service” and the “Army not on active service.” For instance, I had occasion to review last winter a record of trial of some prisoners who had murdered a fellow prisoner out in Fort Leavenworth in the disciplinary barracks, and the counsel for the accused insisted very strongly and ingeniously that the disciplinary barracks were 4,000 miles away from where any active fighting was going on, and therefore, in effect, it was a time of peace in Kansas, and the civil courts were open and functioning in Kansas, and therefore under the ninety-second article of war a military court could not take jurisdiction to try men for murder.

Now, of course, as a legal argument, there was nothing in it. They were wrong; but it does seem to me that looking at it in a broad way, as a matter of policy, there is some justice in that; for Kansas was locally at peace, and the courts were functioning. We might have a war perhaps in the Philippines, just as Great Britain sometimes has a war in Afghanistan; but it should not be necessary for that reason to treat the whole Army everywhere as on a war footing. The British do not do so during most of their wars. In fact, this war was the first time, I think, in three centuries, so I was told, when their army within the United Kingdom had been treated as "in active service," in spite of all the wars which Great Britain has had.

So that, for instance, to limit the maximum punishments under article of war 45, which provides that the President may by Executive order "in time of peace" limit the punishment—it seems to me that if those words "in time of peace" were out of that article, or if instead of saying "in time of peace" it should read "not on active service," the President could then by Executive order prevent all of these unduly severe sentences, such as were given in some cases here at home. It does seem to me that it would be much wiser to provide that the President by Executive order, which might be changed and varied from time to time—it need not necessarily be the same order for the Army at the front as for the Army here in the United States at the same time—might limit the maximum punishments. I think, in fact I know, that that is one of the things that Gen. Crowder recommended in his letter to the Secretary of War of March 10 last. I believe that to be of great value. I notice the Kernan Board did not adopt it in their report; but nevertheless I do think it a matter of great value; and I do think that it would be wiser to put the whole distinction, which is now made between war and peace, on a basis like the British, and make the distinction between the Army "on active service" and the Army "not on active service."

Senator WARREN. Of course, they would have to define that "active service" a lot more specifically, because now active service and retired service seem to be the two opposites.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. There would have to be a new definition. The British do have a careful definition of it in their army code—in section 189 of their army act, which I have already read to you here.

Then passing to another matter in Senate bill 64, that is the provision of what, if I understand it correctly, is the veto power given to the staff judge advocate, before bringing an accused to trial.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. What article is that? That is article 19, is it not?

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. Yes, sir; article 19, which provides as follows [reading]:

No officer with authority to appoint a special court shall refer any charge to such court for trial, nor shall any commanding officer charged with such duty forward any charge to an officer having authority to appoint general courts until he shall have made or caused to be made a thorough investigation—and so on. Article 19 is the preliminary investigation. Then Article 20 provides [reading]:

ART. 20. No charge shall be referred to or be tried by a general court unless an officer of the Judge Advocate General's Department charged with such duty shall have indorsed in writing upon the charge that in his opinion an offense made punishable by these articles is charged with legal sufficiency against the accused and that it has been made to appear to him that there is prima facie proof that the accused is guilty of the offense charged, nor unless the officer referring the charge believes that in the interests of the service and of justice the charge can not be disposed of except by trial by general court-martial.

Now, the first part of that article 20 places, as I see it, really a veto power in the hands of the staff judge advocate against the commanding general—to whose staff he is attached, because it provides that the commanding general shall not have any power under any circumstances to refer the case for trial, unless he first has the written indorsement of the staff judge advocate and the staff judge advocate's favorable opinion. Now, I might say that I do not find any such power given to any legal officer or to any staff officer or other subordinate official anywhere in any of the other systems which I have investigated, or of which I have any knowledge. Of course, in our own system the commanding general does have the benefit of the advice of his staff judge advocate. That has been, through this war, anyway, I think, the almost universal practice; and that practice is now crystallized into a definite regulation, which is a definite law for the Army, by paragraph 76 (a) of the changes in the Court-Martial Manual of July 14 last, which has been put in evidence here. So that it is the rule of the United States Army to-day that the commanding general must have before him, so that he can consider it and have the benefit of it, the advice of his legal officer; but he is, of course, not bound to take it, although I think it is fair to say that, as far as I have been able to gather, the commanding general almost invariably follows on legal matters, such as the reference of a case for trial, the advice of his staff judge advocate.

That is also the rule in Great Britain. There is no regulation in Great Britain providing that the commanding general must ask the advice of the staff judge advocate or of any other legal officer.

In that way their regulations, on their face, are just as ours were prior to July 14, 1919; except that in Great Britain, in the general courts within the United Kingdom, the charges have to be referred to the Judge Advocate General before the case is referred for trial. With that exception, there is no provision in the way of regulation about it, in the British system. The advice of the Judge Advocate General is advisory; it is not mandatory. But it is, in fact, in practice almost universally, if not universally, followed. Outside of that their system is practically the same as ours. In practice the commanding general or convening authority does refer the charges to his legal officer, who has been, since the institution of the corps of court-martial officers, in September, 1916, one of those court-martial officers. He gets his opinion, and, in practice, is almost invariably guided by that opinion.

In France a very analogous system is in vogue. The power to refer cases to trial, whether before the "special" or emergency courts in use during the war, or before the regular courts, is wholly in the hands of the commanding general, the territorial division commander, the commander of the division on active service, or of a higher command; or, in some cases of a brigade, as the case may be. The convening authority of the court has the full and untrammelled power to order a case to trial, or not, as he sees fit. He is in practice advised by an officer who is called the "Chief of the Bureau of Military Justice," attached to his staff, who is appointed on the recommendation of the Undersecretary of State for Military Justice. This "Chief of the Bureau of Military Justice" is required to be an officer. He is not required to be a lawyer, although in practice he often is an officer with legal training. In practice, also, he usually is the commissaire du gouvernement of the court. All these functions are usually united in the same official; although not invariably.

The legal adviser, be he commissaire du gouvernement or separate Chief of the Bureau of Military Justice, does not make any formal written report or recommendation as to whether the case shall be referred for trial, other than that which the commissaire du gouvernement makes in connection with the investigation (where one has been had), but prepares a formal order such as he thinks the general ought to sign, either refusing trial or directing trial; and the practice as to the general's following this advice seems to be rather variable. I have talked with quite a number of commissaires du gouvernement and divisional chiefs of staff, and others, in France. I have a number of written interviews here; and while, on the whole, the commanding general usually follows the advice, it depends pretty much on the personality of the general and the personality of the legal adviser. For instance, I have an interview with one commissaire du gouvernement who was a very capable lawyer, a man who would impress you, who said that never in all his experience had the general failed to follow his recommendations; except, I think, once. On the other hand, I have an interview with a commissaire du gouvernement who was a young man, I think just 25 years of age, who had just graduated from a law school before he went into the army, and then gone into the line of the army, and was appointed a commissaire du gouvernement later on. He said very frankly, "The general follows my advice, because I know in advance what the general wants, and advise accordingly." In other words, he was just a secretary to the general; and between those extremes it runs the whole gamut.

Perhaps the best interview I had on that was with Col. Gausset, the chief of staff of the Thirty-sixth Division, who had been, during the war, chief of staff to 10 different divisional generals. He said that every man had his own method; that sometimes, as chief of staff, the reports of the commissaire du gouvernement were referred to him for advice, but other generals did not do so; that some generals almost invariably followed the advice of their legal advisers; but that other generals frequently acted contrary to the advice of the commissaire du gouvernement; and that all that could be said was that, taking it by and large, on the whole, the recommendation was usually followed; but that where it was not followed, the instances where it was not followed were usually those where the commissaire du gouvernement had recommended against trial. In other words, where the legal officer recommends trial, the French general almost invariably falls in with the recommendation, and sends the case to trial. But where the commissaire du gouvernement's recommendation is against trial, there the general is very likely to take the responsibility of personally going all through the papers in the case, and not infrequently does order a case to trial, over the adverse recommendation of his legal adviser.

Then another thing that they do, which of course we do not do, because we do not have such broad summary disciplinary powers, the French general will very often, instead of sending the case to trial, give a man 60 days' confinement by simple executive order. If, for instance, he finds that it is rather doubtful whether a case can be fully proved, and he feels that the man is surely guilty, but there is some question as to the proof, instead of ordering the case to trial and taking chances of an acquittal, he will give him 60 days in prison by executive order. Or, if it is doubtful, for instance, whether the intent of desertion can be proved, where desertion is charged, instead of ordering the case to trial and taking the chances of acquittal, the commanding general would simply give the man this summary disciplinary punishment, and dispose of it in that way. They use that very freely, and they believe in it a great deal.

They insist that it is better to give a lighter punishment, and to give it by disciplinary measures immediately and certainly, than to send the case to trial before the court. It may be that one reason for that has to do with the fact that once the case goes to court it is out of the general's hands. The French court is a final judicial body; that is, its judgments are final in this, that they are executive in form, they do not require the approval of the commanding general; so that once the case has gone to the court it is wholly out of the commanding general's hands. How far that may have to do with their tendency to use this summary disciplinary power which the general has in his hands, instead of sending the case to court, I do not know.

I tried to get information, as far as I could by interviews, as to the relative value of our power of the reviewing authority to approve or disapprove the findings and sentence, instead of having the judgment of the court final as the French do, and I got very varying opinions. For instance, I had a talk with Gen. Gouroud, who, you may remember, was the commander of the French Army at Rheims on the 15th of July, 1918, who beat back the German attack and really stopped the German rush toward Rheims during their last offensive. Gen. Gouroud was also in command of the French Army in Gallipoli earlier in the war; and was, when I saw him, in command of the Fourth Army, in Alsace. I asked him the question whether in his opinion the American and British plan of having the judgment of the court-martial subject to review by the commanding general, or the French plan of having the judgment of the court-martial final, was the better system, and what he thought were the advantages or disadvantages of each, and Gen. Gouroud answered very emphatically—I have his exact words in an interview here—but he said in substance, “I do not hesitate for a moment to say that the American system is infinitely superior,” and then he went on to tell a number of instances where he had felt the lack during the war, in emergencies, of the power to in any way control the judgments of the courts.

On the other hand, Gen. Valdant, chief of staff at Paris, and Gen. Halluin, commander at Bordeaux, believe in the French plan and the finality of the judgments; but when I asked them, if they were faced with an emergency, with a lowering of morale, in an event of that sort, what would they do, they said they would discharge the court and appoint another court, or they would call up the commissaire du gouvernement, and they would find ways to bring pressure to bear on the court, and they would resort to the free use of the summary disciplinary power.

Senator WARREN. Now, Colonel, we have a pretty good photograph of the different systems. Are there some other points to which you wish to allude?

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. The other one that I had especially in mind was the matter of appeal, the court of military appeals contemplated in article 52 of Senate bill 64, and the corresponding provisions in the other armies; and I had some suggestions that I wanted to put before you as to punishments and the use of the suspended sentence, and the things that were accomplished by Great Britain, particularly concerning the suspended sentence, and the results of that during the war.

Senator WARREN. Proceed.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. I do not want to take too much time. To continue the same topic for a moment, in Belgium the plan is substantially the same as in France. There also the commanding general has the complete and absolute power, with the only exception that if the complaint has originated with a civilian, and the judiciary commission has found and recommended that the complaint ought not to be proceeded with, it must be dismissed. With that exception, the commanding general has full power to follow or not follow the recommendation of the judiciary commission which makes the preliminary investigation; though, in practice, we found that it was followed in almost all cases.

In Holland, I may say I know what the regulations are, though I know nothing further. The regulations provide, apparently, the same full power in the commanding general.

Summing it all up, I do not know of any system which gives Senate bill 64's proposed veto power over the reference of cases to trial, to any officer corresponding to the staff judge advocate, or to any other legal officer, or staff officer.

Now, as to the proposed system of a court of military appeals, and review after trial, Senate bill 64 provides two plans of review or appeal.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Under what article?

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. First, article 39 provides, as to special courts and summary courts, that the staff judge advocate at the headquarters to which the report of the summary court or the record of the special court is directed to be transmitted by the President—that the staff judge advocate at those headquarters shall have powers of review similar to those given by article 52, in the case of general courts, to the proposed court of military appeals, to “review and revise”——

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. What article are you reading?

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. Article 39 [reading]:

Review and revise all such records and reports for errors of law prejudicial to the accused.

Then, second: Article 52 provides, in the case of general courts, for an appeal and a review on appeal by the “court of military appeals.” The court of military appeals is not to review as of course all records of trials by general courts, but only those in which the accused does not indicate that he does not want the appeal. In other words, it is a kind of semiautomatic appeal; except that sentences which do not carry confinement for more than six months, or death, dismissal, or dishonorable discharge, are not to be reviewed at all. So that, as I view it, the result is that there is to be, first, an automatic review in all cases by the staff judge advocate, for errors of law only, of the reports of summary courts and the records of special courts; and, second, that as to the general courts, there is (a) to be no review by anybody, and no possibility of any reexamination of any kind, except for purposes of clemency or pardon, or of any judgment not carrying confinement for more than six months, or death, dismissal, or dishonorable discharge; and that (b) as to the four latter classes of cases, the sentences of the general court—that is, those carrying confinement for more than six months, death, dismissal, or dishonorable discharge—there is to be a review by the court of military appeals in all cases, unless the accused shall indicate that he does not care to have a review.

Now, first, as to the review by the staff judge advocate. That comes back very closely to the same thing as the present review for the purpose of approval or confirmation (except that it is to be “for errors of law” only). But the vital difference is that this bill provides that the staff judge advocate is to make the decision himself, instead of advising his chief, the commanding general. Now, I do not find any system of law, anywhere, vesting such a final executive power in a staff officer, or in any legal officer.

At present we do have a review in all cases by the staff judge advocate of records of general court trials, for the purpose of advising the commanding general. But the power to decide is in the commanding general. Great Britain has the same thing. I do not know of any other army that does, unless it be in Holland, in their supreme military tribunal or court, to which I am coming presently. But the British review, like ours, is for the purpose of advising the commanding general. I know of no system that makes the staff officer, the legal officer on the staff of the commanding general—or any staff officer—the final arbiter in those cases.

As to appeal, or review otherwise, by some higher tribunal of the judgment, such as is proposed for certain classes of judgments of the general courts by the proposed court of military appeals, there is, of course, in Great Britain no court of military appeals or anything of that kind; but there is—as with us—a review, as I have explained from my study of it, by the deputy judge advocate general or the Judge Advocate General, in an advisory capacity only; and they have the right, even after the proceedings have been reviewed and confirmed, for the accused or anyone for him at any time to petition the Sovereign for a reexamination, which petition will be referred to the Judge Advocate General for his advice; and the Sovereign does have the power, if so advised, to quash. We have no such "appellate" power, after final approval or confirmation. The only thing in our present system of review which is not wholly automatic is that an accused—if he wants to have a brief or anything presented—I think it would be entertained undoubtedly by the staff judge advocate anywhere. I know it would be, and has been, in the office of the Judge Advocate General. Printed briefs are sometimes submitted, and wherever briefs are offered within a reasonable time they are always welcome.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Do all the records and information of the division go up to the staff judge advocate?

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. Do you mean of the general courts?

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Any court?

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. All records of the general courts go up. All records of special courts go to the headquarters of the convening authority. That is usually the brigade commander, and if there is a reason why there is anything not quite in order about it or requiring legal advice, the staff judge advocate is the one who reviews it.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. No record is made of the summary court?

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. Only a report of the summary court, no formal record of testimony, any more than there is in the case of a French court. I should have perhaps said, on the French system, that they make no record in any case of the evidence heard in court.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. All the records of special courts and all the records of general courts finally reach the judge advocate general?

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. All the records of general courts do, Senator; not of special courts.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. They do not get there at all?

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. They simply make reports on them to us, statistical reports. The general court records all come up.

Now, as to the French system of appeal, they have a "court of revision." The court of revision consists of five members. There are courts of revision for the territorial armies not on active service; and for divisions, and for every army on active service.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. That is composed of civilians or military men?

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. In the armies on active service it is composed wholly of military men. It is composed of a brigadier general, two colonels or lieutenant colonels, and two majors. In the territorial armies it is composed of three military men and two civilians. Formerly it was all military. That was changed by law during the war—by a statute enacted in 1916—by which it is now provided that the president of the court of revision in the territorial armies not on active service shall be a civilian judge of the district in which the court of revision sits.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. That was possibly induced by these criticisms leveled against the system just as they have been leveled against the system here.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. I am only telling you what I find there. The other civilian member is also a civilian judge. Those two civilian members are appointed on the recommendation of the under secretary of state for military justice. The civilian members really do the routine work of the court where they are appointed, but the majority of the judges are still military.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. What cases go up to them—what convictions?

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. Unless all appeals are prohibited by presidential decree, as may be done during war, all cases may be appealed. There is no automatic review; no cases go up except those which are appealed, either by the Government or by the accused, and the appeal must be taken within 24 hours after the judgment is rendered. If it is not taken within that time, the right of appeal is absolutely gone. The court of revision sits for the correction of errors of law only, and really in a very narrow way. The record that goes up does not contain in it any of the evidence taken on the trial in the conseil de guerre. It does contain the statements of witnesses taken in the preliminary examination, the dossier; but there is no report of evidence heard in the conseil de guerre.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. According to your statement, all the confrontation by witnesses is in the preliminary hearing.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. That is true, so far as the record will show. There may be a confrontation on the trial, but the record will not show anything about that. So that the case does not go up on the admissibility of evidence in the conseil de guerre; and the Court of Revision is forbidden to discuss or to consider the case on the merits; and counsel in preparing their briefs are forbidden to discuss the merits of the case in any way. The only questions for consideration, as stated in the statutes, section 74 of the military code, are, first, whether the court below was constituted in accordance with the provisions of the code; second, whether it has exceeded its jurisdiction; third, whether the sentence pronounced by it is within the penalties fixed by law, upon the facts as found by the court; fourth, whether there has been any violation or omission of any form (or formality) prescribed by law "on pain of nullity"; fifth, whether the court below has omitted to accord either to the accused or to the commissaire du gouvernement, upon proper demand, any right or "faculty" secured to him by law.

As to the "pain of nullity," I might say that there are certain provisions of the code, certain things to be done, which are expressly stated to be required "on pain of nullity." They are the ones referred to in that section. For instance, "on pain of nullity," the accused must be advised at the same time the charges are served upon him, of his right to counsel, and that unless he has his own counsel, counsel will be assigned him by the court.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. These articles do not permit the court of appeals to change the judgment except when the law has not been properly applied to the facts, etc. That is a pretty general power. That would seem to indicate that they have power to consider the facts.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. They do not so construe that, Senator. I talked on that subject with Col. Augier, the commissaire du gouvernement of the Court of Revision at Paris, who is a very eminent authority and author of several books—they are standard on military law in France—and he explained that they simply consider there whether the sentence accords with the facts found and set out in the findings. You see the form of their judgment below is a finding of facts and then a sentence, and the Court of Revision simply considers, under that subdivision, whether the sentence there, as found in the judgment roll, is proper in view of the facts recited as found in the judgment roll.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. As I read that provision, it is pretty broad. Whatever the practice may be, it would seem that they could consider the facts.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. However that may be, even if that language will bear that construction, it is not so construed by the French themselves. They construe it as I have stated, and, in fact, the rules of the court specifically forbid counsel for the accused in his "Memoir," as they call it—his brief—to discuss the case on its merits,

I will be glad to put into the record that portion of my interview with Col. Augier, if it is desired.

There is also a power, in time of peace, given by sections 80, 81, and 82 of their code, for civilians who may be tried before the conseil de guerre to appeal to the Court of Cassation; and, under the law of April 17, 1906, in time of peace, the Court of Cassation is substituted for the Court of Revision, in appeals from the conseils de guerre.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. The trial of civilians is so limited in our jurisdiction that it does not make much difference.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. I only call attention to it.

Then in the Belgian system they have what they call the cour militaire, which is a supreme military appellate tribunal.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. How is that constituted? Are there any civilians on it?

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. There is one civilian on that; there are five judges—1 civilian and four line officers of the army. The civilian judge is appointed for life, and he is entitled to the honors due to a general. In practice he wears the uniform of a general, but he is a civilian appointed by the King for life. The four military judges are: One lieutenant general or major general, one colonel or lieutenant colonel, and two majors. The civilian member is the president of the court; and he must have been a civilian judge for at least 10 years before his appointment. He must, by the way, know both French and Flemish. The military members are appointed for terms of one month only. Their names are drawn by lot from a list of those available. This Belgian court of appeals differs from the French court of revision in that it reviews the facts as well as the law. It considers the case on its merits.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. There is a record there?

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. The record there is that made up by the judiciary commission, so far as the evidence is concerned. They (the cour militaire) consider the whole case, and they have some original jurisdiction also. In Holland, there is a supreme military court. I only know of Holland from an examination of the statutes and regulations, but it is a rather anomalous situation. They have both the review without appeal and an appeal, and both by the same court, which they call the Hoog Militair Gerechtshof.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. That is automatic?

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. It is an automatic review of the record, Senator; and there is also a provision that the accused may within a certain fixed time, I think within 10 or 15 days, appeal. Then, in addition to the regular review of the facts on the record, the court will entertain any briefs or arguments that the accused wants to put in, and hear him.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Are there any civilians on that court?

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. Yes; there are civilians on that court also. This court in Holland is composed of nine judges. Of those three are civilians, three are army officers, and three are navy officers. It has jurisdiction over both the army and the navy—over all military law. The civilian judges are appointed by the sovereign upon the recommendation of the ministers of justice, war, and navy; and they are appointed for life, with the right to retire at 70 years of age. One of them is made the president of the court. In his absence the other senior civilian presides. The military judges are three army officers, as I said, and three naval officers. They are required to be at least 30 years of age. There is no further requirement. They are not required to have any special legal knowledge. They, also, however, are appointed for life, and are appointed by the sovereign upon the recommendation of the ministers of justice, navy, and war.

This court in Holland has power, as in Belgium, to review the case on its merits, both on the law and the facts; and, by the way, the court in Holland has also original jurisdiction over all prosecutions of officers of the army above the grade of captain, and of officers of the navy above the grade of first lieutenant; and also has the power to examine into the actions of any commander who surrenders a fortress or naval commander who surrenders a ship—anything of that kind. They have pretty broad original jurisdiction.

In Switzerland there is a "military tribunal of cassation," composed of five judges and three alternates. They are all chosen for a term of three years by the federal council. They are all military men, but three of the judges must be—the majority of them—chosen from the "judicial section of the general staff"; that is, the judge advocate general's department. The others must also be officers who have had some legal training. I do not really know very much about the jurisdiction of the Swiss court.

There is also a court in Prussia. I do not know anything about its composition. The interesting thing about it that I do know—I have just gotten hold of the books recently—is that it publishes formal reports every year of cases decided, so that you can get reports of the supreme Prussian military courts, as you can get the reports of the cases decided in our Supreme Court or in the supreme court of any State.

In Italy there is also a revision without appeal of all cases involving confinement for more than seven years. They call this court the "Council of Revision."

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Is there any appeal for lesser sentences than that?

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. There is also an appeal to the supreme court of war and navy for lesser sentences, under somewhat severe restrictions. I have not all the details, Senator, but all cases where more than seven years' confinement is involved go up automatically. That court is composed of three judges—a "general, commanding a section of military justice," as he is called; a colonel attached to the section of military justice, and one civilian judge.

Then there is detailed to act as prosecutor before that "council of revision" the military advocate general of Italy, and an officer is detailed as reporter to the court.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Practically all of those courts have one civilian member on the court?

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. The situation, summing it all up, Senator, is, I think, that in all of them, either the court is wholly military, or else the majority of the court is military. Here is this table which I prepared, for which you were asking, Senator; I can put it into the record now.

XVI. Is case reviewed on the merits?	No.	No.	Yes.	Yes.	Yes.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. The cases in some of the countries are reviewed automatically, and in some only in case of appeal?

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. Yes. Italy has the automatic review for long-term sentences. Holland has the automatic review for all sentences. The others go up on appeal—all those I am familiar with—except Great Britain and the United States. I do not know the jurisdiction of the Swiss court. In all of them, where there is a formal military court of appeals established, there are one or more civilians, except in the French court of revision, in the armies on active service, where they are all officers; and the Swiss, where a majority of them are officers of the judge advocate general's department. But in none of them is the majority civilian. There is none where they are all civilian; and there is none where a majority of them is civilian. In other words, in all of them, to turn it around, either the judges are all military men, or else the majority is composed of military officers. The theory seems to be to put the trial into the hands of the military officers, with the benefit of the advice of one or more—in the minority, however—of legally trained officers; and, of course, in the French armies on active service they are all military officers.

Now, I think that is all I have to say on that question, and, perhaps, if you are not through with me you would prefer that I come back.

(Thereupon, at 1.05 o'clock p. m., the committee took a recess until 2.30 o'clock p. m.)

AFTERNOON SESSION.

The subcommittee reconvened, pursuant to the taking of the recess, at 2.30 o'clock p. m., Senator Francis E. Warren (chairman) presiding.

STATEMENT OF BRIG. GEN. WALTER A. BETHEL, UNITED STATES ARMY.

Senator WARREN. General, the duty of this subcommittee is to report to the full Committee on Military Affairs on Senate bill 64, the Chamberlain bill, so-called, as a whole, or amended, or with substitutes, and we are taking evidence to establish, if we can, what is the better mode; just how we are going to change the Articles of War and to change the method of administration of military justice.

We have been hearing testimony of officers who have become acquainted in a certain way with the laws and practices of other nations. Will you tell us what your service has been? I notice that you have four stripes, showing that you have been overseas two years. Will you tell us what has been your experience abroad, or in the Army in this country, with respect to military justice?

Gen. BETHEL. I was graduated from West Point 30 years ago, and after serving for five years with troops as a subaltern, was instructor in law at West Point for four years.

Soon after my relief from West Point, I was detailed in the Judge Advocate General's department, and have been on duty in that department ever since, having been permanently appointed judge advocate in 1903, I served as a department judge advocate in Alaska, on the Pacific coast and in the Philippines, for nine years; after which I went to the United States Military Academy as a professor of law, where I remained as such for five years, and in 1914 came to Washington for duty in the Judge Advocate General's office, where I was when the United States declared war.

Senator WARREN. Was that the commencement of your duties here in the general office?

Gen. BETHEL. Yes, sir.

Senator WARREN. What is your real rank now, in the Regular Army?

Gen. BETHEL. I am a colonel in the Judge Advocate General's department of the Army.

Senator WARREN. That is as high as you can get?

Gen. BETHEL. As high as I can get by seniority.

On the declaration of war by the United States against Germany I went with Gen. Pershing to France as judge advocate of the A. E. F., and remained such until his return to the United States.

Senator WARREN. Then you had the highest command over there, of that kind?

Gen. BETHEL. I was the chief law officer of the A. E. F. at all times.

Senator WARREN. You were stationed at the general headquarters, were you?

Gen. BETHEL. I was stationed at general headquarters all the time; yes, sir. I might say, further, that while at West Point I undertook to write a revision of Winthrop's Military Law, based upon the Articles of War, then in the form of a bill before Congress, and devoted two or three years to that work; but inasmuch as the articles were not enacted until after I had entered on duty in the Judge Advocate General's office in Washington, I never completed the work.

Senator WARREN. Now, will you, in your own way, tell us something of the dispensation of military justice on the other side, and also whatever you may know of it here at home.

Gen. BETHEL. I may say that I know practically nothing as to what has occurred in the United States during the two years of my absence. I have read a few newspaper articles, and in the last few days, since being summoned to appear before this committee, I have read as much of the testimony that has been adduced before this committee as possible; but further than that I know nothing as to what has occurred in the United States. I was as familiar as it was possible for me to be with what took place in the A. E. F.

Just before leaving Europe I rendered a brief report to Gen. Pershing of the workings of the court-martial system in Europe, a copy of which I have here.

Senator WARREN. You might insert that in the hearings. You might like to have him read it over hastily, Senator Chamberlain, so that you may ask him any questions that occur to you.

Gen. BETHEL. I really think, before I go ahead with my statement, that is if you are going to question me much on the conditions in the A. E. F., it would be well for me to read that.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Just read it.

Senator WARREN. I think it would be well for him to read it, and then it will bring out what you want to ask him about.

Gen. BETHEL. (reading):

GENERAL HEADQUARTERS,
AMERICAN EXPEDITIONARY FORCES,
JUDGE ADVOCATE'S OFFICE,
France, August 7, 1919.

Memorandum: For the commander in chief.
Subject: General court-martial trials in the American Expeditionary Forces.

1. On May 7 I received the following memorandum from the secretary of the General Staff:

"The commander in chief desires that you furnish the undersigned with a monograph of the general court-martial system as it has worked in the American Expeditionary Forces, with data as to number of convictions of different crimes, length of sentence, etc."

He advised me that it was desirable to have a list by name of all persons who had been tried by general court-martial in the American Expeditionary Forces, together with the result of trial and a statement of the offenses of which the accused were convicted, their sentences and such further disposition as may have been made in their cases in the way of mitigation, remission, etc. I have had a table (see blank form herewith) prepared as above indicated and am keeping the same up to date, and shall submit the same to you upon the breaking up of the American Expeditionary Forces. As there will be but few more court-martial trials, the report which is substantially an extract from the section report will be submitted now.

Under the law each army, corps, division, and separate brigade constituted a general court-martial jurisdiction. Authority to appoint general courts-martial was granted to the commanding general of the Services of Supply September 1, 1917, and as the number of troops increased the authority was likewise granted from time to time to the commanding officers of sections of the Service of Supplies and other commands. There were in all 75 general court-martial jurisdictions in the American Expeditionary Forces.

The following table shows the number of trials by general court-martial in the American Expeditionary Forces, to include June 30, 1919, it being impracticable to fix a later date, such as will be inclusive of all trials in the various divisions and sections of the Service of Supplies:

It should be borne in mind that the number of troops in the American Expeditionary Forces was continually undergoing great variation. It rose from a little more than two hundred thousand in January, 1918, to about two million in November, 1918, and then diminished steadily. The number of troops in the American Expeditionary Forces on June 30, 1919, was three hundred and seventy thousand. The average number of troops in the American Expeditionary Forces during the year 1918 was considerably more than one million; and this average was maintained for the first half of the year 1919.

In 1917 and 1918 the number of trials by general court-martial in the American Expeditionary Forces was approximately one-quarter of 1 per cent of the average number of troops during those years. The number of general court-martial trials during the first six months of 1919 was about three-fourths of 1 per cent per year of the number of troops. The number of trials by general court-martial in the United States Army during the five years preceding the present war was approximately 5 per cent per year of the number of troops in the Army. The small percentage of trials by general court martial in the American Expeditionary Forces as compared with the Regular Army before the war is so remarkable as to require comment. A few cases had to be dismissed, of course, for the reason that the witnesses, on account of sickness, wounds, return to the United States, or other causes, were not available. More important, however, was the liberal employment of the special court-martial. Conditions in the American Expeditionary Forces were very favorable to the use of the special court for the reason that the other urgent duties of officers made it inadvisable to convene general courts-martial except in cases where the jurisdiction of the general court-martial is exclusive, or in those cases where severe punishment appeared to be necessary. The use of the special court, as will hereinafter appear, was encouraged in General Orders, No. 56, 1918, and it was there advised that cases of petit larceny could be properly punished under the existing conditions by the special court-martial.

By far the most important cause, however, of the small number of general court-martial trials was the character of the troops. They realized the seriousness of their cause, and their patriotism and sense of duty, together with the hard service to which they were necessarily subjected, brought about such a state of behavior and discipline as to make the commission of crime extremely rare and but few trials necessary. Since the American Expeditionary Forces was a truly National Army, the excellent behavior of the troops must be accepted as proof of the high standard of American citizenship.

The increase in trials after the signing of the armistice over what it had been prior thereto was very marked, but by no means so great as was expected. It was but natural that the relaxation that followed the severe strain of 1918 should manifest itself in a lower state of discipline and that this should be aggravated by the soldiers' desire to return to the United States when hostilities ceased. The impossibility of sending the Army home at once, or even for quite a while, produced considerable dissatisfaction. Notwithstanding these conditions, however, the number of trials by general court-martial, considering the size of the Army, was very small and was only three-twentieths as great as in times of peace preceding the war.

It became evident in the spring of 1918 that the methods of punishment usually employed in an army were not best adapted to war-time conditions. Whether well founded or not, there was a somewhat prevalent belief that some soldiers would commit offenses with a view to obtaining dishonorable discharge from the service and confinement in a disciplinary barracks, and thereby obtain their release from military service and its incident dangers. It was, therefore, deemed inexpedient to send soldiers convicted of offenses in combat organizations to a place of confinement either in the United States or France, except in those cases where a long penitentiary sentence only would fit the crime. It was deemed better that they should remain with their organizations, sharing the hardships and dangers of their more worthy comrades. General Orders, No. 56, of April 13, 1918, was accordingly issued in terms as follows—

I might say, before reading that order, which was published in the spring of 1918, that it was practically the only order published for the guidance of the command in disciplinary matters.

Senator WARREN. That was considered a very important order.

Gen. BETHEL. Yes, sir; I think so. I shall proceed to read it [reading]:

1. Conditions of service in the American Expeditionary Forces necessitate policies as to punishment different from those which have heretofore obtained in our armies. The law has authorized the President to prescribe maximum limits of punishment for times of peace only. (See Executive Order, par. 349, Manual for Courts-Martial).

2. Heretofore the punishment of dishonorable discharge with confinement for a term in the United States Disciplinary Barracks has been employed for serious cases where penitentiary confinement was not authorized. This punishment is not adapted to the conditions in the American Expeditionary Forces. Hereafter prisoners not sentenced to imprisonment in a penitentiary will be retained in Europe in order that their services may be here utilized and that early opportunity may be given them in proper cases to redeem themselves as soldiers. To this end reviewing authorities should freely exercise their power under the fifty-second article of war.

3. In awarding punishments, it should be borne in mind that a soldier should not escape dangerous service by the commission of crime. Petit larceny and even other offenses involving some moral turpitude, which have heretofore been punished with dishonorable discharge and confinement, may, under existing conditions, be properly punished in a disciplinary way, leaving the soldier to perform military service either with his company or at such other place as the reviewing or higher authority may direct.

In the combat units few cases will arise requiring dishonorable discharge. A sentence of confinement for six months at hard labor, or at hard labor without confinement in a combat unit, which is served by the soldier at the front is severe enough except in extraordinary cases. Where dishonorable discharge is not advisable, and the offense is not capital, the case should, as a rule, be disposed of by an inferior court-martial. Officers should not be withdrawn from their duties to constitute a general court-martial except when the offense can not be otherwise adequately punished.

4. Offenses against the persons or property of the inhabitants of France are much more serious than such offenses would be in our own country. They should be punished with the utmost vigor. When such an offense calls for a penitentiary sentence, it should be for a much longer time than would be awarded under normal conditions.

Absence without leave is an offense incomparably more serious now than in time of peace. Such absences not only give occasion for serious offenses, but whenever an offense is so committed it is brought to the attention of our allies and tends to destroy the good repute of our Army. Therefore, every measure should be taken to prevent the soldier from absenting himself without leave, and when absent to apprehend him immediately, and the offense of absence without leave should be punished with severity.

Deadly weapons are carried by soldiers for the purpose of use against the enemy. Their employment to settle private disputes is equivalent to doing the work of the enemy, and such conduct should be followed by punishment much more severe than would be awarded under usual circumstances.

5. Since trial by court-martial tends to destroy the self-respect of the soldier, it should not be resorted to when other measures are adequate. For minor offenses not frequently repeated the power of the commanding officer under the one hundred and fourth article of war should be employed.

6. It is expected that the disciplinary powers of commanding officers under the one hundred and fourth article of war will be fully utilized, thereby reducing the number of trials by summary courts-martial; that the special court will be employed whenever the case is such that six months' confinement at hard labor under the special conditions now existing will meet the ends of justice; that members of combat organizations will not be sentenced to dishonorable discharge unless the sentence includes a term of confinement extending well beyond the probable duration of the war, and that commanding officers of all grades having prisoners under their control will cooperate to see that such prisoners share the hardships and dangers of their more worthy comrades. Normally a penitentiary sentence should not be given unless the term of imprisonment is 10 years or more.

7. The reviewing authority will, in a case arising in a combat unit, direct that a general prisoner whose is not to be confined in a penitentiary be confined at the station where his unit service or at such other place within the reviewing authority's command as he may deem best.

Now continuing my report to the commander in chief, I said:

While the foregoing order was in most part suggestive and advisory rather than mandatory, all officers exercising disciplinary powers were in accord with its provisions and immediately proceeded to carry it into effect. It resulted that nearly all men convicted of military offenses in combat divisions remained with their organizations and continued to perform their duty as soldiers. A great proportion of them were thus able to redeem themselves by honorable service in the course of a few weeks or months and to bring about the remission of their punishment. Many, indeed, rendered valiant service in action and were immediately released from the further operation of their sentences.

The difficulties of bringing soldiers to trial by general court-martial were very much greater than would be expected among mobilized troops. The rapid movements and frequent changes of stations of the various commands, changes in personnel effected by heavy replacements, together with evacuations of the sick and wounded to hospitals in central and western France, made it difficult in many cases to secure the witnesses. It was more necessary than ever that the trial should immediately follow the offense; but this was frequently impossible on account of the rapidity with which the operations were conducted. During the early part of 1918 our troops were employed mainly in trench warfare, and while a division was in the trenches there were cases that could not be tried by reason of the difficulty of assembling the officers necessary to constitute a general court-martial and obtaining the presence of the witnesses. Such cases were tried when the division returned to a rest area.

In the spring of 1918 the policy of sending to each division or corps a sufficient number of officers to constitute a general court-martial and to be employed on that duty alone was seriously considered. It was realized that officers employed upon this duty exclusively would so familiarize themselves with military law and the requirements of court-martial practice as to bring about regularity in the proceedings, but that such officers would not appreciate conditions of service so well as officers belonging to the division in which the offense should be committed. Had conditions continued as they were then, the employment of officers disabled by wounds as members of court-martial was intended, for the reason that such officers, after service at the front, could best understand the conditions of service there and would be most inclined to do justice in cases coming before them. The moral effect of trial by wounded officers rather than by officers of no combat experience was regarded as important. Competent officers who had convalesced from wounds were so much in need for other administrative duties, however, that but one such court was organized, which was sent where most needed in the summer and fall of 1918.

From the beginning of the Argonne offensive, on September 26, to the close of hostilities, on November 11, there were very few trials in the combat divisions. Indeed, conditions were such as to make it generally impracticable to bring offenders to trial before division courts; and most of the offenses that were committed during the Argonne offensive were tried in November and December. Had hostilities continued many months longer, it is certain that other means for the trial of offenses in the combat divisions would have had to be devised than the usual one of appointing division officers on division courts. Such conditions could have been met by the assignment to each division of sufficient number of officers convalescent from wounds constituting permanent courts. I think it desirable that our law make provision for an additional court to those now authorized to meet the condition of open warfare where troops are constantly on the march or in battle. The act of Congress of the Confederate States of America, of October 9, 1862, providing for a military court of three officers, and later acts amendatory thereto, are very worthy of consideration. In this connection it may also be observed that the field general court-martial of the British Army, usually composed of three officers, was employed in France during the war for the trial of serious offenses instead of the general court-martial analagous to ours for which the British law also provides.

Under such conditions of warfare as obtained during the Argonne offensive, only the most serious offenses should be tried by superior court-martial, and it is almost imperative that those be tried immediately. The accused, together with all witnesses for the prosecution and the defense, should be sent at once to a court sitting as near the lines as practicable. Unless this is done, cases must frequently be dismissed by reason of the witnesses not being available. It is also most important that immediate example be made of the guilty; otherwise disciplinary measures fail in their purpose.

From a comparison of the number of trials of officers and soldiers with the number of officers and soldiers in the American Expeditionary Forces, it appears that the percentage of trials by general courts-martial was more than six times greater among the officers than among the enlisted men. It should not be inferred from this, however, that the standard of conduct was lower among the officers than among the soldiers. Under the Articles of War officers can be tried by general court-martial only. The great majority of offenses committed by soldiers are not only triable, but in fact are tried, by summary or special court-martial. The figures in the above table, therefore, prove nothing as to the comparative conduct of the two classes of military persons.

In one respect the Articles of War have proved defective, I think—under war conditions—in not making sufficient provisions for the punishment of officers for minor offenses. It has been noted that officers can be tried by general court-martial only, and since it is contrary to good policy, and impracticable as well, to employ the general court for minor offenses, it follows that such offenses when committed by officers can only be dealt with under the one hundred and fourth article of war, which authorizes commanding officers to impose certain disciplinary punishments, not including, however, forfeiture of pay. The most effective of the disciplinary punishments authorized by the one hundred and fourth article of war is "restriction to limits," which, in time of peace, consists in restricting the officer to his military post. It is impracticable to impose this punishment under such conditions as we have had in France. Officers' duties have been such that they must come and go, and seldom have officers been stationed where it was practicable to prescribe limits or compel their observance. I feel that there has been a real need of a power to impose a moderate forfeiture of pay upon officers for minor offenses. In the event of a future war, I think there should be a statute authorizing officers of general rank to impose a forfeiture of one-half the monthly pay per month on officers under their command, not above the grade of captain, for minor offenses. This power would conform very closely to that now exercised by summary courts with respect to soldiers' pay, and in view of the right of appeal and other safeguards provided by the one hundred and fourth article of war, the power could not be greatly abused.

Now, I come to the commander in chief's jurisdiction, which is really a change in subject. As you know, Gen. Pershing, as the commander in chief of an army in the field, was the confirming authority for sentences of dismissal and of death adjudged and approved in the various jurisdictions. The next paragraph, however, deals with remission. [Continuing reading:]

Under the fiftieth article of war the unexecuted portion of a sentence could be remitted by the commander in chief so long as the person serving the same was in the American Expeditionary Forces whoever might have been the reviewing authority other than the President. So long as hostilities continued, the exercise of the power thus to mitigate or remit punishment was sparingly exercised. Early in 1919 the matter of general remission was taken up systematically, and Lieut. Col. William Taylor, judge advocate, spent many weeks at the camps where the prisoners were confined, conferring with the prison officers and examining the prisoners themselves, as well as the nature of their cases. Upon his recommendation the remaining portions of about 600 sentences were remitted in whole or in part. The sentences imposed by general court-martial prior to the signing of the armistice were generally more severe than those inflicted in time of peace for like offenses. Military courts appeared to regard theft or embezzlement of military property, absence without leave and acts of violence against the civilian population as more serious than such offenses would be under normal circumstances, and to require, for purposes of example, severer punishment than usual. In the mitigation of these sentences the policy was adopted of reducing them as nearly as practicable to peace-time standings, and to remit the whole where good discipline would not suffer by so doing.

Now I come to the special jurisdiction.

By far the greater number of sentences that came before the commander in chief for his action were those of dismissals of officers adjudged by courts appointed by division or other commanders and approved by them. But 64 officers and 87 soldiers were tried by court-martial appointed by the commander in chief. Four hundred and seventy-nine cases of dismissals of officers came before the commander in chief for the exercise of his approving or confirming authority, and in 318 cases the sentence was confirmed and dismissal directed. In 45 cases the sentence was confirmed, but the execution thereof was suspended, though in two of such cases the suspension was later vacated and dismissal ordered. In 17 cases the sentence was mitigated under the provisions of an act of February 28, 1919, amending the fiftieth article of war, pursuant to which the commander in chief was, by cable of May 8, 1919, authorized to mitigate death and dismissal sentences. In 99 cases the sentence of dismissal was disapproved or confirmation was withheld. Such disapproval was given in some cases for serious mistakes in law made at the trial; in others where the evidence was not deemed conclusive of guilt; and in a few cases before the above-cited enactment, the sentence of dismissal was disapproved for the reason that it was deemed too severe in view of the offenses and their circumstances. Forty-four sentences of death came before the commander in chief for confirmation and in 11 cases the sentence was confirmed and executed. In 10 cases the sentence was disapproved and in 11 cases the sentence of death was mitigated to imprisonment for life or a term of years. Prior to the above-cited enactment 12 death sentences which the commander in chief had the power to confirm were forwarded to the President with the recommendation that the sentence be commuted. The figures in this and the preceding paragraph cover the period from the beginning of the American Expeditionary Forces to the date of this report,—August 7, 1919.

Murder and rape were the only offenses for which the offender suffered the death penalty in the American Expeditionary Forces.

Senator WARREN. Desertion was not punished in that way in any case?

Gen. BETHEL. No, sir; it was not. We had a few desertion cases that came before us.

Senator WARREN. I do not want to interrupt you if there is anything you want to ask, Senator Chamberlain.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Go right along, Senator.

Senator WARREN. General, just make that last statement again, about the number of death sentences in the American Expeditionary Forces.

Gen. BETHEL. I will begin with the death sentences again. I have another copy of this report which Senator Lenroot can follow as I read. [Reading:]

Forty-four sentences of death came before the Commander in Chief for confirmation—

Senator WARREN. Those cases came up from different divisions, perhaps?

Gen. BETHEL. From different divisions and sections of the S. O. S.

Senator WARREN. With the recommendation of the death penalty—with a death sentence?

Gen. BETHEL. Yes, sir.

Senator WARREN. What was done with those?

Gen. BETHEL. In other words, these death sentences came up with the approval of the authority that ordered the court, generally the division commander. [Continuing reading:]

and in 11 cases the sentence was confirmed and executed.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. That is, those men were shot?

Gen. BETHEL. They were hung, those 11 men. [Continuing reading:]

In 10 cases the sentence was disapproved, and in 11 cases the sentence of death was mitigated to imprisonment for life or a term of years. Prior to the above-cited enactment 12 death sentences which the Commander in Chief had the power to confirm were forwarded to the President with the recommendation that the sentence be commuted.

That was at the time when Gen. Pershing did not have the power to commute these sentences. He had the power to confirm and carry a sentence into effect, but not the power to commute.

Senator WARREN. He had the power to send a case to the President?

Gen. BETHEL. Yes; and believing that the death sentence should not be carried into effect, he sent these cases up to the President in order that they might be commuted. [Continuing reading:]

The figures in this and the preceding paragraph cover the period from the beginning of the American Expeditionary Forces to the date of this report—August 7, 1919.

Murder and rape were the only offenses for which the offender suffered the death penalty in the American Expeditionary Forces.

Senator WARREN. Then those men who were hanged were not guilty of desertion; they were not executed for desertion but for the other kinds of offenses?

Gen. BETHEL. For murder or rape, or for the combined offense of murder and rape, as in some of the cases.

Senator WARREN. I do not want to seem personal about it, but it has been asserted that the commander in chief of the American Expeditionary Forces was intent upon having carried into effect those sentences prescribing capital punishment, when he might have acted otherwise, and that is the reason that I wanted to be particular about that.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. There has been a suggestion of that with reference to four boys, of whom two were found guilty of sleeping on post and the other two of disobedience of orders. I think those were the only four cases in which that appeared.

Senator WARREN. Yes, I understand. If this statement of Gen. Bethel is correct, no man has suffered capital punishment on account of desertion.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. That is entirely true, no doubt; but what about those four young men?

Gen. BETHEL. The four cases to which you refer no doubt were four cases that occurred in the early history of the American Expeditionary Forces, I think about November, 1917, and they occurred in the First Division when it had, I think, just entered the line or was about to enter the line; I am not sure.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Did Gen. Pershing commute their sentences?

Gen. BETHEL. He had then no power as to their sentences. Gen. Pershing had power to confirm death sentences given him by the Articles of War only with respect to the following offenses: Murder, rape, desertion, and mutiny. He had no power to carry a death sentence into effect for sleeping on post, for disobedience of orders, for lifting a weapon against a superior officer, or for various other things for which the Articles of War permit the death penalty to be imposed. All cases except those of murder, desertion, mutiny, and rape required confirmation by the President for the execution of the death penalty; so that those cases might have come direct from the division commander to the President under the law.

An order was issued, however, in the early days of the American Expeditionary Forces, requiring records involving sentences which required the confirmation of higher authority to pass through intermediate authority in order that the intermediate authority might express its views and make its recommendation. In other words, cases coming up from divisions came to Gen. Pershing through corps headquarters in order that the corps commander might make recommendations, and in that way these four cases which you mention passed through Gen. Pershing's headquarters on their way to the President.

Senator WARREN. He had no power to act on them?

Gen. BETHEL. No, sir.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. That is what the testimony shows.

Senator WARREN. He had not power to commute or do away with it?

Gen. BETHEL. No power to act on that in any way whatsoever. Just the same as these four were sent on up to the President, a number of others came up which would have had to go to the President. On my examination of them, under his supervision it was believed that a less punishment than death should be inflicted, and they were sent back to the reviewing authorities to resubmit to the court.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Those were cases over which the general commanding had jurisdiction?

Gen. BETHEL. He had no jurisdiction over them. They were cases where the death sentence had been adjudged, which had been approved by the reviewing authority, the division commander, and where it would require the confirmation of the President to give them effect, but inasmuch as we believed the death sentence should not be inflicted in those cases, the records were sent back to the reviewing authority with the suggestion that he send them back to the court for the imposition of a lesser penalty.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. That was by the commander of the American Expeditionary Forces?

Gen. BETHEL. Yes, sir.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. He had no authority to act?

Gen. BETHEL. Not at all.

Senator WARREN. He had the authority to act in that way, to send them back?

Gen. BETHEL. In that way. In other words, there was nothing preventing his acting in that way.

Senator WARREN. He assumed as there was no law against it he could exercise it in that way?

Gen. BETHEL. Yes, sir. In other words, he sent it back to the major general who had approved it for such further action as he thought proper.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Did any other cases come up where the commander of the expeditionary forces recommended the change of a sentence, even where he had no authority to act himself?

Gen. BETHEL. Yes; there were a few others in which he had no power given by law but in which recommendations were made to the President.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. He had no jurisdiction even to do that?

Gen. BETHEL. No jurisdiction conferred by law; no, sir.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Why was the recommendation made in these four cases that they should be executed?

Gen. BETHEL. Because it was believed to be necessary for disciplinary purposes at that time, as a deterrent to the commission of such crimes thereafter.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. I think that is what the evidence here generally shows, Senator Warren.

Gen. BETHEL. There is not any question about that.

Senator WARREN. I wanted to get at the facts as he has given them because there has been a good deal of loose talk outside, and I wanted to get at the facts.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. So far as that recommendation was concerned, there was absolutely no provision of law which required Gen. Pershing to certify those up and recommend execution?

Gen. BETHEL. None whatsoever.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. And there was not any authority for him to take the case where sentence of death had been passed, no authority of law which authorized him or required him to send them back to the division commander?

Gen. BETHEL. No express authority, but such action was legally appropriate and conducive to justice.

Senator WARREN. And of course he could not remit them?

Gen. BETHEL. No, sir.

Senator LENROOT. May I ask you, General, how many death sentences were imposed, I do not mean executed. I see you speak of 44, but I see that only includes those which the commander in chief had power to confirm?

Gen. BETHEL. Yes, sir.

Senator LENROOT. How many others were there?

Gen. BETHEL. It seems to me that includes all that were adjudged in the American Expeditionary Forces.

Senator LENROOT. That did not include these four boys, for instance?

Gen. BETHEL. No; these 44 include those who came before the commander in chief for confirmation, for his action.

Senator LENROOT. How many more were there, if you know, that did not come before him for confirmation?

Gen. BETHEL. I could find out from my records, but I think not more than, I should say, not to exceed a dozen, Senator.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Death sentences?

Gen. BETHEL. Yes, sir; death sentences.

Senator WARREN. Could you in looking over your notes finally insert the number?

Gen. BETHEL. Yes, sir; I could. I can recall three or four now. I remember one particularly where he recommended that it be carried into effect, and I remember a number of others—I had better not state any further. My memory is not reliable.

(NOTE BY GEN. BETHEL.—In addition to the four cases heretofore referred to there were four other death sentences which required the action of the President; one of such was recommended to be executed, two were recommended to be commuted and one to be disapproved.)

Senator LENROOT. You can show those in the record where the recommendation was made for the reduction of the sentence, or where recommendations were made to carry out the sentence.

Gen. BETHEL. Yes, Senator, I shall just continue this tabulation so as to show those numbers.

I may say here also with reference to the death sentences that were carried into effect, 11 for murder and rape, that I take the absolute responsibility for what was done in those cases, and that I gave each one of those cases the most careful personal study, reading all the evidence in every case and generally rereading it, and that I feel personally responsible for the infliction of that sentence in each of those 11 cases.

Senator WARREN. Did any of them acknowledge their guilt?

Gen. BETHEL. Well, some of them did, but how many I do not remember.

Senator WARREN. That is not a controlling factor.

Senator LENROOT. In those cases, General, were they of such a nature that where the death penalty was inflicted, the same punishment would have been inflicted under the civil law?

Gen. BETHEL. I am glad you asked that question, Senator. I suppose in many of our States the death sentence is not enforced for rape. I think in practically all of them it is for murder. Most of these were rape cases. Now, we had quite a few murder cases among the 2,000,000 men of the American Expeditionary Forces, and we determined not to confirm and carry into effect the sentence of death in such cases unless we were very certain that such punishment would generally be carried into effect in the United States. In fact we leaned backward on that principle and commuted to life imprisonment or sent up for commutation by the President some pretty flagrant cases of murder. In fact, I can state the circumstances of the murder cases, where the death sentence was actually carried into effect. One was a very cold-blooded murder of a military policeman by a person who had been in desertion for quite a while and endeavored to effect his escape in that way. Another was committed by a negro upon a French professor who was endeavoring to prevent the negro from committing rape, which he was attempting at the time. The other two murder cases were in connection with rape which was being committed, and was committed at the same time.

We had a number of murder cases where the man was apparently somewhat under the influence of liquor, or where there was some degree of provocation, where he felt aggrieved and was in more or less hot blood, and in none of those cases did we carry out the sentence of death.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. All of those are in your list here, in your detailed statement?

Gen. BETHEL. Yes, they are in this list, and I am speaking of cases where Gen. Pershing had the power to carry the sentence into effect.

Senator WARREN. What is the penalty in your State for rape?

Senator LENROOT. We have no death penalty. But, of course, I see that in this situation the death penalty for rape would be very much more proper as a deterrent than it would in civil life.

Gen. BETHEL. Yes, sir. In the first place, the article of war says that for rape the sentence shall be either death or life imprisonment, and under the special conditions existing there, where the women were defenseless, their men were all at the front, we felt it necessary to make an example on a clear case, and I am free to say that in nearly all the cases of rape that were tried, and in all in which there was a conviction, there was the clearest and most convincing evidence.

There was one case where a negro was convicted of rape and the sentence was approved and sent to our headquarters, and there was just a slight doubt as to the identity, and of course the sentence was disapproved by the commander in chief. That is one thing we had to be very careful about, that there was no question about identity, because, as you know, negroes look very much alike to us and still more alike to the French people. These rape sentences were not confined to negroes by any means. They were about equally divided between the two races.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. You did not quite finish reading that.

Gen. BETHEL. No, sir, not quite [reading]:

On the whole, the court-martial system has worked well in the American Expeditionary Forces, and has proved its adaptability to war conditions. Difficulties were encountered, as indicated above, but they were not as great as in other fields of military administration and did not to an appreciable extent defeat the purpose of military trials—to enforce discipline. This was the first war test of the law establishing the special court and the law authorizing the President to empower other commanding officers to appoint general courts-martial than those designated in the Articles of War. Both provisions of law have proved invaluable. In fact, great embarrassment would have resulted had not the President the authority to delegate the power to appoint general courts-martial.

Cases were generally well tried. There were, of course, some poorly tried cases, but the percentage of such was not, in my opinion, greater than in peace times. In the majority of the cases it was apparent from the way the trial was conducted, as shown by the record, that not only the Judge Advocate and counsel, but some members of the court also, were professional lawyers.

With reference to that last remark, some other judge advocates have expressed a different opinion from what I have stated here with respect to the thoroughness of the trials. Of course I only read the record generally in the more important trials, the dismissal of officers and death cases, though in some other cases of soldiers. I think that these trials for thoroughness average as well as the cases I read for 10 years as a department judge advocate in time of peace, but that is an opinion that is expressed only on somewhat limited experience. I only read a certain class. A great many of them were very well tried.

Senator WARREN. That is your judgment from the experience you had?

Gen. BETHEL. That I had; yes, sir.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. General, take your statistical record here, you say that there were in the aggregate 6,875 general court-martial cases during the years 1917, 1918, and 1919.

Gen. BETHEL. In the A. E. F.?

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Yes.

Gen. BETHEL. Six thousand eight hundred and seventy-three it indicates; yes, sir.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. That is right, is it not?

Gen. BETHEL. Total trials for 1917, 1918 up to June 30, 1919, yes, sir.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Now, have you any record to show what the aggregate of the sentences was upon those whose sentences were permitted to stand?

Gen. BETHEL. No, sir; I had submitted to Gen. Pershing, and I have a record myself, a large, tabulated record, showing the sentences in every case, together with such remissions as were thereafter made, but I never added up the aggregate, no, sir. I have not any idea as to what the aggregate was.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Could you furnish that?

Gen. BETHEL. I think so.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. I would like to have it in the record.

Gen. BETHEL. The aggregate of years of confinement, you want, do you not?

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Yes.

Senator WARREN. You want the original sentence?

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. The whole amount.

Gen. BETHEL. No, indeed; Gen. Pershing had no legal authority whatsoever over a sentence finally approved by one of his lower commanders. His authority in such cases was confined to remitting the punishment of a man that might be serving in the A. E. F., he being the supreme commander.

Senator WARREN. Something in the nature of a pardon, do you mean?

Gen. BETHEL. Yes, sir; the remission of punishment.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. You are referring to Gen. Pershing. I am not trying to make this personal, as I have a very high regard for him.

Senator WARREN. You mean the commander in chief?

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. I am trying to get at the construction of this statute. I am not trying to fix any responsibility upon Gen. Pershing. But I want to find out to what extent there is for that reviewing power under your construction of the law.

Gen. BETHEL. The law was perfectly clear so far as the powers of the commander in chief were concerned. He was the reviewing authority in the cases of courts appointed by him, and he was the confirming authority in cases of dismissal and death adjudged by lower commanders.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. I think there is no question about that. There is no difference between us there.

Gen. BETHEL. And he also had the authority under the Articles of War to remit a punishment which had been approved and had gone into effect, and which was being served in his command.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Where does he get that?

Gen. BETHEL. From the Articles of War expressly, and that was the end of his authority under the Articles of War.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Now, what was this General Order No. 7?

Gen. BETHEL. General Order No. 7 was issued by the War Department in the spring of 1918, and provided that before the sentence of dismissal of an officer or a death sentence or a sentence inflicting dishonorable discharge of a soldier should be carried into effect, the record of trial should be submitted to the Judge Advocate General's Office for determination of the legality of the trial. Whereupon, the examination having been made, the record would be returned to the reviewing authority for his final action.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. What was the genesis of that order? Do you know in what it had its origin? What was the occasion of its adoption?

Gen. BETHEL. No; I do not. I was in France, and it came out of a clear sky so far as we were concerned in France.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Let me ask you if, in August, 1918, Gen. Crowder did not write you a letter on the subject, in substance the purpose of which was that some rule must be adopted or something must be done to head off a congressional investigation as to court-martial systems?

Gen. BETHEL. He wrote me a letter. I think the letter—I have read Gen. Ansell's testimony before this committee, and came across this letter in the printed record, and I have no doubt that it is a correct copy of the letter that was sent me. I remember getting such a letter, and I have no doubt that it is a correct copy of the letter.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. You remember the letter?

Gen. BETHEL. I remember rather vaguely the letter; yes, sir.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. You would have it in your papers?

Gen. BETHEL. Undoubtedly; at least I presume it is in my files.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. If the letter which is printed in the record is incorrect, and you find it incorrect with a comparison of your files, will you put in the correct one?

Gen. BETHEL. I shall have a verification made.

(NOTE BY GEN. BETHEL.—The letter is correctly set forth in the printed record.)

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. In that letter to you, did he not also state that this General Order No. 7 was to prevent our effort toward the establishment of a military court of appeals?

Gen. BETHEL. I do not recall the substance of that letter, Senator, because in fact it made practically no impression on my mind. The important part of that letter to me was this: When the office of acting judge advocate general was established in France, the branch office of the War Department, of which I was ordered to take charge temporarily, the cable, through a mistake in code numbers, as we received it, directed a certain captain of Infantry to take charge, and we assumed that that captain of Infantry was on his way to France, and therefore the office was not established at once, but about a month later the error was discovered, and then I established the office; and that was the most important thing that Gen. Crowder wrote to me about, as I remember.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. The order was adopted without consultation with you in the first place?

Gen. BETHEL. Yes, sir.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. And the letter was in the nature of an apology for adopting order No. 7?

Gen. BETHEL. I do not know about it, Senator. I think that letter was a good deal later, if I am not mistaken.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Did you favor the adopting of General Order No. 7?

Gen. BETHEL. I do not think I did, Senator, in so far as it related to cases in the A. E. F. It had its advantages and it had its disadvantages, but I do not think that on the whole I was in favor of it at the time. Now it was of great assistance to me in this respect, especially in the beginning, that I was very short-handed and the presence of an office there to make an immediate examination of the records that I had to examine for legal defects was a great deal of help to me, and in that way I did welcome it.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. You represented—you actually stood in the place of—the Judge Advocate-General over there? You were given practically the functions, the authority, of the Judge Advocate General here, so far as the American Expeditionary Forces were concerned?

Gen. BETHEL. I should hardly put it that way, Senator. The law confers certain powers on the Judge Advocate General. I was not his deputy, and really my powers under the law would be uncertain, I think, except as they are derived from the customs of the service. I was the legal adviser to Gen. Pershing, and as such, supervising the administration of military justice throughout France as far as it was practicable.

Senator WARREN. Of course in using names you mean the commander in chief.

Gen. BETHEL. Pardon; I should say that, though we had only one commander in chief.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. I want you to understand that I am not undertaking to reflect on the commander in chief. I am trying to get at the method of administration under this law.

Gen. BETHEL. Do not think, Senator, that I even suspected that you did.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Was your opinion as to matters of law, as representing the department of military justice over there, regarded as final under General Order No. 7?

Gen. BETHEL. No, sir--well, you mean during the short time that I had charge of the branch office, which was about a month?

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Yes, or any other time.

Gen. BETHEL. I want to understand the question.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. I will put it this way: Did not Gen. Kernan refuse to take your view of the law?

Gen. BETHEL. Not my view, no sir.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Your department.

Gen. BETHEL. I think he refused to adopt Gen. Kreger's view of the law on two occasions. I think he did. I did not see the papers: I don't say that he did.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Was Kreger occupying a position in your department?

Gen. BETHEL. No, sir. Kreger's office and mine were entirely distinct.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. What was his?

Gen. BETHEL. Kreger had charge of the branch office of the Judge Advocate General.

Senator WARREN. That is, the regular office of the Judge Advocate General?

Gen. BETHEL. Yes, sir. The distinction should be clearly borne in mind. I was judge advocate of the A. E. F., the chief law officer of the A. E. F. Gen. Kreger had an office which was a branch of the War Department, a branch of the Judge Advocate General's office of the War Department, and his office was not a part of the A. E. F.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. He really represented the Judge Advocate General?

Gen. BETHEL. He really represented the Judge Advocate General at Washington.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Yes. Did not Gen. Kernan decline to follow his directions?

Gen. BETHEL. I think he did on two occasions. I am saying that only on hearsay.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Did not Gen. Hull, for instance—what position did he occupy?

Gen. BETHEL. Col. Hull was judge advocate of the S.O.S. until he became finance officer of the A. E. F.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Do you not know of cases where he advised Gen. Kernan not to observe the decisions of Kreger?

Gen. BETHEL. I do not know of that, but it is probable—well, I do not know. I will say in connection with the matter that my office always conformed to the decisions of the Acting Judge Advocate General except that we went and saw him when we thought he was mistaken, and had him correct some of his decisions, and in two cases where I felt very certain that he was wrong I appealed to the Judge Advocate General's Office in Washington.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. You were of the opinion that a commanding general's rulings upon questions of law were final, were you not?

Gen. BETHEL. So far as his own action is concerned.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Well, yes, in any way, whether official or not.

Gen. BETHEL. They are only in the same way that any man's decisions are final for the time as regards his own action.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. What was General Order No. 84?

Gen. BETHEL. I think General Order No. 84 modified General Order No. 7, somewhat, but I could not state from memory in what respect.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. You have a copy of it, have you not?

Gen. BETHEL. Yes.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Will you not put that in the record, General?

Gen. BETHEL. Yes, sir. General Order No. 84, War Department, 1918? I will insert the part of it which is pertinent here.

GENERAL ORDERS, No. 84.

WAR DEPARTMENT,
Washington, September 11, 1918.

IV. The last subparagraph of Section II, General Orders, No. 7, War Department, 1918, is amended to read as follows:

The records of all general courts-martial and of all military commissions originating in the said Expeditionary Forces will be forwarded to the said branch office for review, and it shall be the duty of the said Acting Judge Advocate General to examine and review such records, to return to the proper commanding officer for correction such as are incomplete, and to report to the proper officer any defect or irregularity which renders the finding or sentence illegal or void in whole or in part. The execution of all sentences involving death, dismissal, or dishonorable discharge shall be stayed pending such review. Any sentence, or by part thereof, so found to be illegal, defective, or void, in whole or in part, shall be disapproved, modified, or set aside, in accordance with the recommendation of the Acting Judge Advocate General. The said Acting Judge Advocate General will forward all records in which action is complete, together with his review thereof and all proceedings thereon, to the Judge Advocate General of the Army for permanent file. (250.47, A. G. O.)

BY ORDER OF THE SECRETARY OF WAR:

PEYTON C. MARCH,
General, Chief of Staff.

Official:

P. C. HARRIS,
Acting The Adjutant General.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Yes, sir. You do not question the legality of General Order No. 7, and of General Order No. 84?

Gen. BETHEL. No, sir; I do not think I have questioned the legality of General Order No. 7.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Or 84?

Gen. BETHEL. No; I think not. There was one of those orders possibly, that I was about to recommend that its effect be made definite and certain when it was amended. I think that was No. 7.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Did you protest against it?

Gen. BETHEL. No; I did not protest.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. You accepted it without question?

Gen. BETHEL. We discussed it some. We discussed it some there at our headquarters when we first heard of it. I know that Gen. Harbord thought it was inadvisable. The only discussion I ever had of it or concerning it with Gen. Pershing, I think amounted to this, I told him I disliked very much to see a military agency established in the A. E. F. which was not a part of the A. E. F., and I remember that he expressed the same opinion.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. That was Kreger?

Gen. BETHEL. Yes; it was an office that was not a part of the A. E. F. I think I also stated that it would be somewhat dangerous if when we got into Germany and tried Germans by military commission, to have to send the record some distance and to wait for some time before we could carry the sentence into effect. I think I expressed myself to that effect.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Was not that order subsequently revoked?

Gen. BETHEL. General Order 7?

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Yes.

Gen. BETHEL. Some order, I think 84, modified it.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Was not that done, General, at your insistence, and after your discussion of the subject?

Gen. BETHEL. No, sir; I do not think that I had anything whatsoever to do with the modification. I do not think so; in fact, I am sure I did not.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Well, did not the War Department go to the extent of abolishing the office of Judge Advocate General in France?

Gen. BETHEL. Yes, sir; and we insisted most strenuously that it be reestablished.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. That is when you complained about order No. 84?

Gen. BETHEL. No; I never made any complaint respecting General Order No. 84.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. I would just like to know.

Gen. BETHEL. I will tell you my recollection with regard to the abolition and the reestablishment of the branch office of the Judge Advocate General in France.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. That was Kreger?

Gen. BETHEL. Yes, sir. In the spring of 1919 a cable was received directing Gen. Kreger to return to the United States, that the office of Acting Judge Advocate General in France was abolished, and that all orders relating to it were revoked. I made a careful study of the effect of that cable, and took the advice of the other military lawyers there, and we all agreed that the effect of that cable was to abolish all review by the Acting Judge Advocate General or the Judge Advocate General's Office before we should confirm the sentence or before we should approve the sentence. I had doubts as to whether the War Department really meant to do that, and so a cable was sent asking if that was the intent. The War Department replied by a cable that it was intended that all records should be sent to the United States for examination in the United States before we should carry the sentence into effect. Now you see what delay that would involve, and we immediately asked that that office be reestablished, and it was reestablished.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. You had changed your mind about it in the meantime? You did not think it was advisable at first that a representative of the Judge Advocate General's Office should be there in France under General Order No. 7, but you later decided to have a representative there?

Gen. BETHEL. No; I can not say it was so much a change of mind in that respect; but if we had to send the records to the Judge Advocate General's Office for examination before we could carry a sentence into effect, then I wanted the branch office reestablished in order that there might not be delay.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. I think you were perfectly right about that, sir.

Gen. BETHEL. I had not positively made up my mind as to whether the jurisdiction originally given by G. O. No. 7 to the branch office was a good thing or not.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. But the department was assuming that, when Kreger was recalled, the records would come here?

Gen. BETHEL. Yes, sir.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. And that was what you were protesting against?

Gen. BETHEL. Yes, sir.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. In other words, that there would be this circumlocution?

Gen. BETHEL. This great delay. Men would be waiting to find out what their sentences were, and they would have to be kept in confinement, to the great inconvenience of the military authorities in France, because it is very important that military justice be as quick as possible.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. How did you do before Kreger went over as the representative of the Judge Advocate General?

Gen. BETHEL. No examination by the Judge Advocate General's office was required before that time, and we would carry the sentence into effect at once. That had been the method in vogue in the Army since the beginning.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. When did The Adjutant General change the rule with respect to that?

Gen. BETHEL. That was General Order No. 7.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. I can understand your reason. The Articles of War never define penalties in time of war, but leave it to the direction of the court, do they not?

Gen. BETHEL. Yes, sir; they do not define penalties to any great extent. They authorize the President in times of peace to prescribe the maximum penalties, but that is only in times of peace.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Who defines the penalty in time of war?

Gen. BETHEL. In time of war it rests with the court.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Do you think the Articles of War ought to define the penalty?

Gen. BETHEL. Ought to prescribe the maximum penalty?

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Ought to fix the penalty some way, or leave it entirely to the military tribunal, the court?

Gen. BETHEL. In that respect, I favor the articles as they at present exist. The Articles of War authorize the death penalty or the penalty of dismissal in certain cases, and in other cases they leave the sentence to the discretion of the court.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. You accepted it without question?

Gen. BETHEL. We discussed it some. We discussed it some there at our headquarters when we first heard of it. I know that Gen. Harbord thought it was inadvisable. The only discussion I ever had of it or concerning it with Gen. Pershing, I think amounted to this, I told him I disliked very much to see a military agency established in the A. E. Senator CHAMBERLAIN. You do not think it is necessary that the Articles of War define the offense?

Gen. BETHEL. Where there is doubt as to the offense I think they should.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Do you know that the ninety-fifth and ninety-sixth articles of war are very broad?

Gen. BETHEL. Yes, sir.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. And they permit the military authorities to try a man for anything prejudicial to good order and military discipline?

Gen. BETHEL. Yes, sir.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Do you not think it is a very broad power?

Gen. BETHEL. It is a very broad power. I have often thought that it confided to the court the power of legislator and judge.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Do you not think it is too broad?

Gen. BETHEL. My experience has not taught me that it is, Senator.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Do you think that it is necessary?

Gen. BETHEL. I believe that you have got to have some general article. Of course the effect of it can be diminished by more specific legislation, by enumerating a greater number of offenses as military offenses.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Now, General, what have you to say in reference to a court of appeals, a military court of appeals of some kind, where the appellate tribunal would have greater power than the Judge Advocate General has now?

Gen. BETHEL. I have read Gen. Ansell's testimony before this committee very hurriedly and I learned of the cases known as the Texas mutiny cases, and I presume no doubt that there are other cases somewhat similar to those from time to time, and I think there should be a power to correct and reverse any illegal judgment that has been rendered.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. I am glad to hear you say so. I think there is no question about that.

Gen. BETHEL. I feel that the pardoning power is not sufficient in such cases.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. It does not remove the stigma of conviction.

Gen. BETHEL. It does not, because a pardon presupposes guilt.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Yes, sir.

Gen. BETHEL. It does not establish the fact that there was an illegal conviction.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. No matter whether there was prejudicial error in the trial or whether the trial was irregular or not?

Gen. BETHEL. If for any reason the conviction was illegal or on insufficient evidence, or if there was a great abuse of discretion on the part of those who imposed and approved the sentence, I believe there ought to be a correcting power somewhere that can sweep away the determination of guilt.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Because if a man is guilty, whether clemency is exercised or not, he goes out into the world with the stamp of the convict on his brow, denied the right of citizenship and deprived of many rights:

Gen. BETHEL. For desertion in time of war, I think now he loses his right of citizenship.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Have you formulated in your mind any system of appeals, what it ought to consist of, how its functions should be exercised?

Gen. BETHEL. No, Senator; this subject is pretty new to me. You see we have been very busy in the A. E. F. and have heard nothing of these discussions going on here at all, and I have only been considering it in the last three days, since receiving the summons from this committee, so I am not prepared to say just yet what I would recommend in that line.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Well, you know this from your contact with the Judge Advocate General's office, that in his view of the law, his construction of section 1199 of the Revised Statutes, he only has an advisory power where the court had jurisdiction and there were no irregularities in the trial. You think that is not broad enough?

Gen. BETHEL. I think that some one ought to have the power to say that the trial is illegal and that the judgment is void.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. That there was prejudicial error?

Gen. BETHEL. Yes; that there was error rendering the judgment void.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Or impairing some substantial right of the defendant. Would you go that far?

Gen. BETHEL. Yes; substantial right. Well——

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. If evidence was admitted that ought not to have been admitted against a man, for instance, and might possibly have been a factor in his conviction, ought there not be some tribunal to reverse the judgment on that question?

Gen. BETHEL. Yes.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. I am glad to have your opinion along that line.

Now I am monopolizing all the time.

Senator WARREN. We are getting the benefit of all your work, are we not?

Senator LENROOT. Certainly.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Now, there is one other question. We have had a very able discussion of the systems in vogue in Great Britain and France, for instance, the functions and powers of the judge advocate general in Great Britain, who is a civilian, and the duties and powers of a judge advocate in the field and in the Army. Now what do you understand are the functions of the judge advocate in France with the expeditionary forces, whether he occupies the position which you do with the commanding general or whether he is with a division commander or corps commander or what not? What is his function?

Gen. BETHEL. The judge advocate of the American forces in France with respect to military justice bears the same relation to that command as the judge advocate of a division does to a division, or the judge advocate of any other court-martial jurisdiction does to that jurisdiction. You understand that the commanding general in France has not the power now to carry into effect the sentence of death or the dismissal of an officer. His power is precisely the same as any other commanding general.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. What I want to get at particularly is, does the judge advocate in any branch of the service, whether it is with a larger or smaller unit act only in the capacity of an adviser to the court or does he prosecute for the Government?

Gen. BETHEL. Are you speaking now of the judge advocate of the command known as the American forces in France, or are you speaking of the judge advocate of the general court-martial in France?

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. I am speaking of them generally.

Gen. BETHEL. The conditions among our troops in France with respect to military justice are precisely the same as they are in mobilized divisions in the United States or one of the departments in the United States.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Well, now here is a man on trial before a general court-martial. Who prosecutes him?

Gen. BETHEL. The judge advocate of the court, the officer who has been detailed as judge advocate of the court.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. In a special court he does the same thing?

Gen. BETHEL. Yes, sir.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. And in a summary court he does the same thing?

Gen. BETHEL. There is no judge advocate in the summary court. That consists of only one officer.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Now, then, the judge advocate prosecutes or brings out the evidence for the Government?

Gen. BETHEL. Yes, sir.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Does he act as an adviser for the court or does he act as an adviser for the defendant or undertake to protect the interests of the defendant?

Gen. BETHEL. The judge advocate of the court-martial is presumed to advise the court, but he does not do so very often unless the court calls upon him to look up the law on some particular point. Unfortunately, however, the judge advocate of a court is much of the time an officer who is not specially skilled in the law, and he is hardly competent to advise the court as to a serious legal question.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. I believe that is all I desire to ask the General now.

Senator LENROOT. I think I have just one question, General. If a court of appeals were created, making it a legal tribunal and the jurisdiction of that were limited to passing upon errors of law, but with no right to pass upon the case de novo from the record, in other words, to substitute its judgment on the face of the facts for that of the court-martial, do you think that that would be impracticable?

Gen. BETHEL. No; it would not be impracticable.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Well, would that interfere with discipline or the command if the passing upon facts was wholly left to the military side?

Gen. BETHEL. And if the court were merely to examine the record to see whether the sentence is legal, whether the trial is legal?

Senator WARREN. You mean a court outside of the military line?

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Well, of the judge advocate's department, composed of lawyers, but within the service.

Gen. BETHEL. No; I do not see that it would.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Do you think that would be beneficial?

Gen. BETHEL. Yes, I think it would; because no matter how careful the reviewing authority, with the advice of his judge advocate--and of course the staff judge advocate is really the reviewing author-- ity—but no matter how careful he may be, or even how learned—and he is not always as learned as he ought to be—of course there is bound to be an error now and then which ought to be corrected. Now, the only thing that I fear in the matter of a court of that kind is that it will draw to itself too much power, try to find error where really no substantial error exists. That will be the tendency, I fear. But still I think there ought to be a court or a board or whatever you may term it. I myself would prefer to have it composed of military officers in the Judge Advocate General's Office, but I think there ought to be a body to make an examination of the record for that purpose.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. You say there would be a disposition, you think, for that body to draw to itself more power than it ought to and try to find error whether or no?

Gen. BETHEL. Where the error is not substantial, that is the tendency and that will have to be carefully guarded.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. General, that is not true of appellate tribunals in the States and in the Federal courts. They usually are just the opposite.

Gen. BETHEL. They try to dodge?

Senator WARREN. In the Supreme Court of the United States even.

Senator LENROOT. Do you think a military tribunal would be more apt to look for errors than a civil court would?

Gen. BETHEL. No; I do not think that they would.

Senator LENROOT. Would not the presumption be to the contrary rather than otherwise?

Gen. BETHEL. Well, I do not know, Senator, I really do not.

Now if you gentlemen will pardon me, I am probably speaking from experience. I have had charge of the judge advocate's office of the A. E. F., and know something of the work in the acting judge advocate general's office then, which was wholly independent of my office.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Gen. Kreger?

Gen. BETHEL. Gen. Kreger had an excellent office, and had a number of excellent lawyers as assistants. Now, it does seem to me that at times they were attaching too much weight to inconsequential error. Now, that is the sort of thing I fear. I trust my fears may not be well grounded.

Senator LENROOT. As I gather from such testimony as I have heard with relation to this military court of appeals, I gather that there was the fear that a court consisting of the representatives of the Judge Advocate General's office would pass upon the adequacy of the sentence and the punishments and not having that knowledge of military needs and discipline, would not be in a position to give such judgments as military discipline might require. But it has occurred to me that that could not be true, in so far as their power to review for prejudicial error is concerned.

Gen. BETHEL. I agree with you, Senator. I certainly would not desire to see any court, civil or military, sitting in Washington having the power to set aside and disapprove a sentence on the ground that they thought it was too severe, because such a court will have little or no conception of the necessities of military discipline in the far-away field.

Senator WARREN. It would not have in time of war?

Gen. BETHEL. Of course we must always think of a time of war when we are thinking of military law.

Senator LENROOT. But if such a court had the power to set aside such a verdict and send the case back for prejudicial error, so that military officers, after all, had control of the sentence, there could not be any objection?

Gen. BETHEL. There would not be in theory. I doubt the advisability of sending a case back a long distance. It would be impossible to call the court together again.

Senator LENROOT. You could have a new court like a new trial court in civil life and a new jury?

Gen. BETHEL. But we are rather averse to new trials in the military service, possibly without reason. We feel that military justice ought to be swift and we feel, in striving to convict the most guilty man, the Government had better bear the loss of a conviction rather than pursue it further.

Senator LENROOT. It is your idea that where prejudicial error has occurred that should end the case?

Gen. BETHEL. I would rather not make final answer on that point, Senator. I have always been very much inclined to dismiss a case that has been tried once, even where there has been no jurisdiction, rather than to pursue the man further, although I recognize that there has been no legal trial and you have the right to bring the person to trial. I have just read hurriedly the Kernan report and I find that it does make provision for a new trial. But I have not thought about the matter sufficiently to be willing to express an opinion.

Senator LENROOT. On another branch, I would like to ask one question. In this table of acquittals it appears that in the A. E. F. there were 1,062 acquittals approved and 149 acquittals disapproved. Generally speaking, what became of those acquittals that were disapproved?

Gen. BETHEL. That is merely an expression on the part of the reviewing authority that he does not agree with the court.

Senator LENROOT. That is the end of the case?

Gen. BETHEL. Absolutely.

Senator LENROOT. There was not in any of these cases, so far as you know, where the acquittal was disapproved, a subsequent finding of guilt?

Gen. BETHEL. There could not be.

Senator LENROOT. We have some testimony where there has been in the A. E. F.

Gen. BETHEL. No; where the reviewing authority acts upon a sentence by disapproving a sentence, that is the end of it. The trial is complete. Now, before acting on it at all, he may send it back to the court, or could, until recent orders, send it back to the court for reconsideration, stating the fact that he did not agree with their conclusions.

Senator LENROOT. What is the effect of disapproval of a trial, then?

Gen. BETHEL. It has the same effect in law as the approval of an acquittal.

Senator LENROOT. What is the purpose of a disapproval?

General BETHEL. It is merely an expression on the part of the reviewing authority that he believes the court should have found the man guilty instead of not guilty.

Senator WARREN. But the court dismisses the case?

Gen. BETHEL. The case is at an end. The case has been tried, and the Articles of War say that the accused can not be tried again.

Senator LENROOT. That is part of the Articles of War?

Gen. BETHEL. The Articles of War say that no man shall be tried twice for the same offense, and when a verdict of guilty or not guilty has been reached, the man has been tried, and when the reviewing authority acts on the case, it is at an end. Now until he acts on the case, he could, until recent orders, return the record to the court for a reconsideration of its finding.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. He might have a conviction where there had been formerly an acquittal?

Gen. BETHEL. That can be done under the Articles of War, or could be until recent orders.

Senator LENROOT. But that can not be done under a disapproval of a trial?

Gen. BETHEL. No, when once disapproved, it is at an end.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. I want to get that fixed in my mind correctly. We will say—I have a case in mind—here is a man who is charged with embezzlement and absence without leave. He is found not guilty of embezzlement and guilty of absence without leave. He is a commissioned officer and he is dismissed from the Army. Now the commanding officer who appointed the court sends that back and the man is retried on the same charge and found guilty of embezzlement and found guilty of being absent without leave and is sent to the penitentiary and dishonorably dismissed.

Gen. BETHEL. The reviewing authority, if he thought the officer should have been found guilty of embezzlement could return the record for reconsideration of the court on the charge of embezzlement.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Then the judgment is not complete until the reviewing authority gets it?

Gen. BETHEL. Yes.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. But that kind of a case would be impossible?

Gen. BETHEL. That kind of a case was possible until recent orders.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. A few months ago?

Gen. BETHEL. Just a month ago, quite recently.

Senator WARREN. You spoke of its preparation in June and its adoption in August or July.

Gen. BETHEL. I think that order was published in July. I am not sure. I know a copy just reached us in France before I came away.

Senator WARREN. I think there is nothing more, but we should be glad if the general would offer any suggestions or anything connected with his opinions and judgments on the main subject matter, that is on the bill before us, No. 64.

Gen. BETHEL. Yes, sir. I expressed myself a moment ago in answer to a question of yours as being opposed to the law providing in general, as bill 64 does, a maximum penalty for all times. I think it probably only just to myself and you that I should explain briefly my reasons.

Senator WARREN. I wish you would enter into that quite extensively, because that is a large question of fact as to whether we should specify innumerable maximum penalties or whether we should leave very much of it to the consideration of the various courts.

Gen. BETHEL. Now the penalty proper for an offense differs very much according to the circumstances. Let me illustrate it in this way. The offense of absence without leave for two or three days is under ordinary circumstances regarded as a very minor offense, possibly punished by a fine or forfeiture of three or four dollars, not more than that. Absence without leave in time of war, however, may be most serious. For example, when the Twenty-seventh Division, the New York National Guard Division, was in the line on the English front, there were a number of absentees. There were probably a dozen men who absented themselves, for what causes I do not know, for two or three days or three or four days.

Gen. O'Ryan, the commanding general, brought them to trial by a general court-martial and they were given, I think nearly all of them, a sentence of five years, without dishonorable discharge, for they were to remain with the colors. In other words, they did not escape the dangers of service, but went right on in service. That seemed like an outrageous sentence for the offense, and one of my assistants brought it to my attention immediately with the view of having it cut down. But I felt that Gen. O'Ryan was responsible for the discipline, for the efficiency of his division, and that these sentences had better stand for the time, which they did. Of course, when the armistice came those sentences were remitted by Gen. O'Ryan.

I merely state this case as showing the difference between absence without leave at one place and at one time and absence without leave at another place and another time. Now, if the law is going to prescribe a maximum penalty for every military offense that shall be effective at all times, in war as well as in peace, it must adopt a pretty heavy maximum and it will constitute an invitation to the court, and especially to green courts, which we have in time of war, to inflict that penalty regardless of all considerations.

Senator WARREN. You fear that it will incite severe punishment instead of making punishment less severe?

Gen. BETHEL. To my mind it would, especially if you have a sufficient maximum penalty to meet the more serious cases.

Senator WARREN. Now, in the case of Gen. O'Ryan, I take it the seriousness of that kind of cases was that if a dozen men could do that and pay a few dollars, a good many more would say that it was worth the price and act accordingly. In other words, the idea of the severe punishment was to prevent others from committing the same crime?

Gen. BETHEL. The object of all military punishment is to deter others from committing a like offense.

I would prefer that the Articles of War read, most of them just as they do now, with respect to the penalty, "as the court-martial may direct." If the court imposes too severe a penalty there are ample methods by which it can be remitted promptly. Every general court-martial record gets very critical examination in the office of the Judge Advocate General, where there is a clemency board or division at all times, and I have never known the Secretary of War to refuse to exercise clemency where the Judge Advocate General recommended it.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. But by that clemency they do not remove the stigma of conviction?

Gen. BETHEL. I am speaking now of cases where the conviction was legal, where the man was duly convicted.

Senator WARREN. Where he should be punished, but where you limit the amount?

Gen. BETHEL. Yes, but where the punishment has been gross and excessive, we have an ample remedy at all times for the removal of the excess.

Senator WARREN. As to the sentences over there, what is your judgment, that they have generally been less severe or more severe than you would approve of, now as you look back over things? Looking back over your entire experience, would you approve of the sentences, under all the circumstances? I am speaking generally, of course.

Gen. BETHEL. Yes, sir, looking backward, I do not think that sentences as a rule were unreasonable under the conditions under which they were imposed. A number of sentences were two or three times as severe as they would be in times of peace. For example, the stevedores at the base ports were robbing boxes of pistols and rifles that were being shipped over for the use of our troops, and I suppose under ordinary circumstances the punishment for such an offense would not exceed a year, but several of those men were sentenced for five years and I think the looting was stopped.

Senator WARREN. They were selling them or just arming themselves with them?

Gen. BETHEL. What became of the stolen property I do not know.

Senator WARREN. But they were stealing them in quantities?

Gen. BETHEL. Yes, sir; breaking boxes open and depriving the United States of them, anyway. They were sent, several of them, for five years, and when hostilities ended, and they had served some six, seven, or eight months, we reduced the punishment to one year, to what it would have been in normal times. Now I think it was perfectly proper for the courts to do as they did, and I think it was perfectly right for us to do as we did later.

Senator WARREN. Has there been a general cutting-down of the sentences since the armistice and before returning to this country?

Gen. BETHEL. Yes, sir; almost immediately after the closing of hostilities we had an officer who had spent several years on clemency work in the Judge Advocate General's Office visit the two camps at Gièvres and St. Sulpice and examine every case.

Senator WARREN. We can understand then, can we, that immediately the extreme danger was over, all of these cases have been reviewed with the idea of clemency, to get them under the common law as soon as possible?

Gen. BETHEL. As soon as hostilities were over we took steps to mitigate the sentences to peace-time standards, or even further when discipline would not suffer.

Senator WARREN. I think you said you did not know much about matters as they were in this country?

Gen. BETHEL. No.

Senator WARREN. I was tempted to ask one or two questions as to the comparative severity, whether the degree of severity was compatible with the difference in surroundings, on this side and the other; then I was about to ask whether the same principles of clemency had been exercised and carried out in this country. I ask because I do not know.

Gen. BETHEL. I think the same steps were taken to exercise clemency over here as over there. Now whether the sentences were more severe here than in the A. E. F. I do not know. I have heard from papers and in other ways of some sentences in this country that appear to be grossly excessive, and I think much more excessive than any in the A. E. F.

Senator WARREN. They were really ridiculous?

Gen. BETHEL. Yes, I think so, Senator.

Senator WARREN. Unless you object to that word "ridiculous" that I used.

Gen. BETHEL. Some were ridiculous.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. I think I agree that they were not only ridiculous but outrageous.

Gen. BETHEL. Of course there were ways to correct those sentences at once.

Senator WARREN. I assume that some of them were remedied, and I hope all of them.

Gen. BETHEL. I presume they were remedied quickly; they should have been.

Senator WARREN. One point you have not covered, either, is a matter of considerable difference between this present law and the proposed one; that is, the making up of the court by using privates and noncommissioned officers.

Gen. BETHEL. If the Senators have time, I have just marked a few things that I should be glad to speak of briefly.

Senator WARREN. We should like to hear from you on all those points, because that is our business here.

Gen. BETHEL. Shall I go ahead?

Senator WARREN. If you please.

Gen. BETHEL. Article 4 of the proposed bill proposes to place soldiers on courts along with the officers as members. I am not particularly hostile to this, but I think it is desirable that courts be as intelligent as possible and I think that the presence of soldiers on courts will render the court somewhat less intelligent, necessarily. If I felt that the soldiers in our service would feel that they were getting better justice by the presence of one or more of their comrades on the court, I would be willing to lose a little of the intelligence of the court.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. General, I believe if I were going to be tried for any crime, I would rather be tried by a jury than by lawyers and judges. They do not go into the technical side of the question. They decide on the facts.

Gen. BETHEL. I do not believe a court of soldiers would be any more lenient toward the accused. I was told by the French officers that the soldier of the court was generally more severe in his judgment than the officer.

Senator WARREN. We were told that he was a noncommissioned officer of highest rank usually.

Gen. BETHEL. I think he is, yes. I think if you were to ask the soldiers in the service, I am speaking of regular soldiers, whom I know—the members of the temporary forces can speak better as to what they would want—I do not believe that they would desire their comrades on the court at all. The soldiers of the temporary forces can speak better for themselves than I can.

Article 5 proposes to have eight members in a general court-martial. I do not believe it is desirable to have an inflexible number. The exigencies of the service are such that although we begin a trial with a certain number of men, we are liable to end with a less number. If the law required eight at all times, you would have to add a new member from time to time, even add a member after all the evidence was taken.

Senator WARREN. You mean during the trial?

Gen. BETHEL. Yes, sir. It would sometimes happen that after practically all the evidence was in you would have to have a new member to vote at the end. So I am opposed to an inflexible number. Besides, the flexible number from five to thirteen permits us to convene such number as it is practicable to have sit.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. You usually have five, do you not?

Gen. BETHEL. No, sir; the usual number is about nine. But it very frequently happened in important cases in the A. E. F., although the court would start with eight, or nine, or ten, that before the trial was over there would be only five.

The next objection I take to the articles in the bill is to article 8, which limits much more than the present law the persons who may appoint general courts-martial, and gives as a reason that to increase the number of appointing authorities is to increase the number of courts. I am in favor of just as few trials by general courts-martial as possible, but I do not believe that you would help that purpose any by putting obstacles in the way of appointment of courts. I would therefore prefer the law to remain as it is.

One very important provision that the bill has is that relating to the judge advocate and the powers that he shall have. It makes a judge advocate the presiding officer of the court, vests him with the power to decide all legal questions, and with many other powers. In other words, he becomes a judge and no longer a prosecutor.

I think it is extremely desirable to have a man learned in the law to preside in courts-martial and to decide all questions of law. It will require a good many more judge advocates, however, possibly a great many more than the person who drew this bill thought. However much we may endeavor to reduce the number of trials by general courts-martial, they are going to be necessary here and there, and in distant places, and the court-martial can not delay the trial of a case until a judge advocate can come from a long distance, or until he can get through presiding over the trial of some other case. In order that we may have prompt trials, trials that shall promptly follow the commission of the offenses, we must have a great surplus of judge advocates if we have one to preside at every general court-martial, so that I regard this proposition more as a practical question for you gentlemen in Congress as to whether you desire to increase the corps of judge advocates so much as will be necessary. The purpose of the office of judge advocate, presiding at a trial is excellent, because it will eliminate a great deal of irrelevant testimony, and I trust reduce the number of serious errors. As it is now, we have to disapprove a considerable number of cases because a serious error has been made to the prejudice of the accused, and learned judge advocates presiding at trials ought to be able to prevent that sort of thing.

Senator LENROOT. How much flexibility is there in the use of your word "prompt?"

Gen. BETHEL. It ought to be as prompt as possible; in time of war, it must be.

Senator LENROOT. What is the rule now between the commission of the offense and the finding of the court-martial? I do not mean rule, but how does it run?

Gen. BETHEL. It runs generally, I would say, from a week to a month, generally speaking.

Senator LENROOT. Generally speaking, a month would be the maximum.

Gen. BETHEL. Yes, sir. Of course, sometimes a witness becomes sick or has been sent a long distance away, and so on.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. There has been a good deal of complaint that men were held in guard houses a month, two months, or three months before trial.

Gen. BETHEL. That ought not to be, except in the most unusual case where the witnesses can not be obtained.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. And in other cases he was held a long time in the guardhouse before the court announced his decision.

Gen. BETHEL. Of course the records involving dishonorable discharge or a severe sentence now have to go to the Judge Advocate General for review; and it is impossible therefore under the present arrangement to have as prompt action as we had formerly.

Senator WARREN. Now, as to the length of time, what is the very shortest time in which a court-martial could be completed? I understand the accused has a certain time allotted him.

Gen. BETHEL. Senator, I have forgotten whether our recently enacted Article of War of 1916 provided a minimum time within which the accused should not be brought to trial. I have forgotten. We discussed it at the time. I do not know whether it was made five days or not.

Senator WARREN. I think some period is fixed. I do not know what it is.

Gen. BETHEL. I think it is a five-day period.

Senator WARREN. That is one reason why it could not be brought down less than a week. It would be a week anyway before you could proceed.

Gen. BETHEL. I certainly think an accused ought not to be required to stand an arraignment for three or four days except with his consent.

Senator WARREN. But if he consented to an immediate trial, it should be granted?

Gen. BETHEL. With his intelligent consent; yes.

Senator LENROOT. That is true in civil life.

Gen. BETHEL. I can not favor the transfer of the disciplinary power now vested in the commanding general, with his advisory judge advocate, to the judge advocate presiding at the trial, as is proposed in this bill.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. What article?

Gen. BETHEL. Article 12. When I say transfer of power, you will observe that it is provided in paragraph (g) that the judge advocate, upon conviction of the accused, shall impose a sentence upon him.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Does not that mean that he shall pronounce the sentence that the court has found?

Gen. BETHEL. Maybe it does, Senator. I thought, from my hurried reading of it, that he was sole judge as to what that sentence should be.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. It was not the intent. It is like the court passing sentence, but the verdict is by the jury.

Gen. BETHEL. Then I withdraw my objection.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Well, the context may have the interpretation that you place upon it. So you have discussed it from your viewpoint?

Gen. BETHEL. I think you are probably right, Senator.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. You see there (g) [reading]:

Announce the findings of the court-martial and upon the conviction of the accused—that is, by the court——

Gen. BETHEL. Yes.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN (continuing reading):

impose sentence upon him.

I think that would be my interpretation.

Gen. BETHEL. I did not read it that way.

With respect to article 23 of the bill, I heartily approve of giving the accused the right to two peremptory challenges before a general court and one before a special court.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Where is that; what section?

Gen. BETHEL. Article 23. I think it is very important that the accused feel that he is getting justice, and there are frequently members of the court against whom no challenge for cause can be made, but whom the accused would like to have removed from the court, as not fair-minded.

Now as to article 41, which provides a statutory requirement that the rules of evidence shall be the same as are recognized in the trial of criminal cases in the courts of the United States, I am doubtful as to whether the enactment would be beneficial. As a matter of fact, under the common law, military courts-martial observe those rules as far as they are capable now. If they were required by statute so to do, and the court were presided over by a judge advocate to enforce such requirement, I am afraid that the accused would be prevented from offering many things in his favor that courts allow him to offer now. Courts-martial are extremely liberal to the accused as to the character of the testimony that he offers. They are willing to make every sort of mistake in his favor.

Senator WARREN. You think that would lead to greater severity rather than to liberality.

Gen. BETHEL. I fear so. I see no necessity for the enactment of such a law.

With regard to article 46, I am in general accord. I have always believed that the mere majority should not be sufficient for conviction. I would go further even than the proposed article does. I would require four-fifths of the court to convict rather than two-thirds, and would make that rule of four-fifths general as to all offenses. I would not require a unanimous vote in the case of a death sentence.

Senator WARREN. Would not that be a little difficult to calculate?

Gen. BETHEL. No, sir; five is the minimum number of members. If more than one man in a court of five or if more than one man in a court of nine believes that the accused is not guilty, that the evidence is not sufficient, I would prefer to see the man acquitted.

Senator WARREN. Now, if you have seven or eight, and you take four-fifths of that, you would have one man where perhaps you wanted two in that number. How would you figure if you had seven or eight men?

Gen. BETHEL. If seven men sat on the court, and two of them voted not guilty, the man would be acquitted.

Senator WARREN. You do not confine it to four-fifths, then?

Gen. BETHEL. My rule would be that four-fifths of the members must concur in the finding of guilty. Then if there are seven members of the court——

Senator WARREN. Just what is four-fifths of seven?

Gen. BETHEL. It is between five and six, and therefore you must have six. In a seven-member court you must have six.

Senator WARREN. I believe the testimony before us is all the way from a majority to your figure of four-fifths, three-fourths, and two-thirds.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. What is the next one?

Gen. BETHEL. Well, article 49 of course brings up the matter that we were discussing an hour or two ago. Article 49 of the bill provides that no sentence of death shall be carried into execution until approved upon review and in addition confirmed by the President. In other words, it takes from the commanding general of the armies in the field the power that he has always had, I believe, under the law, to carry a death sentence into effect for certain specified offenses. I am not favorable to the change that is here proposed, although my views may be very much affected by the fact that I have just been through an experience where I have had the responsibility of determining in large part these things myself, and I feel that, with the very able assistance I had at the general headquarters of the American Expeditionary Forces, the power to determine whether a death sentence should be carried into effect was not abused and will not be abused under like circumstances in the future. I think it is especially important, where our army is operating in a foreign hostile territory and where there may be guerrillas and other outlaws, that an example and an early example be made of such offenses, and that there would be a great delay if the records had to be forwarded to Washington for review by a court of appeals and a determination by the President.

Senator WARREN. I was just about to ask this: It is perfectly evident, it seems to me, from consideration of this subject, that you have got to have a different line of conduct permissible at the front in time of war from that permissible at home, or in peace time.

Gen. BETHEL. Yes, sir.

Senator WARREN. Now, that being the case, would you have two laws, one for peace and one for war, or one law with alternative provisions?

Gen. BETHEL. That is what we have now, Senator.

Senator WARREN. Or would you have one with different regulations?

Gen. BETHEL. We really have two laws now with respect to the death penalty—one for war and one for peace. In peace time no person but the President can order the execution of a death sentence.

Senator WARREN. That brings up the query again whether questions might not require different treatment at the front than elsewhere, not with the same emphasis, of course, as the death sentence.

Gen. BETHEL. I think I have expressed my views on the main changes which the bill provides. Among the minor changes I know that there are some that I am not in favor of, and there are others that I heartily favor, but I doubt whether it is advisable now for me to say anything about them. I should want, if I were going to express a mature opinion on the merits of this bill, to make a much more complete study of it than I have been able to do in the last two or three days.

Senator WARREN. The committee has been much pleased with your willingness to come and give us the suggestions you have.

Gen. BETHEL. There are two other officers who served in France and who have seen as long service as I have in the Judge Advocate General's Department—Col. Hull and Col. Morrow. They have had more experience in court-martial matters than any other officers in the Judge Advocate General's Department. They are at the War College.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Let us have them come up.

Senator WARREN. When we get along to it.

Gen. BETHEL. I wish you could also have Col. Winship, who is now in France. You should have him as well as the other two officers of whom I spoke, were it possible.

Senator WARREN. We are greatly obliged to you, and if we should wish to call you again, you may be able to come?

Gen. BETHEL. Yes, sir; I would feel honored.

Senator WARREN. Before the committee adjourns, I should like to present, for printing in the record, a letter addressed to me by Senator Johnson, of South Dakota, and the memorandum it refers to.

(The letter and memorandum are as follows:)

UNITED STATES SENATE,
Washington D. C., September 24, 1919.

Hon. FRANCIS E. WARREN,

United States Senate.

DEAR SENATOR: I inclose herewith for the consideration of the subcommittee of the Committee on Military Affairs, of which you are the chairman, memorandum containing the views of Mr. Lewis W. Bicknell, of Webster, S. Dak., formerly a major in the Infantry arm of the service, with reference to the procedure in the conduct of courts-martial and submission of evidence before military efficiency boards.

If it can consistently be done, I recommend that this memorandum be incorporated in the record of the hearings on the question of making certain amendments to the Articles of War relating to above subjects, which I understand is now pending before your subcommittee. Thanking you for your attention, I remain,

Yours, very truly,

ED. S. JOHNSON.

MEMORANDUM TO THE HON. EDWIN S. JOHNSON, UNITED STATES SENATE, IN RE COURTS-MARTIAL AND MILITARY BOARDS TO DETERMINE FITNESS OF OFFICERS.

1. The court-martial as an instrument, of justice.—A perusal of the provisions of the "Manual for Courts-Martial," issued in 1917 by the War Department, which is the authority for the administration of the affairs of military tribunals in the Army of the United States, leads to the certain conclusion that the court-martial, therein provided for, is set up primarily as an instrument of justice for the purpose of affording military persons who are accused of offenses cognizable by a military tribunal a fair trial. Thus, paragraph 98 directs that "the trial judge advocate should do his utmost to present the whole truth of the matter in question. He should oppose every attempt to suppress facts, or distort them, to the end that the evidence may so exhibit the case that the court may render impartial justice." Challenges are provided to eliminate prejudiced members of the court. (See Sec. I, Cr. VIII.) The court swear (par. 132) "well and truly to try and determine, according to the evidence, the matter now before" them, and to "administer justice, without partiality, favor, or affection," and in paragraph 198 and succeeding paragraphs, an effort is made to set out the rules of evidence, which govern military trials, under authority of the act of Congress, approved August 29, 1916 (A. W. 38). These rules follow those known to the common law, and observed by the civil courts. Section II, Chapter XII, relating to findings, furthers this idea. Paragraph 294 directs that the members must base their votes upon, and be governed by "the testimony of the case, considered with the plea." They must be satisfied of the guilt of the accused "beyond a reasonable doubt" (par. 296).

I have emphasized this proposition, of the nature of military tribunals, for the reason that every criticism of the present system of courts-martial, whether directed to the fundamental idea that the military tribunal should not be subject to the interference of the appointing authority, or merely to matters of procedure, is met by the response that a court-martial is an instrument of discipline, and that the officer having authority to convene the court, being responsible for the discipline of the soldiers of his brigade, division, department, or whatever may be his military subdivision, must needs have control of the administration of "military justice" within such subdivision. This theory has been responsible for much that has led to criticism. Acting under it, commanding generals of divisions and higher units have not hesitated to return findings of "not guilty" for reconsideration, even going so far as to demand a contrary finding, although such a course has never been sanctioned. I believe, by the Judge Advocate General; nor have they hesitated to make officers of a court who refused to comply with these directions for a change of their decision feel the weight of their displeasure. It is well enough to urge in answer to this last suggestion that the ban of secrecy in voting protects the individual, and that in any event his action can not be made the occasion of official rebuke; promotions can be withheld or recommendations therefore disapproved, and in innumerable other ways the offending officers may be made to know that their action, while pleasing to their consciences, perhaps, under their oaths, was not pleasing to the general who convened the court. Not only might these things happen—I confidently assert that they did happen.

Consider, in passing, the utter impropriety of this attitude—that is, that the court is merely an instrument of discipline—the creature of the commanding general. Appellate courts, without exception, refuse to disturb findings of disputed issues of fact, holding that the trial court, which saw and heard the witness, or witnesses, is in a far better position to determine which witness told the truth, and what evidence is credible, than the judges of the supreme or appellate court, whose impression must be gathered from the transcript of the evidence, or an abstract of the evidence printed in the appellant's brief. Yet, if this position is to be sustained, the general of a division, or department, or army, or his judge advocate, are better qualified to determine the guilt or innocence of an accused soldier than a court, sworn to try him, who heard the evidence, saw the demeanor of the witnesses, and, under their oaths, returned such decision as their consciences could justify. I am convinced that courts-martial will only be true instruments of discipline when they are so conducted and their decisions are so safeguarded as to commend them to the consciences alike of those subject to their jurisdiction and the public, and that at present they commend themselves to neither. In the following paragraphs I propose to discuss certain particulars wherein the present system fails as an instrument of justice.

2. Too great power is vested in the appointing authority.—Under the present system of courts-martial, the officer having power to appoint a court-martial also has the power to do the following things with reference to the trial of any person subject to military law: (a) Name the members of the court; (b) select the trial judge advocate; (c) pass upon the "reasonable availability" of an officer whose service the accused may desire as counsel; (d) order the arrest and trial of a person subject to military law; (e) review the proceedings of the trial of such person; (f) order the reconsideration of the proceedings, especially of the sentence: (g) approve or disapprove the findings, sentence, or proceedings.

Before discussing the relation of these several functions to the proceedings of the court itself, I desire to trace, briefly, the procedure from the initiatory stages of a charge to the time it ripens into a trial. An examination of the records of the Judge Advocate General's department should disclose that by no means all of the cases which have been tried by courts-martial have been occasioned by the commission of some offense of so notorious a character as to attract public comment. On the contrary, a very large proportion of the cases arise from infractions of orders or breaches of discipline which are known only to a few persons—those intimately concerned in the case. The commission of a grave offense would, of course, be followed by the arrest of the offender, and the filing of charges. The commission of some infraction of orders or discipline would likewise be followed by the placing of the offender in arrest, and the filing of charges by the officer having knowledge of the irregularity. But not infrequently arrests are made by direct orders of the division or higher headquarters. Each division has its inspector, who is responsible for the investigation of alleged irregularities, has authority to examine witnesses, and from time to time, as occasion demanded, this officer would place in arrest persons subject to military law whose irregularities were disclosed by his efforts. And supplementary to his office, in some places at least, there have been organized "intelligence services," which were even carried to the length of having at least one man in every company who was required to report, over the head of his commanding officer and not through military channels of correspondence, any matter which in his estimation would justify investigation. The effect of this arrangement on the morale of the officers of an organization may be imagined.

An official investigation made by an officer who is disinterested is in all cases required after charges have been drawn and before a trial is ordered. This officer forwards the charges, with the statements of material witnesses and his recommendation, to the officer directing the investigation, who in turn is responsible that the charges are sent to the proper officer for further action, his own action in the premises depending upon the nature of the charges, his own authority, and the nature of the recommendation. In the cases mentioned above, where, in fact, an investigation was made before the arrest or before any charges were preferred, the formal investigation would be indeed a formal matter made by the inspector himself.

In all cases where a trial by general court-martial is to ensue, the charges are examined by the organization judge advocate. Unless he approves, the case does not go forward. It follows, then, that in every case before the trial has begun the evidence has at least been partly examined, and the representative of the appointing authority, usually the very officer to whom that authority will look for legal advice in the review of the proceeding, has expressed an opinion as to the sufficiency of the preliminary proceedings to justify a trial. Here should be noted a very important distinction between the functioning of this preliminary investigation and the functioning of the grand jury or committing magistrate in the civil courts, to which it may be likened. Once the grand jury or the committee magistrate has bound an accused over for trial, their connection with the case ceases, but in the military courts the very authority which orders or advises trial is the same authority which will eventually review the proceedings. From this circumstance it results that no distinction is made between finding enough evidence unexplained to justify a trial and seeking enough evidence in the record of the trial to justify a conviction. The attitude of the reviewing authority, speaking through his legal adviser, is apt to find expression in the mere reiteration of the opinion formed before the trial at the time it was ordered, brushing aside any offered explanation as wholly immaterial. Nor should we lose sight of the fact that the same man both orders the trial and reviews the proceedings.

Returning now to the relation of the functions of the appointing authority to the trial itself: It is necessary to preface my criticism with the statement that, given a fair appointing officer, a court composed of experienced, capable officers, and a trial judge advocate, and counsel for the accused, who have sufficient legal knowledge to try the case ably, the court-martial provides a speedy, fair, and effective instrument of justice, provided it is allowed to function as such. Unfortunately, all but the first of these necessary elements are frequently lacking, and at times the fairness of the appointing authority may be at least open to question.

Any instrument provided by men in authority to deal with the lives, or personal liberties, of men accused with offenses, should inherently exhibit and possess a high degree of independence of action, just as those elements which are capable of bringing about a miscarriage of justice should be eliminated, so far as possible. In the suppositions which follow I am not pretending to deal with cases which have happened—though I have reason to believe that I shall approximately state some actual situations—but my purpose is to show what may happen in the selection of a court, and its trial of persons subject to its jurisdiction.

(a) The appointing authority names the members of the court.—Suppose that Maj. A., a division judge advocate, has at the suggestion of the division inspector made an investigation which satisfies him that Capt. B. is guilty of an offense; he is on bad terms with Capt. B. and names a court of officers who are his friends, to one or more of whom he states that he hopes to see a conviction and severe sentence. He adds that the general feels the same way about it. Can the accused have a fair trial? How can he reach the hidden bias against him?

(b) (c) He selects the trial judge advocate, and passes upon the availability of the request of accused for counsel.—It might not be open to criticism, but suppose the appointing authority has reason to believe that the only person who could adequately present the defense in a given case is Maj. ———, and, greatly desiring a conviction in that case, renders him unavailable for the defense by appointing him special trial judge advocate. Or, suppose that Pvt. D, accused of a serious crime, demands the assistance of Lieut. E. The appointing authority can inform him that this officer is not reasonably available. Further, he may suggest the name of another officer who is available. I once was approached by a division judge advocate, who asked me to suggest to an accused—I was trial judge advocate of a general court-martial at the time—that I could procure counsel for him, and he added, "If he agrees, we'll get Lieut. ———. He will stick him if you don't." I may add that I refused this assistance, and convicted my man over the efforts of counsel of his own choosing.

(d) The appointing authority orders the trial of the accused.—In many instances, as I have shown above, he knows in advance that there is going to be a trial, and has formed a strong personal conviction that the person to be accused is guilty, and an equally strong desire to see the imposition of a severe sentence. With this in mind, he might choose his court carefully, and having thus prepared the way he may order the accused arrested, direct that charges under whatever article of war is appropriate be filed, and bring the matter speedily to trial. He can not, of course, force the trial within the limits fixed by the manual for courts-martial—but he can get ready before the proceeding is started. The accused can not. If he is guilty, it may not matter. Suppose he is unjustly accused?

(e) The appointing authority reviews the proceedings.—I have previously discussed the effect of the preliminary investigation upon the mind of the officer charged with the review of the proceedings had upon the trial of a person subject to military law. Practically, there is no appeal; instead every proceeding is reviewed before the sentence or finding is promulgated. As this takes the place of an appeal, and is the final step in the whole matter at which the rights of the accused are to be considered, it is essential that the review be thorough, fair, and unprejudiced. Here again the distinction between the court as an instrument of justice, and the court as an instrument of discipline, as that word is unfortunately misused in most military organizations, presents itself. As the appointing authority of an instrument of justice, the reviewing officer might reasonably be expected to review the trial record with the rights of the accused prominently in mind. Suppose he had, at the time of ordering the trial, a strong impression that the accused was guilty. Is he more likely to look for corroboration of this impression, or for an explanation compatible with the idea of the innocence of the accused? Suppose the grand jury which returns the indictment, or the head of the detective agency which looked up what was alleged to be the evidence, or the prosecuting officer, in our civil tribunals, were the duly constituted appellate bodies? Yet where is the material difference? Your grand jury, and your prosecuting attorney are all supposed to be men of the highest order. So is your general officer. Yet if it does not work out of the army, why should it in the army?

(f) He may order reconsideration of the proceedings and findings.—I do not understand this to mean that a new trial may be ordered, or even that additional evidence may be taken; but the reviewing officer may order a finding or a sentence reconsidered. Suppose he, or his legal adviser, either by reason of ill will toward the accused, or from any other motive, commendable or otherwise, desires to see a conviction. It is certainly not unknown, though I think it is clearly unlawful, for the reviewing officer to return a record with a finding of "not guilty" with criticism, and a suggestion that the evidence required a judgment of conviction; and it is the practice, if a sentence is deemed inadequate, to return the proceedings with the admonition that a severer sentence should be imposed. If this is to be tolerated, why swear a court to try the case, and do justice? If the reviewing officer is to pass upon these matters with final authority, why have the court or the trial at all? If the reviewing officer, either through malice or mistake, believes a perfectly innocent man to be guilty of a serious offense, he can, under our system of courts-martial, come very near to depriving that man of his liberty and his reputation—indeed, in time of war, of his very life.

(g) He approves the sentence, findings, or proceedings.—Finally, the appointing authority has the power, except in cases where dishonorable discharge of enlisted men, or in the event of the conviction of an officer, to approve the sentence, and order its execution. Matters involving dishonorable discharge are customarily sent to Washington for final consideration—but this has been avoided in many cases by ordering the execution of the other part of the sentence at once, and deferring that portion involving dishonorable discharge until the execution of the balance of the sentence. This works nicely in the matter of a sentence for life imprisonment, for example.

I have indicated in a few general statements the possibilities of injustice under the present system, but I have by no means exhausted the possible contingencies which are presented by the focus of all of these several and frequently inconsistent powers in one person or office. The wholesale convictions of American citizens and the impositions by military courts of grossly excessive sentences, which were so frequent as to be a matter of common scandal; the wretchedly presented defenses; the shocking abuses in the treatment of military prisoners, all bear abundant testimony of the indifference of the high officers of the army to the rights of the individuals composing the army, as well as their wholly incorrect attitude toward a soldier accused of an offense.

On this last point another matter deserves mention. So far as my observation as an officer of the Army went, no effort is made to make a distinction between soldiers detained awaiting trial, and those convicted and undergoing sentence. All were lodged in the same guardhouse or stockade, and all were subjected to the same degrading hard labor; all were sent about under guard, in the presence of their comrades in their own organizations. Well enough, no doubt, if all were guilty. But how about those who are unjustly accused? What sort of soldiers will they be, after undergoing such treatment?

The several simple cases suggested in the preceding paragraphs, while presenting exaggerated complaints against the system, by no means exhaust the possibilities for error, injustice, undue influence, or the invasion of the rights of an accused by the excessive zeal of the officer who is charged with the enforcement of discipline, and vested with authority to order trials by court-martial. It is a matter of common knowledge, for example, that in some divisions organized during the war with Germany, sentences were uniformly excessive—and investigation would disclose the demand on its courts that this sort of sentence be imposed, by the division commander, or some one empowered to speak for him. And, at the risk of repetition, I can not refrain from suggesting the impropriety of a review of a proceeding by the very authority which caused the prosecution to be commenced. It is not enough to point out the great reliability of the officers discharging this duty. Granting that they are all that is claimed for them, they are being permitted to exercise a power over trials by military tribunals which experience has taught us can not be allowed to men of equal dignity, honor, and probity in civil offices. I am convinced that so long as they are allowed this power, abuses in courts-martial will continue.

3. There is no adequate provision for retrial, in case of mistrial.—Under paragraph 149, subdivision 3 (a), (b), (c), (d), and (e), it is provided that no person convicted or acquitted by a court-martial may be tried twice for the same offense. Among those situations specified as not constituting a "trial" within the meaning of this paragraph, is the reservation "where, for any cause, without fault of the prosecution, there was a mistrial." I can not see how the inference is to be avoided that, if the "mistrial" is the result of a "fault of the prosecution," there could not be another trial, however plain the case against the accused. So, if a soldier be accused of a felony, and on his trial the trial judge advocate, not being learned in the law, seek to convict him with illegal testimony, and the record, on reaching the reviewing authority, disclose such errors that it can not be approved, it will follow that this man can not be again tried, with the result that he escapes all punishment for his misdeed. I have had personal knowledge of such disposition of cases involving capital offenses, as well as lesser crimes; and have known of numerous instances where a sentence which was wholly inadequate had to be approved because the record was in such shape that no further proceedings could be had.

Under similar circumstances in criminal prosecutions before the civil tribunals, if indeed it appear upon review that there has been a mistrial, the accused does not escape, but is held for a retrial in order that his rights may be fully protected and the conviction secured, if any be secured, may be based upon lawful evidence, taken in a proceeding lawfully conducted throughout.

It should not prove difficult to remedy the present procedure in this respect, so that this most serious defect might be removed, and justice be thereby made more certain.

4. Injustices due to lack of authority for the procedure of "Efficiency boards."—During the period of military preparation incident to the war with Germany, it was necessary to consider the conduct, character, efficiency, and professional fitness of many of the officers, both temporary and permanent, in the army—the question in the case of the permanent officer being usually only whether he was fitted for the duties of the temporary rank he was holding, while in the case of the temporary officer the matter to be decided was frequently whether he should be dismissed from the service.

Under the authority of standing orders from the War Department divisional and other commanders established boards for this purpose, and ordered officers before them.

As late as September, 1918, there were not in existence any prescribed rules of procedure for such boards; neither were there rules relating to evidence, review, hearsay testimony, sufficiency of the showing required, receiving and considering testimony in the absence of the officer under investigation. Necessarily, the authority conferred in these matters was very great; and it was important, above all else, that all inefficient officers be eliminated, lest their inefficiency cause unnecessary loss of life in the zone of active operations; but an instant's reflection will show the very great danger incident to the exercise of this authority, and the necessity for every possible safeguard against injustice, the gratification of personal malice, the elimination of officers, to make vacancies for the promotion of others, and the employment of this means of securing the dismissal of officers where the charges would not have been sufficient for proceedings before a court-martial.

In the Thirty-fourth Division, in which I served before going overseas, I observed the following instances of the misuse of this power (i. e., to order officers before a board). At the hearing in the case of one Behr, a colonel of Artillery, a junior officer, a lieutenant, who discharged the rather discreditable duties of espionage officer (he was called "intelligence officer," but his business was to gather data on the conduct of officers of the division, by means of operatives distributed throughout the division), was called, asked if he had made an investigation as to whether Col. Behr was guilty of certain charges, and over objection insistently urged, was permitted to state his conclusion as to whether the officer in question was guilty. In the same case the board refused to compel this lieutenant to disclose the names of his witnesses for examination in the presence of Col. Behr. Later, during the hearing of the same matter, it appeared from letters introduced in evidence that the proceeding was initiated to make room for another officer as commanding officer of the One hundred and twenty-seventh Field Artillery. On such evidence Col. Behr's dismissal was recommended and secured.

An officer named Brome was promoted from captain to major, on recommendation of division headquarters. He was assigned to the military police. Two months later he was put before a board by the same headquarters, and his dismissal secured. In a published statement after leaving the service he intimated that he, as an officer of military police, had interfered with the pleasures of certain staff officers, to his subsequent misfortune.

At the hearing of the matter of Lieut. Col. Hollingsworth, One hundred and thirty-fourth Infantry, before a board of officers at Camp Dix, when an objection to some hearsay testimony was urged the president of the board, Col. Downing. One hundred and ninth Engineers, stated that no objections were to be considered; that the officer under investigation was only present by courtesy, and that other evidence could be and would be received and considered in his absence.

At hearings in the cases of numerous other officers, all that was received by way of evidence against them was the statement of their immediate commanding officers to the effect that in the opinion of such officer the officer under investigation "was incompetent to discharge the duties of his office," or that he did not properly perform interior guard duty, or that he was deficient in close-order drill. Upon such showing these officers were dismissed.

In the case of Lieut. Col. Hollingsworth, mentioned above, the division inspector made an investigation and reported that he did not find enough evidence to justify a court-martial trial, but recommended that the officer be gotten rid of before a board.

I appeared as counsel in a number of the cases I have mentioned, and write of them with intimate knowledge of what was done. I state unhesitatingly that the system of eliminating officers which was employed made every form of injustice, every desire to play favoritism, every kind of petty tyranny a thing easy of accomplishment and in many instances these things were accomplished.

Consider, now, this situation with reference to the objections I have previously urged to the system of courts-martial. Here was an added means for a commanding general to employ in getting military tribunals to register his views in a given case—for it was easy to put members of a court before a board, make formal charges of inefficiency, and get the officers out of the service—and let others profit by the example. And, as I have suggested, if the trial by court-martial failed, the efficiency board was always available. In one instance, I defended an officer—and I believe successfully—against charges which would have resulted in dismissal if sustained. Pending the trial he was put before a board, and discharged for the good of the service.

5. The remedy suggested.—With reference to the matter discussed under the subtitle No. 3 above, the remedy is suggested at the conclusion of the discussion of that item.

In the matter of the too great authority of the officers having power to appoint courts-martial, it seems that this ought not to be difficult to correct. If a board of review, wholly independent of the appointing authority, and possessing final authority to approve or disapprove proceedings, subject to such reservations in capital and other important cases as the Secretary of War might see fit to make, be established, in every military department in time of peace, with such additional personnel detailed as the greater activity of war organization might demand, and all proceedings be referred to such boards for final action or recommendation, the greatest objection to the present system would be removed. The board might properly be made up wholly of military persons, of suitable rank, and experience. The argument that such a board would lessen the power of the commanding general of a tactical unit to maintain discipline does not possess much weight, if we recall that the commanding general would still have the power to order the arrest and trial of all persons under him, and would only be deprived of the right to review and approve the findings.

In making up the courts-martial, it would be a very great improvement if the court be selected by lot, from the lists of eligible officers, and this course would eliminate another possible abuse of power.

The inefficiency and inexperience of trial judge advocates and counsel for the defense might well be corrected by provision for the permanent detailing of officers possessing the necessary qualifications, for duty with the courts-martial, thus providing men of experience both for the court and the accused, who, however, should have the privilege of securing other counsel if he so elect.

The accused, before his conviction, should not be detained in the same place with, and subject to the same treatment as, men already convicted and serving sentence. Not only is such a course manifestly unfair, in the case of one wrongfully accused, but it has a most detrimental effect upon the discipline of the soldier who is unjustly detained, and tends to bring the whole system of military justice into discredit with the very persons who should hold it in highest respect.

Provision should be made that the commanding officer having power to appoint the court-martial be notified at once of the result of the trial, with the privilege of forwarding to the reviewing board his reasons, if any, for asking that the case be disapproved, reconsidered, or retried, and the board should be required to give due consideration to his expression, their final action to be governed by all of the evidence and circumstances in the case.

Owing to the inherent possibilities of oppression, injustice, and injury to the reputation of officers called before such boards, in the operation of efficiency boards, these boards should be provided for in a special article of war, which should plainly prescribe the procedure, proof required, and reasons justifying a hearing concerning any officer; and these boards, so constituted, should be invested with the same dignity as a military court, with record of their proceedings, and proper processes of review. In no other way can many gross injustices be avoided.

ESTABLISHMENT OF MILITARY JUSTICE—PROPOSED AMENDMENT OF THE ARTICLES OF WAR.

FRIDAY, SEPTEMBER 26, 1919.

UNITED STATES SENATE,
SURCOMMITTEE ON MILITARY AFFAIRS.

The subcommittee met, pursuant to adjournment, in the room of the Committee on Appropriations, at 2.30 o'clock p. m., Senator Francis E. Warren presiding.

Present, Senators Warren (chairman), Lenroot, and Chamberlain.

STATEMENT OF LIEUT. COL. W. C. RIGBY—Resumed.

Senator WARREN. You may proceed, Colonel.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. I was asked yesterday to put into the record statistics concerning the restoration to the colors of men from the disciplinary barracks. These statistics we do not have complete in the office. They have been telegraphed for, and we can get them in time, so that if desired we can put them in my testimony when it is being written up.

Senator WARREN. At the proper place, where we made the inquiry?

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. Yes, sir.

Senator WARREN. Very well.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. And the same thing is true also of the statistics that were desired as to the recommendations of the Judge Advocate General. Those statistics were made up one time last winter for one year during the war, but we can have them ready to insert in the same way covering the entire period of the war.

As to the form of the French trial, it occurred to me that the quickest way perhaps to put that before the committee would be to write out the form of an actual trial as it would take place in a French court, and for the purpose of comparison I took the testimony of the record in the Ledoyen case, one of the cases spoken of as the "four French death cases." That is already in your record, I think. I turned that into the form of a proceeding in a French court in the armies on active service.

Senator WARREN. That would be not as to what judgments the judges would give, but as to the modus operandi.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. The complete showing on it, making it with the same judgment that our judges gave, but the complete showing.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Why did you not take an actual French case?

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. Simply in order to get the absolute comparison. I could put in also, if desired, the record of some actual French cases which I attended, and of which we got stenographic reports.

Senator WARREN. Would you like to have one of these?

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. I do not care.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. If desired, I would be glad to put that in.

(The form of record of trial prepared by Lieut. Col. Rigby, referred to, is here printed in the record as follows:)

MEMORANDUM SHOWING THE COURSE OF PROCEDURE IN THE FRENCH CONSEIL DE GUERRE IN THE ARMIES ON ACTIVE SERVICE; ASSUMING THE TRIAL OF A CASE LIKE THAT OF PRIVATE OLEN LEDOYEN, C. M. No. 110751.

1. The accused, Private Olen Ledoyen, is charged with disobedience, the morning of December 14, 1914, of an order from First Lieut. Fred M. Logan to get his equipment and fall in for drill, in France, in the zone of operations at the front near the front lines in time of war. We will assume that this happened in a French organization.

2. The offense occurred at 8 o'clock in the morning, December 14. Ledoyen is immediately placed in arrest. Lieut. Logan telephones the company commander and the latter telephones the colonel, who directs the captain to investigate the circumstances and report. During the forenoon the captain procures written statements about the occurrence from Lieut. Logan and from a sergeant and a corporal who were present. He also has another lieutenant interview the accused in the guard house. The accused is sharply cross-questioned and is not warned of his right to refuse to answer. (Technically he has that right, but in practice really not.) The accused admits that he received the order from Lieut. Logan and that he did not obey it; that he refused to obey; says that the lieutenant "had us out on the hill yesterday, and we nearly froze to death, and this morning I was so stiff that I could not drill."

The captain sends the statement to the colonel about 1 o'clock with a memorandum that the accused has already been punished four times (by summary disciplinary punishment, not put on his service record) for failing to appear for drill at the appointed time and for disobedience of orders. The colonel receives the papers in the course of the next half hour and forwards them to the division headquarters through channels. They arrive by 3 o'clock and are referred to the chief of the section of military justice, immediately examined and an order prepared for the signature of the commanding general referring the case for trial by "direct order" (under section 156 of the code) without any formal investigation. The general signs the order directing trial at 5 o'clock the same afternoon before a special court-martial (emergency war court) under the presidential decree of September 6, 1914. The court is composed of a major, a first lieutenant, and a regimental sergeant major. The major is president of the court. A captain is appointed "commissaire" (judge advocate), and a young lawyer who is a private soldier is appointed counsel for the accused, by the same order referring the case to trial. The accused is immediately notified and served with a copy of the order, which contains the charges against him, and is advised of the appointment of his counsel and asked whether he desires to choose any other counsel for himself. He says no; he does not know anyone else whom he wants as counsel; and he is given an opportunity to talk the case over with his counsel.

3. Promptly at 5 o'clock the court convenes. At one end of the room is a high bench for the judges, at their left hand is a desk for the commissaire, in front are a few benches, behind that a rail partly across the room, and behind that half a dozen benches and a small open space. At the rear of the room eight soldiers are drawn up at attention with fixed bayonets. The court file in, wearing side arms, and take their seats. The commissaire takes his seat and the greffier (clerk of the court) is seated at a little desk at the right hand of the court. A noncommissioned officer is in charge of the guard of soldiers and another noncommissioned officer is at the door.

4. The procedure is as follows:

PRESIDENT. The court is open. Guard, bring in the prisoner.

(The prisoner is brought in under guard of two soldiers and is seated between them on a bench in front of the court; his guards have their bayonets fixed. His counsel, wearing an advocate's robe over his private soldier's uniform, is seated on the first bench behind the rail—not inside the rail.)

PRESIDENT. Clerk, read the order convening the court and appointing the judges.

(The clerk reads the convening order.)

PRESIDENT. Accused, stand up. What is your surname—your first name?

ACCUSED. Olen Ledoyen.

PRESIDENT. Your age?

ACCUSED. 19 years.

PRESIDENT. Where were you born?

ACCUSED. Marseilles.

PRESIDENT. Are you married?

ACCUSED. No.

PRESIDENT. Your business?

ACCUSED. Mechanic.

PRESIDENT. Where was your last home?

ACCUSED. Marseilles.

PRESIDENT. Your rank?

ACCUSED. Private.

PRESIDENT. Your regiment?

ACCUSED. 111th (French) Infantry.

PRESIDENT. Sit down. Mr. Clerk, read the order referring the case for trial and the names of the witnesses.

(The clerk reads the order referring the case for trial, and the names of the witnesses, and then says:)

CLERK. The only witness called by the commissaire is Lieut. Sidney M. Logan.

PRESIDENT. Guard, see that the witness retires.

(Lieut. Logan, who has been sitting in the rear of the room, retires.)

PRESIDENT. Mr. Clerk, read the report of the rapporteur.

CLERK. There is no report from the rapporteur, the case being here under a direct order from the general. The report of the company commander is here.

(He then reads the report of the company commander with the statements of the lieutenant, the sergeant, the corporal, and the accused's own statement.)

PRESIDENT. Ledoyen, stand up. [Accused rises.] It appears from these papers that you are charged with disobeying an order to drill given to you by First Lieut. Logan, your superior officer, at 8 o'clock this morning. The law gives you the right to say anything which you consider useful for your defense. [Turning to accused's counsel.] I also warn you, Mr. Counsel, that nothing is to be said against your conscience nor against the respect due to the laws and that you must express yourself with decency and moderation. [Turning again to accused.] Ledoyen, you heard and understood the order given you by Lieut. Logan, did you not, and you knew that he was your superior officer, and that it was your duty to obey his orders?

ACCUSED. Yes, sir.

PRESIDENT. And you did not obey the order? You refused and stated that you refused?

ACCUSED. Yes, sir.

PRESIDENT. You were ordered to get your pack ready and get ready for drill with your squad?

ACCUSED. Yes, sir.

PRESIDENT. And Lieut. Logan gave you this order personally?

ACCUSED. Yes, sir.

PRESIDENT. Did you tell the lieutenant any reason why you refused to go to drill?

ACCUSED. No, sir.

PRESIDENT. The lieutenant repeated the order to you and you still refused, and then you were ordered under arrest?

ACCUSED. Yes, sir.

PRESIDENT (turning to commissaire). Mr. Commissaire Rapporteur, have you any questions to ask the accused?

COMMISSAIRE. No, Mr. President.

PRESIDENT (turning to the counsel for the accused). Mr. Counsel, have you any explanations to give or observations to offer?

ACCUSED'S COUNSEL. I have a few questions which I respectfully request the President to put to the accused.

PRESIDENT. State your questions.

ACCUSED'S COUNSEL. Please ask the accused why he was not willing to go to drill this morning.

PRESIDENT (to accused). You may answer that question.

ACCUSED. Lieut. Logan had us out on the hill yesterday, and we nearly froze to death; and this morning I was so stiff I could not drill.

PRESIDENT (to accused's counsel). Have you any further questions, Mr. Counsel?

ACCUSED'S COUNSEL. No, Mr. President.

PRESIDENT (to accused). You were able to walk this morning?

ACCUSED. Yes, sir.

PRESIDENT. You had not reported yourself on sick call?

ACCUSED. No, sir.

PRESIDENT. You did not give Lieut. Logan any reason for your refusal to obey the order?

ACCUSED. No, sir.

PRESIDENT (turning to commissaire). Mr. Commissaire Rapporteur, have you any further questions?

COMMISSAIRE. No, Mr. President.

PRESIDENT (turning to counsel for accused). Mr. Counsel, have you any further questions or any explanations to give or observations to make?

ACCUSED'S COUNSEL. No, Mr. President.

PRESIDENT (addressing his fellow judges). Gentlemen of the court, have you any questions to ask the accused?

(Both judges shake their heads.)

PRESIDENT. Ledoyen, sit down. [Addressing the guard.] Guard, have the witness, Lieut. Logan, come in.

(Lieut. Logan enters the court room, walks up to the railing, and stands facing the court.)

PRESIDENT. Raise your right hand. [Lieut. Logan raises his right hand.] You swear to speak without hatred and without fear, to tell the whole truth and nothing but the truth? Say, "I swear it."

Lieut. LOGAN. I swear it.

PRESIDENT. Put down your hand.

(Lieut. Logan lowers his hand.)

PRESIDENT. What are your surname and first name?

Lieut. LOGAN. Logan, Sidney M.

PRESIDENT. Your age?

Lieut. LOGAN. Twenty-six years.

PRESIDENT. Your rank?

Lieut. LOGAN. First Lieutenant.

PRESIDENT. Your regiment?

Lieut. LOGAN. One hundred and eleventh Infantry (French).

PRESIDENT. Do you see the accused?

Lieut. LOGAN. Yes, Mr. President.

PRESIDENT. Did you know him before the occurrences with which he is charged?

Lieut. LOGAN. Yes, Mr. President.

PRESIDENT. Are you related to him in any way, by blood or marriage?

Lieut. LOGAN. No, Mr. President.

PRESIDENT. You have never been in his service, nor he in yours?

Lieut. LOGAN. No, Mr. President.

PRESIDENT. Give your testimony.

Lieut. LOGAN. This morning, about 8 o'clock, I gave the accused, Olen Ledoyen, an order to get his pack and get ready for drill with his squad. He did not obey that order. He refused and stated that he refused. He did not state any reason why he would not obey. He did it willfully and was warned at the time. I gave him the order in person, and he did not say anything as to why he disobeyed. He just said that he would not go to drill. I then told him of the consequences of such an act and gave him another opportunity to go get his pack and drill, and he again refused, saying, "I refuse to go to drill." I warned him of the consequences of his act.

PRESIDENT. State as nearly as you can remember, the exact words that you used in warning accused of the consequences of his act.

Lieut. LOGAN. I told him that he was making himself liable to trial by a court which might impose a very heavy penalty. There were four who first refused to go to drill, and two reconsidered and went to drill later. I asked the accused if he understood what he was doing, and he and Pvt. Fishback refused to go to drill.

PRESIDENT. Did the accused know that the court might impose a death penalty for his act?

Lieut. LOGAN. I think not; I do not believe that I told him that.

PRESIDENT. You stated a heavy sentence?

Lieut. LOGAN. Yes, sir.

PRESIDENT. Did the accused offer any reason as to why he refused to drill?

Lieut. LOGAN. No, sir.

PRESIDENT. Was it simply a positive flat refusal with no excuses?

Lieut. LOGAN. Yes, sir.

PRESIDENT. Is it of the accused, here present in court, that you have been speaking?

Lieut. LOGAN. Yes, sir.

PRESIDENT (to the accused). Lédoyen, stand up. [Accused rises.] Have you any observations to make on the testimony of this witness?

ACCUSED. As I have already stated to the court, Lieut. Logan had us out on the hill yesterday and we nearly froze to death, and this morning I was so stiff that I could not drill.

PRESIDENT. Anything further?

ACCUSED. No, sir.

PRESIDENT. (turning to the commissaire). Mr. Commissaire-Rapporteur, have you any questions to ask the witness?

COMMISSAIRE. No, Mr. President.

PRESIDENT (addressing counsel for the accused). Mr. Counsel, have you any explanations to give or observations to offer on the testimony of this witness?

ACCUSED'S COUNSEL. No, Mr. President.

PRESIDENT (addressing the other judges). Gentlemen of the court, have you any questions to ask this witness?

(Both judges shake their heads.)

PRESIDENT (to witness). You may retire or be seated.

(Lieut. Logan salutes and retires.)

PRESIDENT. The commissaire du gouvernement has the floor.

COMMISSAIRE. I have no observations to offer, Mr. President.

PRESIDENT. The counsel for the accused has the floor.

(The counsel for the accused, standing in his place behind the railing, addresses the court for between 10 and 15 minutes. He makes an impassioned and rather flowery speech, appealing to the sympathy and mercy of the court, calling attention to the youth of the accused, his suffering the day before, his hard service for some time past, and his failure to understand the gravity of his offense and the nature of the punishment which it was within the power of the court to impose; and, admitting the technical guilt of the accused, pleads for as light a sentence as possible.)

PRESIDENT. Accused, stand up. [Accused rises.] Have you anything else to add in your defense?

ACCUSED. No, sir.

PRESIDENT. I declare the trial ended. Let the accused be removed.

(The accused is escorted out of the room by his guard; the judges retire to their private room. In about 10 minutes the judges return to the bench, the sitting is reopened, but the accused is not brought back into the room.)

(The president reads the judgment in the prescribed form, finding the accused guilty and sentencing him to be shot, reciting that the vote of the court is unanimous.)

PRESIDENT. The court is closed.

(It is then about 5.45 p. m., the trial having occupied about 45 minutes.)

The judges file out of the court room; the commissaire and the greffier go to the adjoining room where the prisoner is waiting with his guard and with half a dozen other prisoners under like guard who have been tried during the day. All of these prisoners are drawn up in line, and the greffier reads the various judgments and sentences in their different cases in the presence of all of them. Lédoyen is then removed by his guard to await the execution of his sentence.

5. The commissaire du gouvernement at about 8 o'clock the same evening, presents to the general a copy of the judgment of the court and an order for the general's signature, directing the execution of the sentence (no appeal lies from the judgment of the special court). The general carefully looks through the papers, asks the commissaire whether they are all in order and whether the commissaire recommends carrying out the sentence immediately, and upon receiving the commissaire's affirmative reply signs the order, fixing the hour of execution at 7.30 the next morning.

6. At 7.30 the following morning the death sentence is carried into execution by a firing squad in the presence of accused's battalion. Immediately after the execution, while the body is lying on the ground, the battalion is marched past the body so that every man may have a close view of it for the purpose of impressing upon him the punishment meted out.

7. If instead of ordering the case before one of the emergency war courts (special courts), as above assumed, the commanding general had referred it to the regular conseil de guerre, the procedure on the trial would have been precisely the same, the only difference being that the accused would have been entitled to 24 hours' notice before the sitting of the court. In that case the court would have sat at 5 o'clock (or perhaps an hour earlier) on December 15. And in that case the accused would have had a right to appeal within 24 hours to the court of revision of the division, which would have resulted in 7 days delay in the execution, as follows:

1. One day for accused to pray appeal.
2. One day for papers to be filed with the clerk of the court of revision.
3. One day for accused's counsel to file his "memoir" with the court of revision.
4. Three days for the member of the court acting as rapporteur to examine the case and prepare his report for the court.
5. One day for the session of the court.

Upon affirmance by the court of revision, the judgment is carried into execution in the same way as above outlined.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. This is for the purpose of showing that the American proceeding is more in detail than the French?

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. It is for the purpose of a comparison. With that I want to offer the form prescribed in the French "Guide Pratique et Sommaire" for the conduct of a case, upon which—together with my observation of the trial of cases—this is gotten up. That form occurs on pages 59 to 61 of the "Guide Pratique et Sommaire."

The session is closed.

(Otherwise.)

The session will continue.

Guard, bring in the accused, Y.

(For a recess.)

The session is suspended for — minutes.

Senator WARREN. Of course if you put in the actual French case, you would have to translate it, would you not?

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. I could do that also.

Senator WARREN. Unless the Senator feels that it is necessary you need not do that.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. I will put in a translation of this form with my testimony.

Then I want to offer a report which Maj. Wells made to me of his attendance on a British field general court-martial in the Rhine district, together with the stenographic reports of those trials, and a letter to which I rather specially desire to call attention, or a carbon copy of the letter.

Senator WARREN. Those are trials in the American Army?

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. In the British army. The British field court-martial in the Cologne district.

DESCRIPTION OF SITTING OF FIELD GENERAL COURT-MARTIAL OF THE BRITISH ARMY.

On Thursday, July 24, 1919, the undersigned, Maj. W. Calvin Wells, judge advocate, United States Army, accompanied by Army Field Clerk A. R. Hitchings, attending a sitting of a field general court-martial, held at Frankenfort, about 12 miles from Cologne, Germany. Brig. Gen. Mellor, deputy judge advocate general, stationed at Cologne, Germany, drove us out in his auto from Cologne to Frankenfort. Before going to the meeting place of the court, I had a conference with Capt. G. E. Sykes, a barrister in civilian life who in the army had been appointed as the legally qualified member of the field general court-martial. As hereinafter set forth, this legally qualified member really conducted the whole proceedings of the court, questioning the witnesses, there being practically no questions asked either by the prosecutor for the Government nor for the counsel for the accused.

The court was held in a pavilion or band stand in a beer garden which was a popular resort prior to the war for the citizens of Cologne. The band stand acted as a sounding board, having a solid back and the front being open toward the garden. The front of the band stand was curtained in by blankets and the court sat on one side and at the two ends of a table. The table covering and chairs were rough and crude and the blankets as curtains added to the roughness of the effect of the scene. The proceedings were entirely informal and without any pomp or ceremony whatsoever. The president of the court, a major, sat at the center of the side of the table, the two representatives of the American Army, myself and Mr. Hitchings, sat at the table at the right of the president, and at the right of Mr. Hitchings sat a member of the court, a captain, and at his right at the end of the table a first lieutenant sat. At the left of the president of the court sat Capt. Sykes, or legally qualified member of the court, and at the left of Capt. Sykes sat two officers of the British Army who were sitting for the purpose of instruction—at the left of those two officers sat the prosecutor at the end of the table, and at his left away from the table sat the counsel for the accused, a British officer who was not a lawyer or barrister. A noncommissioned officer, a sergeant, stood at the door and brought in the accused and witnesses during the progress of the sitting. This sergeant had in his hand a list of the cases to be tried and the names of the witnesses. Before calling the first case, the legally qualified member of the court swore the president of the court who in turn swore the members of the court. The legally qualified member also swore the two officers under instruction. The prosecutor was not sworn, whether this was an error or omission or not I do not know. The legally qualified member keeps a record of the proceedings in longhand. There is a folder with a printed form on the opening page and the concluding page, which was filled in by this legally qualified member with the names of the members of the court and certain other statements as to certain requirements of the statute. This folder is known as Army Form A-3, and a copy of the entire record of one of the cases, except the name of the defendant is entered as "A. B." is filed herewith marked Exhibit A hereto. There is also filed as Exhibit B for information, but having no connection with the field army trial here being described, the form for a general district and regimental court-martial, being Army Form A-9, which was given me by the president of the court. The legally qualified member of the court is used in a great many different courts and is ordered by telegram to go to the various courts to sit, and as above stated he practically conducted the court. A carbon copy of the telegram (in bad shape when handed me) addressed to Capt. Sykes is filed hereto marked Exhibit C. The original showed that the substance of the telegram was about the following: "Your services required at general headquarters 10th Queen's Royal Regiment, Frankenfort, on July 24 for the trial of five cases. You will be present at such G. H. Q." This telegram was sent from division headquarters, London, to Capt. Sykes at Cologne. When the court had been duly sworn and was ready to proceed to business, the legally qualified member directed the sergeant to bring in all of the accused, together with their guard and the witnesses for and against each accused. These were marked in by the sergeant and the accused appeared uncovered. The guards were covered and wore sidearms and the witnesses were covered. The members of the court, the prosecutor, and the counsel for the accused appeared unarmed and sat covered only uncovering when they were sworn in as members of the court. All of the accused and witnesses, etc., were sent from the room after verification of their presence with the exception of the accused and his guard who was first to be tried. The charge was then read to the accused who plead not guilty. This first case tried was a charge of desertion, but as shown by the technical charge and specifications in the Exhibit A hereto, it appears to fall to charge anything more than absence without leave. I asked the legally qualified member about this and he stated that it was unnecessary in the pleadings to charge with a greater certainty than was done the charge of desertion, but that proof would establish the offense, to wit, desertion. Their pleadings appeared to be much less technical than ours. The witnesses against the accused were then called in and duly sworn by the interesting old common law custom of having the oath read to them by the legally qualified member while the witness held in his right hand the open Bible with his cap in his left hand, and at the conclusion of the reading to the witnesses, the witness repeated the words, "So help me God," and kissed the open Bible. The witness was then examined by the legally qualified member, who reduced the substance of his testimony to writing in longhand on paper to be placed in the folder, which testimony as so reduced to writing appears in Exhibit A hereto. At the completion of the questioning by the legally qualified member, he asked the prosecutor, the counsel for the accused, and the other members of the court if they had any questions to ask, and with the exception of two times during the whole trial no one else asked any questions. The proceedings were wholly informal and the questioning was efficiently done and a gist of the witnesses' knowledge on the subject quickly gained. Upon the completion of the testimony of the witness, he was marched from the room by the sergeant. There appears as an exhibit to the report to be made of the study of the English system an account of a preliminary hearing held in the Wellington Barracks in the Scots Guards in London where there was great pomp and ceremony and a tremendous noise made by the non-commissioned officers in giving their commands in marching the soldiers in before the court. There was none of this ceremony or noise before the trial in this field general court-martial. On the contrary, the orders of the sergeant directing the troops was in a low voice, and while witnesses were marched in and out, it was without ceremony and quietly done. The whole proceedings occupied about half an hour. The proceedings of this sitting of a field general court-martial as well as of others are so informal that it was difficult that we secured permission to have a stenographer present and take down a verbatim report of questions and answers as the British authorities thought it would give a misleading and wholly erroneous impression to any person who had not been present at the trial. After discussing the matter with Gen. Mellor, however, I secured permission to take this shorthand transcript of the testimony in one case, which testimony is filed herewith marked Exhibit D hereto. A carbon copy of the letter from the commander in chief of the British Army of the Rhine, answering the request of the war office at London to permit our presence at the sitting of the field general court-martial and take a stenographer verbatim report of the proceedings is filed herewith marked Exhibit E. It is easy to understand after seeing the informality of the quickness with which this case was tried, how the case described by Maj. Gen. Childs of the trial of a British soldier accused of cowardice on the retreat from Mons in France at the beginning of the war, could be actually brought to trial within an half hour after the commission of the offense, tried, sentenced to death, and executed and have the Germans marching over his grave within an hour after the commission of the offense. The value of such rapidity was emphasized and the righteousness of the proceeding was defended, and apparently satisfactorily, by Maj. Gen. Childs before the preliminary committee investigating court-martial procedure in the British Army. It appeared that some action was absolutely necessary at that time and the field general court-martial provided the means.

It is to be noted that on the conviction of the charge of desertion the penalty was 56 days' special punishment, which is field punishment No. 2, upon the finding of guilty by the court. Special punishment or field punishment No. 1, which provides for tying a prisoner to a wheel for so many hours each day for so many days, exposed to the public view, is not inflicted now since the armistice has been signed, though it can be inflicted by a field general court-martial still. It was very evident that the court, while finding the accused technically guilty, believed that the explanation made by the accused reduced the penalty to be inflicted to the minimum.

At the conclusion of the taking of the testimony the prosecutor made no arguments. The counsel for the accused made a short argument, clearly stating his position in very few words. The speech of the counsel for the accused was not reduced to writing and does not appear in the record. The prosecutor, who had the right to close the argument, did not do so.

The assistance rendered the court by the legally qualified member was very great, he practically conducting the entire proceeding; and being learned in the law, he permitted no evidence to be introduced which was not competent. If a witness undertook to state something which he did not know of his own knowledge, either for the prosecution or for the defense, he was stopped by him and told that such evidence was not competent and not to state it. He seemed desirous of getting at the exact truth in the briefest possible period of time, and after writing the substance of each witnesses' testimony, he read it over to the witness and had him approve it or change it according to his suggestion before the witness left the stand.

The accused was notified, just as in our courts, with reference to his rights to testify under oath or making an unsworn verbal or written statement, in which latter events he was informed that he could not be cross-examined, but that the unsworn statement would not have the same weight with the court as the testimony on oath. He was also told that he could do neither if he so desired. When the accused elected to be sworn and testify, he was directed to secure his cap and testify covered. The next case tried was one in which the accused pleaded guilty. He was fully informed that he did not need to do so, and if he did not plead guilty, all the testimony necessary to establish his guilt would have to be produced for the prosecution. Having stated that he still desired to plead guilty, there was placed in the record of the case the statements of the witnesses taken on the preliminary investigation of the case, and those statements went up as a part of the record and were read to the court in order that they might know what penalty to inflict.

This rough and ready court guided by a learned lawyer presented to me the best example of arriving at the truth in the least possible time of any court I have ever seen. To function properly and adequately protect the rights both of the Government and of the accused, it is absolutely necessary that the legally qualified member shall be a man learned in the law, of judicial temperament, and more concerned with arriving at the truth than in securing convictions, acquittals, or pursuing the fine shades of distinction between that which is competent and that which is incompetent. In the hands of a learned British lawyer of the above type it is a splendid instrument for enforcing justice; in the hands of another not so well qualified it could be made the instrument of oppression. If he desired to present only one side of the case in reducing to writing the substance of the testimony, he could omit such parts as were favorable to one side or the other, and all that he might reduce to writing be true, yet that which he omitted might be of the greatest weight and might in truth entirely change the sentence or finding which should be rendered in the case, and the reviewing authority would know nothing whatever of such testimony.

For the enforcing of discipline it is a wonderful instrument, but for the protection under all circumstances of the rights of the accused it can not be compared with the procedure of our general court-martial which protects in so many ways the rights of the accused, which protection does not appear before these field general courts-martial.

There is filed also herewith as Exhibit F a copy of a pamphlet styled "Circular Memorandum on Courts-Martial for Use on Active Service," given me by Capt. Sykes.

WILLIAM CALVIN WELLS,
Major, Judge Advocate.

EXHIBIT No. A.

Army Form A. 3. Form for assembly and proceeding of field general court-martial on active service. Proceedings.

On active service, this twentieth day of July, 1919.

Whereas it appears to me, the undersigned, an officer in command of Second London Rifles, on active service, that the persons named in the annexed schedule, being subject to military law, have committed the offences in the said schedule mentioned.

And whereas I am of opinion that it is not practicable that such offences should be tried by an ordinary general court-martial.

I hereby convene a field general court-martial to try the said persons, and to consist of the officers hereunder named.

President: Rank, major; name, W. S. Hooker; regiment, L. R. Members: Rank, Capt. C. H. Long, Lieut, H. J. Tuffle, Corpl. G. Sykes; regiment, 10 Queens Reg.

COPY OF THE RECORD AS WRITTEN BY THE LEGALLY QUALIFIED MEMBER OF THE COURT WHICH CONSTITUTES ALL THAT WAS WRITTEN BY THE RECORD OF THE ATTACHED EVIDENCE.

Record of trial of No.———; Private A. B., 10th Queens, 124th Tr. Mortar Battery; prosecutor, Second Lieutenant———; counsel for defense, Lieutenant———.

Prosecution:

First witness: No.——— Sgt.———, 124th Trench Mortar Battery.

On or about November 16, 1919 last, I saw accused pack up to go on leave to England. This was the last I saw of accused until July 15, 1919. I left the unit the day following I saw the accused packing up.

By the court: The unit broke up the day I left it.

Second witness: Captain———, ——.

Sworn stated: Accused belongs to the ——. He was attached to —— when it broke up on or about November 19, 1918. Accused's duty was then to rejoin his unit. Accused reported to the battery on March 7, 1919. I produce certificate of surrender (marked A) signed and attached. I produce certificate of accused A. B. 103 (marked B), signed and attached.

By the court:

There were about nine other men of —— in ——. These men all rejoined the battery.

Case for prosecution.

Defense:

The accused, duly warned and sworn, states:

I came to France in May, 1916, with ——. Before this leave I had one previous leave in October, 1917, from which I returned in proper time. I went on leave on November 19, 1918. I was due to return on December 2, 1918. I reported to the Victoria Station December 12, 1918, between —— and —— hours. I met a party of men coming away from the leave train. I was told by them that they had been granted an extension of leave and they were to await further orders. I thought it referred to me also, so I returned home. I expected to hear from the war office, and I waited a month. Then I went up to the war office and a noncommissioned officer told me to return home and await orders. I did so. Ultimately thought I had better return, so reported to the police at Victoria Station on June 24, 1919.

No. ——

By the court:

I do not know any of the men I spoke to on December 2, 1918. I took no steps to see an officer or the R. T. O. at Victoria Station to see if it was true, thought I might return home and await orders. I did not go to the proper inquiry office at the war office, I went to the recruiting office. The men did tell me who had given them the extension. They said it was for 14 days. I wore a uniform all the time I was away. I returned with all my equipment. I was at the same address I had left with the orderly room all the time I was away.

No witness for defense.

Address for the defense: Addresses the court.

After finding the prosecutor sworn, produces certificate of accused's, signed and attached.

No evidence called as to character.

Particulars of service: Enlisted November 21, 1915; not wounded; age, 21 years; overseas, May 5, 1916; not married; civil occupation, rully man; attached Exhibits A and B, referred to above, and the qualification sheet of accused.

Another case.—Enclosed in the Army Form A 3; record of trial of Pvt. A. B. ———, Queens; prosecutor, Lieut. ———; plea, guilty. (Effect of plea explained to soldier). Summary of evidence read (marked A) signed and attached. After finding: Prosecutor sworn produces accused's certificates A. F. B. 122, signed and attached (2 sheets). Accused in mitigation says: I got with some men I did not know who gave me some drink and I remember nothing more.

Particulars of service: Enlisted February, 1915; wounded, Albert, 1915, and evacuated to England; returned to France, October, 1918; overseas, November, 1916; not married; age, 22 years; civil occupation, laborer.

For the defense: (Statement read by the officer.)

I certify that the above court assembled on the 24th day of July, 1919, and duly tried the persons named in the said schedule, and that the plea, finding, and sentence in the case of each such person were as stated in the third and fourth columns of that schedule.

I also certify that (1) the members of the court, (2) the witnesses, (4) the officers under instruction were duly sworn, (5) that S. S. 412 was laid before the court.

Signed this 24th day of July, 1919.

Question: Are they true extracts from the regimental books, and is the statement of entries in the conduct sheets a fair and true summary of those entries? (Answer.)

(Cross-examined by the accused.)

(Instruction: If by reason of the nature of the service of the accused in a departmental corps, or otherwise, the finding of the court renders him liable to any exceptional punishment in addition to that to be awarded by the court (for instance, forfeiture or reduction of corps pay), the prosecutor must call the attention of the court to the fact, and the court must inquire into the nature and the amount of such additional punishment.)

Question to the accused: Do you wish to address the court? (Answer.)

The court is closed for the consideration of the sentence.

VERBATIM REPORT OF BRITISH FIELD COURT-MARTIAL HELD AT FRANKENFORT, NEAR COLOGNE, GERMANY, ATTENDED BY MAJ. W. CALVIN WELLS, JUDGE ADVOCATE.

[Transcribed by Army Field Clerk A. R. Hitchings.]

Questions by legally qualified member of the court:

Q. Your name, please?—A. Capt. C. H. Lawrence.

Q. Your unit?—A. Tenth Queens.

Q. Your name, please, lieutenant?—A. Lieut. H. J. Trythall, Tenth Queens.

Questions asked by legally qualified member to prosecuting attorney:

Q. Whom are you prosecuting?—A. Pvt. A. B., Eleventh Queens.

Questions asked by legally qualified member of accused:

Q. Do you object to being tried by me or any officer of the court?—A. No, sir.

The president of the court was sworn in by the legally qualified member; the members of the court were sworn in by the president; the officers under instruction were sworn in by the legally qualified member of the court, each holding the open Bible and kissing the Bible and repeating "So help me God" at conclusion of oath.

Questions by legally qualified member to accused:

Q. ———, Pvt. A. B.?—A. Yes, sir.

The charge was read by the legally qualified member of the court.

Question by legally qualified member to:

Q. Do you plead guilty or not guilty?—A. (Accused) Not guilty.

The prosecutor calls for witnesses.

First witness for prosecution called was Capt. S. W. Gilbert, who was sworn in by one of the officers under instruction.

The captain was sent out and another witness was called and questioned by the legally qualified member:

Q. Your name?—A. S. W. Martin.

Q. Will you give evidence, please?—A. On or about the 16th of November last I saw the accused packing up to go on leave to England. That was the last I saw of him until some evidence was taken.

Q. When was that taken, the 15th of July, I suppose there is no question about that.—A. None. The unit was smashed up the day I saw him packing up.

Q. Did you remain with the unit?—A. Until it was transferred.

Q. But on the 16th of November you were with the unit.—A. I left the unit the next day.

Q. The day you left the unit, was accused with the unit?—A. He proceeded on leave that day.

Q. Do you know that he was on leave that day?—A. I know his warrant had come.

Q. Did you see the warrant?—A. No.

The evidence as taken by the legally qualified member was read over to the witness and he replied that it was O. K. The court had no questions to ask.

Further questions asked of witness by legally qualified member:

Q. You know the accused had a warrant but you did not see it?—A. I can not say anything more about it. They were all congratulating him as usual as he was going on leave, that is all I can say.

The witness was excused and Capt. Gilbert was called in again.

Questions by legally qualified member:

Q. You are Capt. F. W. Gilbert, Tenth Queens?—A. Yes.

Q. Will you give your evidence?—A. The private was attached to One hundred and twenty-fourth Light Trench Mortar Battery of the Tenth Queens.

Q. At what time?—A. I don't know, but the battery broke up somewhere about the 20th of November and at that time he was attached to same. A message was received by the battalion.

Q. We can not accept that as evidence. Can you tell the court what his duty would be on the breaking up of the battery?—A. His duty was to rejoin his unit.

Q. I suppose the leave, if any, was granted by the One hundred and twenty-fourth Light Trench Mortar Battery.—A. Yes.

Q. When did you next see accused?—A. Not until he arrived back the 3d of July of this year.

Q. You saw him on that date?—A. Yes; about half hour after he arrived.

Q. Can you say whether or not he was with the unit at the time the battery broke up until the 3d of July?—A. He was not with the unit.

I produced a document, a certificate of surrender. This document was read to the court.

Q. Is that your evidence?—A. I produce a paper.

Q. This can not be accepted as evidence. You are entitled to put in a certified copy of the whole thing. This is not the original?—A. No; it is not.

There was introduced in evidence a copy of the record showing accused going on leave.

Q. Do you, if others came back to the unit?—A. Sergt. Martin was one that did come back.

That is all the evidence for the prosecution.

The charges were read to the accused, that he was absent without leave from expiration of leave to date of surrender.

By legally qualified member to accused: You need not necessarily say anything, but if you wish to make any statement, the statement may or may not be made on oath. If you make it on oath, you swear that it is true and it has more weight with the court. It has this disadvantage that you are likely to be asked questions. If you do not make a statement on oath you can not be questioned.

By the counsel for the defense: I am going to call him on oath.

By the legally qualified member to accused:

Q. You understand that you become a witness in your own defense?—A. I do.

The accused was sworn in same as the other witnesses.

Questions by counsel for defense to accused:

Q. How long have you been in France?—A. Since May, 1916.

Q. Did you come to France with the battery?—A. I joined the battery when first formed and came to France with it.

Q. Have you had any leave?—A. I had one previous leave before this one.

Q. And what date was it about—the previous one?—A. It was about 14 months before this one, about October 1917.

Q. You returned from that leave quite all right?—A. Yes.

Q. Now you went on leave on the 19th of November, 1918, you were due to return on the 2nd of December. Will you tell the court why you did not come back?—A. I returned back to Victoria Station when my leave expired, and there was a party of men coming off the train.

Q. At what time in the day?—A. About 8.30 or 9 in the morning. The party of men were returning back from the train.

Q. Do you mean from the leave train?—A. I was informed by them that they had been granted an extension of leave and that I was to await further orders. I thought that that referred to me as well, so I returned with them. I expected to hear from the War Office and I waited a month. After that month, about a month expired, so I went to the War Office. All the satisfaction I got was to return. I asked a noncommissioned officer and he said to return and await orders, and I returned back and then I thought it was best for me to come back and I reported to Victoria Station.

Q. You did return home to wait orders, and then—A. I thought it better to go back and report there to the police.

Q. What date was that—I suppose there is no question about the date, on the 24th of June?—A. Yes. That is all, sir.

His evidence was read back to him and he approved it.

Q. Did you know any of the men?—A. No.

Cross-examination by the legally qualified member:

Q. Did you yourself take any steps to go to the battalion or any officer on the 2nd of December to make sure that what these men told you was true?—A. No.

Q. Who did you see at the War Office?—A. There was a bunch of men there recruiting and I asked a noncommissioned officer and he told me to return back to await until I got orders.

Q. Where did you go to?—A. To the recruiting office, on the righthand side in Whitehall.

Q. You did not go to the proper inquiry at the War Office. Have you ever been there before?—A. No.

Q. And that would be about the end of January was it?—A. Yes; in January I do not know the exact date.

Q. You went home and waited for five months?—A. Yes.

Questions by a member of the court:

Q. When you saw these men coming from the leave train, did they say what the extension was?—A. I believe it was about 14 days.

The counsel for the defense wished to ask a question through the court:

Q. Were you wearing your uniform all the time?—A. Yes; I was dressed as I am now.

Q. You came back complete as a soldier?—A. Yes.

Q. What address did you stop at?—A. At my home.

Q. At the address you left in the orderly room?—A. Yes.

Q. Did you ever leave it?—A. No.

The accused then resumed his position as an accused.

Statement to the court by the counsel for the defense: You have got here a man who has been out to France the whole time of the battery; he goes on leave; after a certain time he returns all right; he remains with the battery until after the armistice, then goes on leave again, and he tells you he returned on the day that he was due. He meets a party of men who tell him he got an extension of leave. It was at the time of the trouble at Dover. He is a young soldier, he hears it, and he thinks it true. He does not hear after a month and goes to the war office. He had never been there before. The noncommissioned officer there told him to go home, and he waits at home. He keeps on his soldier's clothes. He goes to Victoria Station and reports to the police there. You have got two witnesses who can simply prove he went on leave and you have got the documentary evidence to show he reported at Victoria Station. You have got to believe his story just as much as you have the other two. I suggest to the court that there is not enough evidence in the case to prove this man guilty.

The court was closed.

The court was opened again.

Q. Is there anything in his record of previous convictions?—A. No; there is not.

Q. Will you give the court some proof of your service?—A. I joined the army the 21st of November, 1915.

Q. You came to France in May, 1916, the first time?—A. Yes.

Q. Have you been wounded?—A. No.

Q. How old are you?—A. I am 21 now.

Q. What were you before a soldier?—A. I was a carman.

The court was closed for a finding.

EXHIBIT E.

GENERAL HEADQUARTERS.

1. With reference to war office letter No. 0153/4572 (A. G. 3), dated July 6, 1919, I have the honor to inform you that I have no objection to the attendance at field general courts-martial of the members of the special mission. Col. Rigby should communicate, as regards details, with Brig. Gen. Mellor, D. J. A. G.

2. As regards your second paragraph, I do not consider it desirable that the course proposed should be followed in its entirety. It will be borne in mind that throughout the war attention has been continuously given to making a field general court-martial a tribunal whose sole object is to ascertain and act upon the truth with as little formality as possible, and all formalities beyond those which are strictly indispensable have been discouraged. In no case (with the possible exception of some colonial trials) has a shorthand note been taken of the proceedings, and I am of opinion that if any such course were followed on this occasion the very object of the special mission, which is assumed to be to ascertain our normal and ordinary method of procedure, would be defeated, inasmuch as the presence of a shorthand writer would be likely to embarrass the court and tend to disturb the normal course of procedure.

For the above reasons a verbatim report of the proceedings (which presumably it is intended to publish) would give a misleading and, in fact, a wholly erroneous impression to any person who had not been present at the trial. I am therefore entirely averse to the taking of a shorthand note.

As regards the proposal to supply (presumably for publication) a copy of the record, I have no objection to this, provided that the army council are prepared to depart from the established practice of refusing copies of proceedings to anyone except the person specified in section 124 of the army act. As at present advised, I am not prepared to supply copies without the express sanction of the army council. In any case, I consider that all proper names should be omitted.

I have the honor to be, sir,
Your obedient servant.

(Signed) R. HUTCHISON, D. A. G., for General, Commanding in Chief.
British Army of the Rhine.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Did you in making a selection of the case choose one that is typical of all the others?

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. These are the only ones of which we have stenographic reports, and we simply attended the ones that happened to be there being tried on that day.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. I know that the two you put in during the retreat of the British forces at Mons were extreme cases, and I think you admit that.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. They were death cases, Senator, and I gave them to you because they were the only two that were released from this confidential status by Judge Advocate General Cassel, therefore the only ones that I could give you, and the only field general courts-martial that I have except those which we took ourselves, which were the ordinary cases, and in that way I give both sides of it.

Senator WARREN. Anyone who reads that would understand that the circumstances were extreme, because it speaks of it as being in the face of the enemy. Would not that be so?

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Yes.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. I may say that the letter of July 8, 1919, the carbon copy of which is attached to Maj. Wells's report, was received in London only on July 21, and that is the reason that I was not able to get over earlier and attend any of those courts, and had to send Major Wells after July 21, and when I was on my way home, all ready to sail.

Then I also want to offer Maj. Wells's report to me on the Belgian system, of which he made the examination covering the courts they have in Belgium and the administration of justice as he found it there.

PARIS, FRANCE, June 16, 1919.

From: Maj. William Calvin Wells, judge advocate, United States Army.
To: Lieut. Col. William C. Rigby, judge advocate, chief of special mission for study of court-martial practice and procedure of France, Great Britain, and other countries.
Subject: Study of the court-martial practice and procedure of Belgium.

1. Having completed the study of military practice, according to the practice and procedure of the military courts in Belgium, as directed by you, as completely as could be done by me in the time assigned for the investigation, I beg leave to report as follows, to wit:

MANNER OF INVESTIGATION.

1. Before proceeding to Belgium for study on the ground there I familiarized myself with the translation which had been prepared in the office of the special mission, of the Belgian military penal code, of the rules and regulations of discipline, together with the decrees of Albert, King of Belgium, in which legislation was enacted with reference to military justice, together with the instructions issued by way of explanation of such decrees of the King, which decrees made changes in the military penal code which the experience of the war showed was necessary.

2. I proceeded to Brussels, Belgium, in company with you, where we were introduced by Maj. W. W. Hoffman, the American military attaché for the legation of the United States at Brussels, to M. Masson, minister of war; Gen. Merché, chief of staff to the minister of war; Col. Cornell, chief of the first division, office of the minister of war; Maj. Michen, in the minister of war's office; Gen. Maglinse, assistant chief of staff, Belgian general headquarters; Lieut. Col. Hennon, third section, general headquarters. The introduction thus secured an entrée which assured a cordial reception to my efforts, and a whole-hearted cooperation by the Belgian officers in giving to me the information desired.

3. I requested compliance with the request for statistical information, according to the questionnaire previously prepared by you and sent to Maj. W. W. Hoffman, military attaché, some weeks prior to my visit to Brussels, and which he had already presented to the Minister of War.

4. I soon ascertained that, in the opinion of the Belgian officers, a thorough understanding of the Belgian system would be better obtained through interviews with Baron (Gen.) van Zuylen van Nyevelt, the Auditeur General of the Belgian Army, which position corresponds generally to the office of the Judge Advocate General of the American Army, and with such other officers, most of them serving in that branch of the army, as would be designated and introduced to me by Baron van Nyevelt. I therefore interviewed Baron van Nyevelt, after having been introduced to him, at great length. At his suggestion I also interviewed, at great length, Maj. Jacques van Ackere, Auditeur Militaire en Campagne, who is a distinguished member of the Brussels bar and who during the early stages of the war was assigned for the defense of a large number of accused before the courts-martial, and who in 1917 was appointed by the King, Auditeur Militaire, and from that time until the present time has filled that position, prosecuting for the Government before the military courts.

5. I also interviewed the Minister of War, M. Masson, General de Ceuninck, who is one of the most distinguished generals of the Belgian Army, considered perhaps their best disciplinarian, and Baron de Broqueville, Minister de l'Interieur, who is probably the most distinguished official in Belgium, having been Prime minister, Minister of Reconstruction, and now holds the position of Secretary of the Interior.

6. I talked with various other officials at times when I did not find it feasible, or whose conversations I did not deem of sufficient importance to have present a stenographer and have such statements taken down verbatim.

7. I visited, in company with Baron van Nyevelt, and sat through a session of a Judicial Commission, which is the tribunal where the preliminary judicial hearing is first had on each complaint of a Conseil de Guerre, one of the courts before which all soldiers and officers up to and including the rank of captain are tried, and of the Cour Militaire, the supreme court to which every case tried by a Conseil de Guerre may be appealed and the court of general jurisdiction for trial of general and field officers. At each of these courts I had present with me a Belgian stenographer, who was recommended as being the most expert obtainable in Brussels, who, as far as could be done, took down in shorthand in French the proceedings in each of these tribunals. As these courts do not have official stenographers who take down the testimony and proceedings as done in our courts, and as the acoustic properties of the halls where the courts sat were very poor, and as frequently several of those present at the trials were talking at the same time, and at a very high rate of speed, and as some of the witnesses spoke Flemish and frequently in such a low tone as not to be heard, the transcripts made by this stenographer were not a great success, but will indicate in a way the character of questions asked, etc. There was obtained also, to be filed with this report, a copy of a dossier, that is the individual papers contained in the folder which constitutes the record, of a case which was heard before the Judicial Commission, and also a copy of the dossier in a case before the Cour Militaire, the court of appeal, which record had previously been before the Conseil de Guerre. The original papers which appear in the dossier before the Judicial Commission where the case is first investigated, go up and constitute the dossier before the Conseil de Guerre, and that same record with such additions as are made at the hearing before the Conseil de Guerre go to the Cour Militaire and compose the record upon which the Cour Militaire bases its decision. The copies of these dossiers are filed as exhibits to this report and will show the manner of procedure in all of these military tribunals.

BRIEF NARRATIVE FORM OF THE PRACTICE AND PROCEDURE OF MILITARY JUSTICE AS ADMINISTERED IN THE BELGIAN ARMY.

A complaint may be lodged against a soldier, on account of an offense, by a civilian or by a soldier. If lodged by a civilian it is referred to an auditeur militaire who, in addition to his duties as a member of the judicial commission, prosecutes before the conseils de guerre, who has the witnesses summoned before the judicial commission and has there a preliminary investigation, informal but thorough. If the commission does not think the offense with which the soldier is charged has been committed, the complaint is dismissed and this dismissal is final.

If the complaint is lodged by a soldier, it is placed in legal form corresponding roughly to our charge and specifications, by an officer over the soldier, usually his captain, who has the complaint investigated in an administrative way by two officers of the regiment. This investigation is not a judicial but rather an administrative investigation for the purpose of securing certain facts with reference to the antecedents of the accused, his criminal record, if any, and statements of his character as a soldier by his commanding officer and also his general character, etc. To the complaint there is attached a form on which are made indorsements by the captain of the company to which the soldier belongs, as to whether trial is recommended, which is in turn indorsed by the battalion commander and by the regimental commander and thus is transmitted to the commanding general who refers the complaint for investigation to the auditeur militaire of the judicial commission for the division to which the soldier belongs. The judicial commission then makes a very complete investigation of the charge. It summons before it the accused who, not on oath, practically always makes a full and complete statement of his side of the accusation. He is not compelled to make any statement but in practice, as above stated, always does so. He is not warned that anything he says may be used against him on trial, but the soldiers generally understand that this is true. After he has been very thoroughly examined by auditeur militaire in the presence of the other two military members of that tribunal, the substance of his statements is dictated by the auditeur militaire to the clerk or greffier, who writes down on a form prepared therefor this statement, after which it is read over carefully to the accused. If he wishes any changes made in the statement, or additions thereto, they are carefully made; whereupon the accused signs this statement and it is verified by the signatures of the greffier, the auditeur militaire, and the two military members of this tribunal. This statement forms the basis usually of the prosecution, in that it eliminates all undisputed elements of the offense and narrows the issue to the disputed point, which is usually very narrow. If the statement admits guilt it is practically the sole evidence used before the court-martial. The accused coming before that court is briefly questioned as to the statements contained therein, and, beyond character witnesses for the defense, usually very little more testimony is introduced. Where the accused only admits some of the elements of the offense on the trial before the court-martial only such witnesses are summoned on their testimony previously obtained and read, which go to the issue left before the court for determination.

After the statement of the accused before the judicial commission, the commission hears the testimony of any witnesses which the accused desires to be heard in his behalf, and also any witnesses which the injured person, if the offense has been committed against the person or property or any other person, desires to be heard. The hearing is not all at one time and may be taken up from time to time as the witnesses are available. Usually it is completed in a few hours, the auditeur militaire having had summoned for the sitting all the witnesses having knowledge of the facts with reference to the charge. After the completion of the hearing of the testimony the commission finds as to whether or not the complaint should be referred to the court-martial for trial, or dismissed. If trial is recommended the case is sent to the court-martial having jurisdiction, where it is tried in due course.

If it is recommended that the complaint be not so referred and the complaint has been referred to the judicial commission for investigation by the general commanding, the recommendation is made to him that trial be not had on the charges, but this is not conclusive, he is not bound by the recommendation, and, if the general insists, the trial must be had before a court-martial. Before that court, however, the auditeur militaire can recommend an acquittal, which practically invariably follows such a recommendation.

The judicial commission is composed of three members. The presiding officer is an auditeur militaire who must have the qualifications of being at least 30 years of age, also holding the degree of doctor of law, and he is appointed for an indefinite period by the King and is removable by him alone. This plan provides for the Government a skilled lawyer who investigates the case, prepares it for trial, and prosecutes in the name of the King. There are two other members of the judicial commission, a captain and a lieutenant of the army, who sit with him, advise, and vote with him in the final determination of the commission; but in practice the auditeur militaire does all of the work, but has the benefit of advice of these military members of the commission.

The questions and answers of the witnesses before the military commission are reduced to writing in longhand in as brief form as possible. On the trial before a court-martial the defendant has the right, and exercises it if he so desires, to have the witnesses present before the court, and there any witness may be cross-examined by the president of the court-martial at the suggestion of the counsel for the accused. Unless the testimony is important this is not done, however, and the time consumed in a trial before court-martial is very short by reason of this preliminary investigation and testimony so taken. It is thus possible for an accused to be tried and condemned to death without a single witness actually appearing and testifying personally.

If the case be referred for trial to a court-martial it is then docketed and in due course heard by that tribunal. There are seven permanent courts-martial for the various districts in Belgium in time of peace, and usually one for each division in time of war, with such others as are necessary for smaller bodies detached from the division. A court-martial consists of five members. The president and three others are officers in the army who are chosen to serve one month, unless sooner relieved by detail elsewhere, and are chosen by lottery from a list of each grade of officers available to serve on the court. Each must be a line officer serving in the body of troops over which the court has jurisdiction. The presiding officer is the ranking military member of the court. He presides and propounds all questions which are asked either of the accused, who is first examined during the trial, and of all the other witnesses.

The presiding officer sits in the center of the bench. On his right is the civil judge, a doctor of laws, and a magistrate who has had at least 10 years' experience as a judge on the civil bench, who sits in his black robe of office and is next in authority to the president of the court. He is appointed by the King for a period of three years. The other members of the court sit on the left of the presiding officer and on the right of the civil judge alternately, according to rank. The Government is represented, as above stated, by the auditeur militaire who has investigated and prepared the case for trial. The accused, while the regulations do not require that he be defended by a lawyer, in practice is almost invariably represented by a lawyer, either a civilian or soldier, but who always appears in his robes of office as an advocate. The accused may, if he is able, secure a lawyer of his own choosing for his defense, but if unable to do so, in time of peace one is detailed for his defense by the president of the bar association when requested to do so, and in time of war the president of the court secures an attorney either from the civil bar or from amongst the lawyers serving in the division or body of troops in which the accused belongs, and if thus chosen he must serve without compensation.

When a case against an accused is called before a court-martial the charge against him is read and no formal plea is entered. The president of the court reads to the court his report on the case, which is a statement of the charge and the evidence thereon. Evidence may then be taken of the witnesses for the Government. As many as are desired to do so appear personally, after which the testimony for the witnesses for the defendant may be heard.

During the examination of the witnesses for the State, frequently accused arose in his place and, while the witness was still upon the stand, denied statements made by the witness and was himself examined with reference thereto by the president of the court.

The witnesses, as stated above, are questioned by the president of the court, and after he concludes his interrogation he asks the auditeur militaire if he has any questions which he desires asked, and if there are any, they are propounded through the president. Likewise he asks the counsel for the accused if he has any questions, which, if any are propounded through the president of the court. The president also asks the accused if he has any questions to ask, and, frequently the accused denies statements made by the witness, and asks further questions through the president with reference to those facts.

After the testimony is all in the auditeur militaire argues the case for the King, is followed by the argument of the attorney for the accused, and the auditeur militaire has the right to conclude the argument, but frequently he does not exercise such right.

The court then retires to chambers to consider its finding and there the civil judge first casts his vote as to the guilt or innocence of the accused and also as to the penalty which should be imposed. During the war this was changed and voting on both questions was by secret ballot, the junior member of the court voting first.

During the interrogation of the witnesses and after the court retires to consider its verdict or finding, the civil judge advises the court with reference to the law and it usually accepts his statements of the law as correct, and acts thereon. This statement of the law is not reduced to writing and does not appear in the record. It is claimed that, in this way, very few errors creep into the record, especially errors of sufficient nature to cause a reversal of a case on appeal, and the cases are thus correctly tried in the first instance, in a large proportion of the cases. The proceedings on investigation as to the sanity of an accused resembles our own, but is not as complete.

The time consumed in the trial of the cases is very much shorter under this system than that consumed in our trials. The presence of the civil member of the court of the auditeur militaire, who is a skilled lawyer, and of the counsel for the accused, also a lawyer, minimizes the errors committed by the court to a very small percentage.

As soon as a verdict or decision of the court is reached, it is announced in open court, is final, subject only to appeal (except in case of trials before the cour militaire), and requires the approval of no officer of the army. The administration of military justice is entirely separate and distinct both in theory and practice in this system from control by executive officers.

Appeal may be taken from this decision by any one or all of three parties, to wit: by the accused, by the auditeur militaire or auditeur general for the government, or by the person injured. If taken by the last it operates only with reference to recompense, if any, ordered made to him, as the military courts have power under certain circumstances to order recompense made to the injured party for property wrongs. If appeal be taken by this third party, no change can be made by the court of appeals as to the punishment of the accused, but only as to such recompense.

The appeal, if any, must be taken by the auditeur militaire within three days, by the accused within three days, by the injured party within three days, and by the auditeur general within 15 days. After appeal, in actual practice, the time which elapses before the case is actually heard by the court militaire varies. It is frequently heard in two weeks, very often three weeks or more. The law requires the hearing and judgment of the court of appeals within a month, but there are no penalties attached for not concluding the hearing within the month.

On the hearing before the cour militaire, the final court of appeal, a synopsis of the case is presented in writing by the president of the court. Witnesses can be called before the court if desired, though in practice it is seldom done. The court hears the cases anew on the law and the facts. Usually at the conclusion of the report of the president of the court argument is made by the auditeur general, or one of his two assistants who appear before that court, the auditeur general appearing in person only in very important cases. After the argument by the auditeur general or one of his assistants, called the substitute auditeur general, the case is argued by an attorney for the accused chosen as before the court-martial, such counsel appearing, whether civilian or military (soldier or officer) in his robe as an advocate. In conclusion, the auditeur general or his assistant has the closing argument, but frequently does not exercise that right.

The cour militaire does not retire at the conclusion of the arguments of each case before it considers its finding or verdict therein, but waits until the sitting for the day is concluded, when it reaches its verdict in all of the cases heard at the sitting.

If the auditeur militaire has not taken an appeal the court of appeal (cour militaire) can not increase the sentence, but can only diminish it or approve it as it stands. If the cour militaire holds that the case was sufficiently well tried to arrive at the truth before the court-martial but void for some error of law, it may substitute its own judgment for the judgment appealed from. Or if reversed for an error of law, the case may be sent back to be taken up anew from the point where the mistake in law was made, and a new verdict is then rendered by the same court. In case there was no preliminary examination—that is, no judicial examination and the case was tried by a court-martial—the entire judgment of the court-martial is null and void, and the case would be retried from the beginning, before the same court which tried it first, that is, the court for the same district or division. For mistakes in form, where, for instance, a judge or clerk failed to sign some part of the record, the cour militaire will hold the judgment void and will substitute the missing part and enter final judgment in the cour militaire.

When the case is finally decided by the cour militaire the commanding general can suspend the enforcement of the sentence if he so desires, and, if the conduct of the soldier is not good, he may afterwards enforce the sentence. The auditeur general has no power to show clemency or in any way diminish the sentence, but he may propose clemency to the King, in which event, in practice, invariably the King acts upon recommendation of the auditeur general in conformity therewith.

During the present war, however, an act was ordained by the King (it being impossible for Parliament to assemble, hence the King was held to have power to legislate alone) by the terms of which suspension was had of all sentences inflicted in the war until the termination of the war.

The military members of the cour militaire are chosen by lottery from the eligible list made by the minister of war for each rank, from line officers of the army. The president of the court is appointed for life by the King, must be a lawyer and doctor of laws, and must be a counsellor of the civil court of appeals, and must have had 10 years' experience as judge on the bench. He is retired on pay at 72 years of age. The military members of the cour militaire serve for one month.

The auditeur general is appointed by the King for life, but may be made to resign by order of the King at any time. He is usually appointed from the civil bench and is of the very highest standing as a lawyer and a judge. The office is considered one of the most honorable in the gift of the King. Baron van Nyevelt, the present incumbent, was a judge on the highest civil court of appeals at the time of his appointment as auditeur general.

In brief the above is an outline of the machinery and of the procedure before the Belgian courts-martial.

COMMENTS ON THE BELGIAN SYSTEM.

1. Both under the Belgian Constitution, and under the settled belief of the people of Belgium that it should be so, there is no commingling of the executive power of an officer of the army with the judicial power in the courts-martial for trial of those subject to its jurisdiction. In fact, a provision of the penal code which was enforced at the beginning of this war, which code dated back to 1815 before the constitution of Belgium was adopted in 1830, was held by the courts null and void where it sought to bestow on a commanding officer some judicial authority or power over the court martial, it being held by the courts that the two powers were separate and distinct. The practice and procedure in force clearly keep in view this line of demarcation.

2. The Belgians are jealous of the manner in which their judges are chosen, in order that no judges be chosen for the purpose of inflicting any special verdict or form of punishment. Only one member of a court-martial is chosen by the King and the other four are chosen by lottery from lists. When an officer is drawn he serves for one month as a member of a court, and it must be recited of record that he was thus drawn by lot in conformity with law.

3. The Belgian conception of the court-martial is that in truth and in fact it is a court and not an aid to the commanding general in the administration of discipline. This is shown by the fact, first, that a civil judge is a member of each court in order that its proceedings may be properly conducted as a court, and by the fact that the officer who prosecutes in the name of the King is a skilled lawyer, and by the further fact that the counsel who defends the accused is a lawyer and appears as such in his robes of office as an advocate.

4. The penalties inflicted in the courts-martial do not appear as severe as those inflicted in the other allied armies or those of its enemies. Full statistics are exceedingly difficult to obtain, because of the fact that practically all of Belgium was occupied by the enemy, and since the signing of the armistice the State of the nation has been so disturbed and disorganized that it has been almost impossible for the department of military justice to classify the records of its military proceedings. Nevertheless, from the statistics which have been obtainable the above fact is clearly shown. During the entire war only 128 death sentences were imposed for all military crimes, and of this number only 14 were executed and the other 112 either commuted or suspended. When it is recalled that for one military offense alone in the French Army it was stated to us by Capt. Emile Martz, director of military justice with the armies, over 1,500 French soldiers were sentenced to death and over 1,000 actually executed, the leniency of the Belgian courts is readily observed.

When we recall that in the American Army during the war not one soldier was executed for a military offense, we see that in severity of punishment our courts are not in a class with those of the European courts, nor even of Belgium.

The kindly treatment accorded the accused at the hearing before the judicial commission was especially impressive to me. It indicated apparently a desire to assist the accused to explain away the offense charged against him. On the wall of the office of the minister of war appears in French, in substance the following motto: "Speak, for a friendly living ear hears you, but be brief, for you deal with busy people."

IMPORTANT DIFFERENCES BETWEEN THE BELGIAN SYSTEM AND THE AMERICAN SYSTEM.

1. The elaborate investigation made in practice by the Belgian authorities is much more complete than the preliminary investigation made in actual practice under the requirements of our Manual of Courts-Martial. The fact that the auditeur militaire is appointed practically for life, and is a lawyer and a doctor of laws at least 30 years of age is important. The association with him on the commission of a captain and a lieutenant familiar with military service give to the lawyer the technical knowledge from the army standpoint. The fact that the witnesses are called and examined in this preliminary hearing in the presence of the accused, and the recording of the testimony of such witnesses to be submitted to a court-martial as a basis of the evidence for trial there requires careful preparation.

But this very careful preliminary investigation must of necessity and does carry with it a serious drawback, to wit, delay.

The figures with reference to the percentage of acquittals in the Belgian courts do not bear out the conclusion that a careful preliminary examination will necessarily reduce the proportion of acquittals to an inconsiderate number. The deduction drawn by some that a percentage of acquittals as high as 10 or 12 per cent is indicative of a victorious court-martial procedure I do not believe to be correct. My experience in civil life teaches me that the proportion to be expected is far above 10 per cent. I prefer to draw the deduction from such a proportion of acquittals that the members of the courts are dealing out justice to the accused as they see it, by acquitting them in that proportion of cases, dominated and controlled by no authority, save their own consciences.

2. Under the Belgian system there is a court of appeal of the type recognized in our civil courts, to which either the accused personally or by counsel, the government, or the person injured in his property may appeal (the latter for pecuniary recompense only). In our system the office of the Judge Advocate General performs functions such as are usually performed by a court of appeals; but his findings are recommendations. This is the logical result of the view held by British and American text writers on military law, to the effect that courts-martial in the armies of those countries are not courts in truth and in fact, but are aids to the commanding general for the purpose of enforcing discipline. If that view, as has been held in those two countries in all times past to be the correct view, is continued, then it logically follows that the functions of the judge advocate general should be those of an adviser to the military commander responsible for discipline and not the action of a court of last appeal. In this connection the views of Baron de Broqueville in his interview with me on June 13, 1919, should be carefully considered. As secretary of war of Belgium during a portion of the late war he had experiences which convince him, he stated, that the American system was the correct system. (See p. — of this statement.) I call your attention further to the statement made by Gen. Gouraud, one of the most distinguished French generals, to the same effect.

If our time-honored system is to be overturned and our courts-martial are to be strictly and solely courts, and not aids to discipline, then it follows logically that such courts should be entirely divorced from the control of the commanding generals, and a court of appeal in fact established for the reviewing of all trials in time of peace. In time of war it should be determined what, if any, cases should be permitted to be appealed. It is of interest further to note the statement of Baron de Broqueville on this subject also. If such court of appeal be founded. It is his settled belief that in time of war no appeal should be granted. Maj. van Ackere expressed his belief that no appeal should be granted in time of war, save those involving the question of the jurisdiction of the court.

3. A third difference between the military courts of the Belgian army and the court-martial of the American Army consists of the fact that in each of the Belgian courts one member is a civil judge of long experience, a doctor of laws, while in ours each member of the court is a commissioned officer in the Army.

Whether we continue our views of the province of the court-martial or whether we adopt the Belgian system of viewing courts-martial as pure courts of law, separate and distinct from executive power, it seems to me that less errors would be committed in the trials with such civil judge as a member of the court. If appeals be allowed, the number of reversals would be cut down. If no appeals be allowed, then more surely and certainly the action of the lower court would be right, and justice more certainly attained.

4. Likewise, the use of a trained lawyer as the prosecuting officer for the Government in our courts, under either view, would tend to the same end as that above described in having a civil judge as a member of the court.

5. The fifth difference lies in the fact that in our courts-martial, the accused seldom has the benefit of a trained lawyer in his defense. Usually he is some commissioned officer of low rank who is his friend, but who has no legal training. So long as the judge advocate prosecuting for the Government has no more legal training than has been the case in the past, the Government had little advantage over the accused, whether he be defended by a lieutenant or not. But should the officer representing the Government, and prosecuting the case, be a trained lawyer, the accused should have the benefit of a trained lawyer for his defense. It would be inequitable and unjust to have the case for the Government skillfully presented, and the case for the defendant unskillfully and illogically presented.

Every safeguard should be devised possible, however, to prevent the courts-martial being transformed into the farce of a maze of technicalities, such as has become, in large part, the modern criminal trial in civil courts of America. The adoption of the plan used in the Belgian cour militaire, by which (in original trials before that court) neither the prosecuting nor defending counsel questions the witnesses, but in which that duty rests upon the president of the court, a civil judge, would prevent many long and frivolous delays and quibbles which might otherwise ensue.

6. The sixth difference between the two systems, lies in the fact that the military members of the Belgian courts are chosen by lot from the list of eligibles of each rank who are line officers of the army, while under the American system they are chosen by the commanding general. This manner of choice illustrates clearly the different viewpoint of the two systems. Under the Belgian system, whoever happens to be chosen by lot serves, whether he be specially qualified, or not. The judge who tries the accused is chosen by chance. On the other hand, under the American system the members of the court are chosen for their special qualifications. If discipline be lax and morale be low in a division, and the commanding general who is responsible for the upholding of discipline and morale feels that officers who especially feel the responsibility of correcting such condition should be chosen, he is at liberty to do so. That which under our past system is considered a virtue, however, from the Belgian viewpoint is a vice. It follows, therefore, that each system is logical in its manner of choosing judges. The system of choosing judges which is adopted for the American Army in the future should depend upon the viewpoint which shall control as to our military courts in the future.

7. The seventh difference noted is, that in the Belgian system, while the military members serve for only one month, the civil member of a court-martial serves for three years. In the American system all the members of the court are chosen for an indefinite period and may serve either less or more than a month, but usually more.

I can see neither especial advantage nor disadvantage in either the Belgian or American system with reference to length of service of the military members. As to the Belgian system of having one civil member sit for three years, although all the military members are constantly changing, it appears to me that this plan may have some virtue. Within that period of time the one member of the court who is permanently sitting should become very thoroughly familiar with the military laws, practice and procedure and much more apt to advise the other members of the court correctly than if he should change monthly or in very short periods of time.

8. The eighth difference is that officers in the Belgian army of the rank of major and above are tried only by the cour militaire, which is the court of appeals as to all soldiers and all other officers. In our Army no officer, unless unavoidable, is tried by a court consisting of members of the court who are junior in rank to the officer being tried. As the composition of the Belgian court-martial is usually composed in part of officers under the rank of major, it appears that in practice there is little difference between the two systems. Doubtless more dignity is had in the trial of an officer of high rank before the court of appeal than before the court usually of original jurisdiction.

9. The ninth distinction between the two systems noted is that after final decision by a court-martial in the Belgian Army, the judgment of the court is immediately announced, is final, and needs the approval of no executive officer to give it validity. Under the American system the decision of the court is kept secret until first reported to the commanding general, who is the reviewing officer, whose approval or disapproval is necessary to the finality of the judgment of the court-martial, and who has the power to return the record to the court, and to suggest a different verdict on the question of guilt or lack of guilt, and a different penalty. This power of the commanding general under the American system is the logical result of the viewpoint that the court-martial is merely an aid to assist him in the enforcement of discipline. So long as that viewpoint is held by us, it logically follows that the officer who is responsible should in a large measure have the determination of the guilt or innocence and amount of penalty meted out to the accused.

10. The tenth and last serious difference, speaking in broad terms, between the American and Belgian systems, is the fact that the Belgian court always consists of five members, who have each an alternate, and if any member be disqualified for any reason, the alternate sits in his place. The American system provides for not less than 5 members nor more than 13 members, with no alternates. This larger number of 12 or 13 may be founded upon the similarity to the number of jurors sitting in our time-honored petty-jury system which we have from the common law of our English ancestry, which number is always 12. Personally, I see no sanctity in a court being composed of 12 men, where they have the right to decide issues of law as well as of fact. While it may seem illogical to cling to the jury of 12, and yet approve the court-martial of 5, I believe, that justice would be quite as well attained with less disturbance to the military service if our general courts-martial consisted of 5, rather than from 5 to 13.

GENERAL OBSERVATIONS.

1. In considering a system of practice and procedure for military justice, it is necessary to consider the racial characteristics, traditions, and heritage of the people to be judged and tried thereby. One system which may be perfectly satisfactory to one race of people may be entirely unsuited to another. Our close kinship in habits of thought, systems of laws, racial characteristics, and inheritance may well cause us to look to the British system rather than that of any other nation. If the British system produces what is desired, to wit, morale and discipline with justice, it follows that more serious consideration should be given to that system than to other systems suited to other races different from, and adverse to, our race in the habits, customs, and traditions.

2. It is seriously questioned by many whether the Belgian Army had during the recent war the discipline which is desired in our Army. Many with whom we have talked do not seem to think that the Belgian Armies had such discipline. The answer to that question largely depends upon the viewpoint as to what good discipline is. Maj. W. W. Hoffman, American military attaché at Brussels, insists that the Belgian Army had discipline. As he aptly says, we must in viewing the question, consider the disadvantage under which the Belgians fought in this Great War. At the very outside their country was overrun by a neighboring country, overpowering in wealth and overwhelming in numbers. Their magnificent forts were, many of them, utterly destroyed in a few weeks by the most enormous guns ever used in warfare up to that time. Their whole country, save a very narrow strip, was overrun within the first few weeks of the war and held in the grasp of a powerful enemy. The Belgian soldiers for the most part were unable to know the fate of their loved ones at home. They held about 30 miles of the long battle line from the English Channel to Switzerland, which sector was located nearest the coast, in the lowest and most disagreeable portions of the trenches. All these things combine to destroy morale. More than that, over half of the Belgian people were Flemish, allied in a way by race with their enemies, who persistently sought to win them over in a clumsy sort of way. Nevertheless, and in spite of all of these disadvantages, the Belgians fought magnificently from the onset of the war, August 1, 1914, until the curtain fell on the drama by the armistice on November 11, 1918, and even afterwards, now when it was uncertain whether the peace treaty would be signed by the Germans, perhaps the Belgians stood ready more eagerly to continue the conflict than any of the other allied powers.

And yet in many ways the discipline of the Belgian Army is not what we desired and what we desire now in our Army.

As an illustration of this, one of the cases examined by the judicial commission the day it was attended by me in Brussels was that of a corporal, who during the period of hostilities was ordered to report in the rear, from the front line where he was serving, to a school for sergeants. Upon the completion of the course of training, he, a corporal, would have been promoted and made a sergeant. He refused to obey the order, and never did obey it. He stated, in refusing to obey the order, that he was well qualified to act as a corporal and could there best serve his Government in the front-line trenches, and that he did not want to go to the rear while fighting was in progress. A complaint was made against him, but no steps taken to prosecute until months later in June, 1919, the matter was investigated by this judicial commission. At the preliminary administrative inquiry in the regiment he was asked if he regretted his action in refusing to obey the order of his superior officer, and he replied that he did not. In one sense the refusal of the soldier to go to the rear to a place of safety and for the purpose of winning promotion was commendable, and yet if the inferior is to substitute his idea of the rightfulness or the wrongfulness of each order issued him, there could be no discipline in any army. Yet the auditeur militaire told me that unquestionably this man, although he must go to trial before a court-martial, would be acquitted.

3. A troublesome condition in connection with the administration of military justice in Belgium consists in the fact that all of their laws and regulations are written both in French and Flemish. Although a majority of the population is Flemish, most of those high in position of state, whether Flemish or Wallon, speak the French language and understand with difficulty the Flemish as it is spoken. The first question asked each accused on appearing before a military tribunal is whether he desires to be interrogated in French or Flemish. Each section of the population, with great determination, clings to its language.

CONCLUSION.

It is stated by Maj. Jacques van Ackere, whose observations appear as an exhibit to this report, that the system of punishment in force in each of the armies engaged in this great war proved to be a failure in time of war. Founded on the experience of the Belgians in this war, he has suggested a system of punishment for use only in time of war, which appears to me to be exceedingly logical and valuable. Briefly stated, it is as follows, to wit: For a few military crimes of heinous character, such as treason, spying, and the taking of deliberate steps to start a stampede of soldiers, the death penalty should be carried into execution without mercy. For practically all other military offenses and many civil offenses which do not in civil life require the death penalty, on conviction of first offense the accused should be sentenced to serve for a term in a disciplinary battalion, where the accused may wipe out the disgrace of the trial and conviction and rehabilitate himself in his own eyes and in the eyes of his country. Whatever may be the term to which the accused on conviction may have been sentenced, he may rehabilitate himself in one of three methods and be restored to his former regiment and his colors, to wit: First, by some conspicuous act of bravery; second, by receiving a wound at the hands of the enemy; and, third, by good service for a period of eight months or a year. This service in the disciplinary battalion is to be served at the front, and not in the rear, in a place of greater safety than that in which the other and obedient soldiers are compelled to serve. If the soldier thus rehabilitates himself, the very fact of his conviction is wiped out, and across the face of the judgment on the judgment roll on which is recorded his guilt is written in red ink the word "rehabilitated," after which no reference to such judgment can ever be made, or copy of same obtained, nor can his decorations previously won, if any, be taken from him.

If, however, in the disciplinary battalion the soldier purposely again violates the laws, on conviction his arms should be taken from him and he should be placed at hard labor at the front in a penal battalion with all privileges taken from him, and this service should be rendered in the front-line trenches in places as dangerous or more dangerous than those occupied by good soldiers in their regular regiments.

Opportunity should be granted likewise to the soldier to win his way back from the corrective or penal battalion to the disciplinary battalion and thence to his regiment. If, however, the soldier in the penal or corrective battalion further violates the laws, military or civil, thus throwing away such opportunity of rehabilitation and showing evidence of being incorrigible, he should then be shot. A few executions would be all that would be necessary to curb such a spirit.

This system, in a way, was adopted and used toward the close of the war in the Belgian Army and proved highly efficacious, and, in the opinion of this distinguished soldier and lawyer, is the solution of the problem and the blazing of the way which will have to be followed in times of war in the future by other nations. It resembles in a marked degree, in a way, our disciplinary barracks, of which he had no knowledge, and apparently their system was worked out separately and apart from any knowledge of our system, above referred to, in the United States.

Whether we continue our present view of the status of courts-martial, or adopt the other view referred to heretofore repeatedly in this report, it appears to me that the system pointed out by Maj. van Ackere is worthy of serious consideration.

In your (Lieut. Col. W. C. Rigby's) report heretofore made and submitted to the Judge Advocate General, in the analysis of the practice and procedure of military justice, you have subdivided the subject matter into 26 subdivisions. By reason of the exhaustive nature of such analysis, and further by reason of the fact that by following such analysis in this report, anyone investigating the subject may easily find considered in the same numbered subheadings the same subject matter. I beg leave to present to you the result of my investigation under such subheadings:

I. PRELIMINARY INVESTIGATION OF THE ACCUSED.

In practice the preliminary examination in the Belgian system is very elaborate. It is performed by a commission styled a judiciary commission, or, as interpreted in some instances, judicial commission. The statutes creating such commission are found in articles 35, 36, 37, 38, 39, 40, 41, 42, 43, and 44 of the code of military penal procedure of the Belgian Army, the English translation of which code is filed with this report, marked "Exhibit No. —."

This judicial commission is composed of three members. Two are line officers of the Belgian Army and one is a military auditeur who is appointed from civil life by the King, must be 30 years of age, and having the degree of doctor of laws. Each military auditeur is appointed for an indefinite period and is removable solely by the King.

The preliminary investigations made by these commissions are extremely exhaustive, full, and complete. They are made in an informal manner, being conducted practically entirely by the military auditeur, a trained lawyer, and the Belgian officers with whom I conferred think it of great benefit from many standpoints.

I attended a sitting of such commission in Brussels, Belgium, and immediately after leaving the commission dictated a complete description of the sitting of the commission, together with a statement of their practices and customs, which description I file herewith as Exhibit No. — for your consideration.

I was told, however, by these Belgian officers in interview with them, that while these complete preliminary investigations are exceedingly valuable, yet in time of war they have serious drawbacks and entail serious inconveniences. The chief of these is in the delay caused thereby. Every officer to whatever army he may belong, with whom I have discussed this matter of military discipline, places as the first and perhaps the prime requisite of such administration of military justice the having the punishment follow swiftly upon the commission of the offense. Delay in infliction of punishment causes it to lose a large portion of its disciplinary effect. Baron de Broqueville, former minister of war of Belgium, in his interview with me on June 13, 1919, made the following statement with reference thereto, to wit: "However, I wish to emphasize that there is a difference between courts-martial in war time and in peace time. The thorough preliminary investigation, while of the highest value in either time, must not cause any delay in war time in proceedings of justice." (See Exhibit No. —, p. —.)

Likewise Commandant Jacques van Ackere, auditeur militaire en compagnie, in his interview with me on May 29, 1919, had the following to say: "In examining this system of preliminary investigation, one must make a distinction between peace time and war time military justice. In time of peace, in the administration of military justice the proceedings were made as far as possible according to the law, in having the complete preliminary investigation; but in war time the system of having a preliminary investigation sometimes presents three serious inconveniences. In the first place, too much time may elapse before the accused is brought to trial—from 15 days to three weeks. The preliminary investigation may take place at a certain point and witness may be heard, but in the war of movement, the armies will have traveled, and before the accused is brought to trial the witnesses may have been taken away, and it may be difficult to bring them back. The second inconvenience is that in war time military justice must be rapid.

Punishment must be exemplary, especially in such infractions of discipline as desertion, cowardice, etc., which must be judged as rapidly as possible, so that judgment may be made. The third inconvenience that might be mentioned is that offenses in time of war consist mostly of having been caught in the act of sleeping on post, desertion, etc. In cases of that type, all the evidence is right at hand in the beginning, and it is not necessary to have a double preliminary investigation; but there are other cases which are delicate, and in those cases the judicial inquiry is of value. The best system would be to have the auditeur militaire decide as to whether there should be a preliminary investigation. For instance, in cases of violation of military law such as desertion or sleeping on post, particularly when the accused acknowledges his having done so, the auditeur militaire should have the power to try the case immediately before the court-martial. In case the auditeur militaire decides that the case is not very clear he would bring the case before the Judiciary Commission for preliminary investigation. It could further be noted that when the court-martial finds that the case is not sufficiently clear it may order a further preliminary investigation before proceeding further." (See Exhibit No. —, p. —.) It seems to me that this last suggestion of Commandant van Ackere, coming as it does from such a distinguished lawyer in civil life and from a soldier with such extended experience as was had by him, both in defending accused before the military courts and later on during the war in prosecuting them, should have very great weight. I am inclined to believe that he states the basis for the correct procedure.

There has not yet been furnished to me the statistics asked for in your elaborate questionnaire of the Belgian Government. It is doubtful to me whether such statistics can ever be furnished in view of the disorder consequent upon the actual occupation of practically all of the Belgian territory by the enemy, and the destruction of all records upon which the enemy could lay their hands. The records of trials by courts-martial during the war in the field have been returned to Brussels, but are stored away in boxes and as yet the Government has not been able to find opportunity to analyze them. At my instance, however, a specific request was made from the various courts-martial for such statistics as they could give, showing the percentage of acquittals during the various years of the war, and one such report has been shown me, but this is not in my hands at this time. All of these reports will be turned in at one time. This report showed during some years an extremely high rate of acquittals, running in some instances between 20 and 30 per cent, and practically none less than 10 per cent for any year. The estimate made by Commandant van Ackere was that the percentage of acquittals during the entire war would be somewhere between 10 and 20 per cent rather than 20. Apparently it does not follow, then, that the elaborate preliminary investigation cuts to a very low rate the percentage of acquittals.

My own experience of about 20 years in the criminal practice in the courts of my native State has led me to believe that 12 per cent of acquittals shown in the trials before our courts-martial during the war is very moderate, as it is far less than the percentage of acquittals in our State courts. There are many cases where the testimony for the prosecution and for the defense is in absolute conflict, and whether conviction of the accused is to be had or not depends upon the determination of the issue of fact which must be settled by the court. In the total number of cases tried the 12 per cent of acquittals represent some of the cases determined in favor of the accused. Rather to my mind that percentage indicates that the testimony of the accused is given due weight, and the accused is getting a fair deal rather than that convictions follow in practically all the cases in which charges are preferred by commissioned officers and which are referred to courts for trial.

It is also recommended by Maj. van Ackere that the services of the two military members of the military commission should be eliminated, and that the entire investigation be made by the military auditeur. In practice these two line officers take practically no part in the investigation. In time of war it is exceedingly difficult to obtain them, their time being so fully occupied by their other duties. In cases where it is necessary especially that military customs or procedure should be considered in connection with the evidence Commandant van Ackere recommends that the military auditeur call in line or staff officers as witnesses as experts on those questions. It is his belief that in the vast majority of cases the presence of the line officers is unnecessary and a useless consumption of their time. If this be true, the preliminary investigation becomes practically that provided for in our procedure, to wit, the investigation of the judge advocate of the division.

The practice in the Belgian Army, however, has been to make an elaborate investigation without detailed directions in the statute as to how it shall be done. In our own Army, according to my information, in some divisions the preliminary investigations have been carefully made while in others the work has not been so carefully done. The thoroughness with which the investigation was made depended upon the personnel of the judge advocate and the views of the commanding general whom he was to advise. It appears to me, therefore, that the recommendation made of elaborating the manner in which the preliminary investigation shall be made, as is done in the British procedure, would be a wise one.

II. SUMMARY DISCIPLINARY PUNISHMENT BY COMMANDING OFFICER, WITHOUT THE INTERVENTION OF A COURT-MARTIAL.

The powers granted to commanding officers of summary disciplinary punishment in the Belgian Army are very extensive. They are set forth in the Rules and Regulations of Discipline, an English translation of which book is filed herewith, marked Exhibit No. —. The punishments which may be thus inflicted are as follows, to wit:

For officers, whatever their rank, article 28.—(1) Reprimand; (2) arrest for a period not longer than 21 days; (3) arrest under close confinement for a term not exceeding 2 weeks.<sup>1</sup>

For noncommissioned officers, article 29.—(1) Reprimand; (2) confinement to camp for a term not exceeding 21 days; (3) confinement to quarters for a term not exceeding two weeks; (4) placing in solitary confinement ("cachot," not exceeding a week.

For all other soldiers, article 30.—(1) Reprimand; (2) confinement to camp for a term not exceeding 21 days; (3) confinement in the guardhouse for a term not exceeding two weeks; (4) placing in solitary confinement ("cachot," dungeon) for a term not exceeding a week.

Article 31.—(a) Soldiers who, by reiterated infractions, prove that they are not amenable by means of simple discipline, and who persevere in spreading trouble and giving a continual bad example in the corps to which they belong, shall be placed in the special corps;<sup>1</sup> (b) those who give proof that they are absolutely incorrigible or unworthy of wearing the uniform shall be cashiered from the army.<sup>1</sup>

In 1830 corporal punishment was abolished in the Belgian army by governmental decree. Prior to that time, corporal punishment could be inflicted as summary disciplinary punishment without the intervention of a court-martial. The following are the provisions of the code of such rules of discipline with reference to who can inflict the above punishment:

The right to punish.—(a) The right to determine punishments for soldiers of all grades belongs to general officers; to commanders of divisions, brigades, regiment, battalion, company, district, or mobile force of the gendarmerie, each one for the fraction or the part of the service that is commanded by him, be it normally, on occasional service, or temporarily.

Reprimands and provisional arrests may be inflicted by any superior on his inferior.

Confinement to camp for a term not exceeding a week may be inflicted on officers by the commander of the company, or by the officers on inferiors. Confinement to camp over a week and up to three weeks may be inflicted by commanders of battalions or by higher authorities.

Arrest under confinement for officers, guardhouse sentences for noncommissioned officers, and solitary confinement for all other soldiers may be inflicted only by chiefs of corps, commanders of brigades and divisions, or authorities that have equal power, and by generals.

An elaborate system of reports upon such disciplinary punishment is prescribed. It is further provided that "in every case before being punished, the culprit shall be allowed to give an explanation and to defend himself either orally or in writing, according to the circumstances."

Additional disciplinary measures which may be inflicted summarily are the following, to wit:

Disciplinary measures.—Article 55.—Independently of the punishments mentioned in chapter 3, the following disciplinary measures may be inflicted:

A. To officers.—(1) Reprimand; (2) reprimand by the minister of war; (3) erasure of name from the active list; (4) suspension; (5) loss of office; (6) loss of grade.

B. To sergeants.—(1) Deprivation of high pay; (2) temporary deprivation of supplementary remuneration; (3) deprivation of certain favors and advantages; (4) deprivation of extra pay, and additional pay for reenlistment; (5) demotion; (6) reduction to ranks; (7) recall and maintenance under arms.

C. To corporals.—(1) Deprivation of high pay; (2) temporary deprivation of supplementary remuneration; (3) deprivation of certain favors and advantages; (4) deprivation of extra pay and additional pay for reenlistment; (5) demotion and maintenance under arms.

D. To soldiers.—(1) Deprivation of high pay; (2) temporary deprivation of supplementary remuneration; (3) deprivation of certain favors and advantages; (4) deprivation of extra pay and additional pay for reenlistment; (5) deprivation of the right to be either drummer or trumpeter; (6) incorporation in the special corps; (7) maintenance under arms; (8) dishonorable discharge.

A commanding officer may have the advice of a court of discipline in inflicting his punishment, the provisions governing which are as follows, to wit:

Article 33.—Courts of discipline (disciplinary courts) charged with the advising upon such matters as the deprivation of grade and demotion of sergeants and sergeant majors (under officers), the incorporation of soldiers into the special corps or dishonorable discharge, shall be composed of the following personnel: One major (presiding), one captain, two lieutenants, one sergeant major or sergeant senior to the offender.

If the offender is the highest ranking sergeant major of the corps, this last shall be replaced by a lieutenant.

These places shall be filled by each officer and noncommissioned officer in turn.

Those designated by the commandant of the place shall be those that belong to the corps or troop of the garrison.

Article 84.—In no case may the following fill any of the places in such court: (a) The officer commanding the detachment; (b) the officer commanding the battalion nor the officers of the offender's company; (c) officers directly over the offender; (d) the officer or noncommissioned officer who reported the infraction and caused the offender to appear before the court. In default of a major the disciplinary court may have two captains, the senior of which shall preside.

The rules and regulations for the procedure of such courts of discipline are provided in extenso.

All soldiers punished with disciplinary punishment summarily have a right of appeal to the higher officers, such procedure being set forth in articles 101, 102, and 110 of the Rules and Regulations of Discipline, hereinbefore mentioned as Exhibit No. — hereto

In the opinion of the Belgian officers interviewed, this system of summary disciplinary punishment is of the very largest and highest benefit in the enforcement of discipline. The fact that the punishment follows practically immediately on the commission of the offense, even though the punishment be not as severe as that meted out by a court-martial, makes such punishment exceedingly effective and efficacious.

Maj. van Ackere is of the opinion that even the broad punishment provided in these rules and regulations of discipline may be further enlarged with benefit to the discipline of the service, and it is his opinion that, inasmuch as appeals are freely granted, no injustice will be done in such punishment of infractions of discipline.

Certain it is that the power to punish summarily to such a large degree must, in practice in the Belgian Army, and does cut down very extensively the number of trials by courts-martial, with all the attending circumstances of delay and inconvenience to the service in the taking of the time of officers in hearing the trial of such offenses.

I believe that changes leading to such a system may well be carefully considered as to its advisability for introduction into the penal system of the armies of the United States. (See Rules and Regulations of Discipline, Ch. III.)

III. CONSIDERATION OF, AND REPORT UPON, PRELIMINARY INVESTIGATION: ATTENDANT REQUIREMENTS: ORDERING ACCUSED TO TRIAL.

As pretty fully set forth hereinbefore in this report (see pp.        to pp. inclusive), the report of the judicial commission recommending trial is made to the commanding officer for the division in which accused is serving. Such commanding officer is not bound to follow the recommendation made by such commission, but in practice practically always does so.

In case the accusation was made by a civilian, a finding of the judicial commission that the accused should not be prosecuted is final and no trial can be had upon such charge.

In case, however, of a charge preferred through military channels, such a recommendation, however, to the commanding general, to the effect that the accused should not be tried, need not be followed by the commanding general and he is at liberty to order the case for trial in spite of the adverse finding of the judicial commission. This is seldom done, but has been done. The auditeur militaire who sat upon the judicial commission, and makes the recommendation, is the same auditeur militaire who prosecutes the case before the court-martial, if ordered there for trial. He has full authority, and sometimes uses that authority, to advise the court-martial to bring in a verdict of acquittal when the case has been ordered for trial by the commanding general over the adverse finding of the judicial commission. (See Military Penal Code, Ch. V.)

IV. COMPOSITION OF THE COURT.

(a) Permanence.—The military officers composing the judicial commission, the court-martial, and the cour militaire, sit for a period of one month, unless sooner relieved, because of change of station or disqualifications for any other cause. The auditeur militaire as a member of the judicial commission sits indefinitely, being appointed for an indeterminate time. For the permanent courts this means appointment for life.

The civil member of the court-martial sits for a period of three years.

The civil member of the cour militaire, being appointed for life, sits for an indefinite period with that court.

(b) Personnel.—The personnel of the court making the preliminary investigation—the judicial commission—is, first, the auditeur militaire, who presides and questions the witnesses; and second, two army officers, a captain and a lieutenant.

The court-martial (conseil de guerre) consists of five members, four of whom are army officers of the line, of rank usually lieutenant colonel and less, and one civil member who in authority is next to the president of the court.

The cour militaire is composed of five members, four of whom are army officers of the line and one a civil judge appointed for life, who is entitled to the honors due to a general and who in practice wears the uniform of a general. The army officers have the following rank, to wit: One lieutenant general or one major general, one colonel or lieutenant colonel, and two majors.

(c) Independence of convening authority.—The members of the three courts of Belgium are absolutely independent of any convening authority. No executive officer can exercise any authority whatsoever over them, and if any officer undertook to influence the decision of a court in any case he would be subject to punishment for so doing. The courts are absolutely, in theory and practice, independent of any executive authority. Nevertheless, the convening general has the power, if he sees fit, to suspend any sentence imposed by the court.

(d) Qualifications of judges, experience, rank, time in service, previous instruction.—Each of these subheads has been answered above under heads (a), (b), and (c), except that the civil judges appointed to serve on these courts must have had 10 years' experience as a judge on the civil bench and have the degree of doctor of laws. (See Military Penal Code, Ch. II.)

V. ASSESSOR TO THE COURT: JUDGE ADVOCATE OR COMMISSAIRE.

(a) Appointment.—The Belgian officer corresponding to the above titles appearing before the court-martial is termed an auditeur militaire and the officer appearing before the cour militaire, so corresponding, is the auditeur general or his assistants, termed substitute auditeurs general. These are appointed by the King for life.

(b) Position, duties, impartiality.—The position of auditeur militaire is an honorable one, and carries with it the rank of a field officer. The position of auditeur general is one of the highest in dignity and authority, and the present auditeur general, when appointed, had long been a civil judge of the highest civilian court of appeals in Belgium. The duties of the auditeur militaire are to investigate cases as a member of the judicial commission, and to prosecute such cases before a court-martial. He is subject to the direction of the auditeur general and reports to him. The auditeur general not only has the direction of the auditeurs militaire, but either personally or through his assistants, prosecutes all cases on appeal before the cour militaire, and all cases triable there as a court of original jurisdiction. He also recommends to the King what, if any, clemency, shall be shown those convicted, upon their application for clemency. In practice the King accepts the recommendations of the auditeur general and practically always does as recommended by him with reference to such clemency. While the auditeur militaire and the auditeur general are apparently in no sense, in their prosecutions, vindictive, they in truth and in fact, represent the Government and the interests of the accused are looked after by the advocate who represents him.

(c) Legal attainments required.—As above set forth, the auditeur militaire must be 30 years of age or above and a doctor of laws. The auditeur general must be a doctor of laws and 35 years of age.

(d) Powers, including power to give authoritative advice to the court.—The auditeur militaire and the auditeur general are held in the highest esteem, as to their legal learning and generally, by the court; but the civil member of the court-martial and of the cour militaire, in practice, advises the court upon the legal principles and practice and procedure on the questions arising before the court, they being especially appointed for that purpose. The power of the prosecuting officers for the government, then, do not include the right to decide for the court what the law is, but they may submit their opinions of the law to the court, just as can the advocate for the accused. (See Military Penal Code, Title II, Ch. IV.)

VI. PROSECUTOR.

(a) Appointment, powers, duties.—The prosecution is conducted in the court-martial by the auditeur militaire and before the cour militaire by the auditeur general or one of his assistants. Their appointment, powers, and duties are all described in subdivision 5.

(b) Is he also a judicial officer or representative of the government or of the department of justice?—The auditeur militaire and the auditeur general are not judicial officers in the sense that they are members of the court or that their advice on questions of law must be taken by the court. They represent the government in the prosecution, and the auditeurs militaires are under the direction and supervision of the auditeur general, who is the head of the department of justice of the army. (See Military Penal Code, Title II, Ch. IV.)

VII. COUNSEL FOR ACCUSED.

The counsel for the accused, though not required so to be by the statutes, is, in practice, always a practicing lawyer or advocate. The accused may employ his own advocate if he be able financially to do so. If not, in time of peace, an advocate is designated by the battonnier, or president of the bar association, for his defense, and, in time of war, an advocate is designated by the president of the court sitting for the trial of the accused, usually a lawyer serving in the division of the accused, but sometimes a civilian advocate is secured by such president of the court. When so designated by the battonnier or the president of the court, the advocate serves without compensation. The advocate in practice appears in his black robes of office and, whether soldier or civilian, appears as an advocate. The question of rank of the advocate, if any, in the army, seems to cut no figure whatsoever.

VIII. CLOSING COURT FOR FINDINGS AND SENTENCE.

(a) Vote required.—The guilt or innocence of the defendant, the existence of aggravating circumstances or of extenuating circumstances, is controlled by a majority vote. Formerly the vote was taken openly, the civil judge who is a member of the court first expressing his opinion on each of these questions, and then afterwards the military officials, beginning with the junior in rank. (See p. —, Exhibit No. —, interview with Gen. de Ceuninck.) During the progress of the war, however, a law decree was entered by Albert, King of the Belgians (see Exhibit No. —), of which article 8 is as follows, to wit:

“ART. 8. The decisions of the military court and courts-martial are taken by majority of votes. Voting must be done by secret ballot, as much for the principal fact and the aggravating circumstances as for the existence of extenuating circumstances, and the application, if need be, of the conditional condemnation. Each judge gives his opinion by depositing in the ballot box a bulletin bearing the words ‘Yes’ or ‘No.’”

(b) Method of taking the vote.—This subhead is answered by the quotation just last above made on article 8.

IX. CHARACTER OF SENTENCES.

Although the statistics with reference to the sentences imposed during the last war are not yet available for the Belgian Armies for the reasons heretofore set forth in this report, it is manifest that the sentences were not so severe as those of their allies, but was greater than those imposed by the courts-martial of the United States Army in some respects. For purely military offenses there were imposed 126 death sentences of which 14 were actually carried into effect, and 112 commuted by the King. The sentences to imprisonment appeared not to have been for the length of time imposed in the armies of the United States. This seems, however, not to have been due to any tenderness toward the accused, but rather to the desire to have the soldier back in the line where he could render active service to his country, so sorely beset, at the earliest possible date. To serve a sentence in prison at hard labor was less of a hardship in actual suffering than that endured by the good soldier, fighting desperately in the flooded trenches held by the Belgians near the English Channel. So unjust did it appear to the Belgian officials that the malefactors should work in safety in the rear in prison in large numbers, while the brave and good soldiers who had committed no offenses should sustain greater hardships at the front, that before the termination of the war by the armistice, a decree was promulgated by the King suspending the enforcement of all imprisonment of offenders until the conclusion of the war. By this de-free thousands of soldiers were returned to the ranks where they were so sorely needed by the Belgian Government. The system of punishment suggested by Maj. van Ackere, hereinbefore set forth in time of war, I repeat, is worthy of the most serious consideration. (See p. — of this report.)

X. ANNOUNCEMENT (OR NOT) OF SENTENCE AT CONCLUSION OF TRIAL.

- (a) Of acquittal.
- (b) Of conviction.

Immediately at the conclusion of the trial before either the courts-martial or the cour militaire in cases of original jurisdiction, the decision of the court is announced.

XI. AUTHENTICATION OF RECORD.

There is no such record of each trial by courts-martial or the cour militaire as is prepared of the trials before our general courts-martial. There is no stenographer who takes down in shorthand the testimony and afterwards transcribes it as a part of the record. The record consists of a dossier which comprises a large number of original papers in a folder such as is commonly used for the filing of papers in the filing cabinet of a lawyer in America. (For an exact copy of such dossier see Exhibit — to this report.)

XII. APPROVAL OR CONFIRMATION.

- (a) Necessity of (yes or no).
- (b) By whom.

The judgment of the courts-martial and of the cour militaire requires the approval or confirmation of no one. It is a decree, final in effect, unless appealed from in the case of the courts-martial. However, the commanding general has the right to suspend the execution of the sentence if he so desires.

XIII. APPEAL AND REVIEW.

APPEAL.

(a) Right to.—The right to appeal exists in all cases in first, the accused, second in the Government, whether the decree be a conviction or an acquittal, and third, where some person is injured in his property, appeal may be taken by such person with reference to the recompense to be made to him as to his property rights, but such a person can not take an appeal which can operate, on appeal, to change or modify in any way, the guilt or innocence, or extent of punishment, of the accused.

(b) Necessity of.—Any one of the three parties named above need not appeal unless he so desires. If not appealed from, however, there is no automatic appeal or revision by any court or officer.

(c) Time allowed for.—The appeal if taken by the accused, the auditeur militaire for the Government, or the person injured in his property rights, must be taken within three days. If the appeal be by the Government through the auditeur general, such appeal must be perfected within 15 days.

REVIEW WITHOUT APPEAL.

There is no review without appeal in the Belgian system.

XIV. COURT OF REVIEW.

(a) Approving or confirming authority.—As above stated there is no approving or confirming authority, the decree of the court being final.

(b) Judge advocate general.—The auditeur general, corresponding in a way to the Judge Advocate General of the United States Army, has no power of review nor power to equalize sentences, nor power to reverse or remand any case.

(c) Formal court of revision.—Under subhead 4 above entitled composition or review nor power to equalize sentences, nor power to reverse or remand any is set forth the fact that the cour militaire is in fact and in truth, in theory and in practice, a court of appeal. (See also description of this court in brief narrative description of the Belgian system hereinbefore in this report, page —thereof.)

XV. STAY OF EXECUTION DURING REVIEW.

Death sentences are not executed pending review before the cour militaire. Accused, sentenced in the courts-martial to imprisonment, remain in prison pending the appeal. (For time usually elapses pending appeal see report hereinbefore, p.—.)

XVI. EXECUTION OF THE SENTENCE.

Unless suspended by the commanding general of the division of the accused, or stayed by appeal, the sentence is immediately put into execution.

XVII. MAXIMUM LIMITS OF PUNISHMENT.

(a) In peace.—At the beginning of the present war in Belgium, the limits were fixed in a good many cases, not only maximum but minimum. By reason of the experience had during the war, however, in 1918 the law was changed so that the court could fix the penalty from the maximum, which might be death, down to any minimum. It was found especially that to have a minimum penalty which was higher than the court thought should be inflicted caused the court to stultify itself in its findings. For instance, where there were violations which took place in the presence of the enemy, and the minimum penalty for same was heavy, the court would arbitrarily find that the offenses did not take place in the presence of the enemy, so as to save the soldier the minimum penalty, which they believed too severe, when, in fact, they did take place in the presence of the enemy. Maj. van Ackere was decidedly of the opinion, based on his experiences during the war, that the maximum should be that fixed by the law and there should be no minimum less than that fixed by the law, and that the greatest elasticity in punishment and discretion in the court should exist. He believed this absolutely necessary in order that the penalties which the varying circumstances of the cases demanded might be adjudged. (See p. —, Exhibit No. —, interview with Maj. van Ackere.)

(b) In war.—For (1) military offenses; (2) ordinary crimes and offenses. This subhead has been discussed under subhead (a) above.

STATISTICS OF ACTUAL PUNISHMENT AWARDED.

(a) In peace.

(b) In war.

Statistics on this subject have not been submitted to us, although requested. If furnished prior to delivery of this report to you, they will be marked "Exhibit — to this report."

XVIII. STANDARDIZATION OF PUNISHMENTS.

(a) Existence.—There appears to be no effort made, after the infliction of punishment by the courts-martial, to standardize such punishments. Appeals may be taken to the cour militaire, but usually not for the purpose of complaining of the severity of the punishment. In practice, appeals for clemency are made to the King, who acts upon the same upon the advice of the auditeur general.

(b) Means for assuring.—As stated above, the only means for assuring standardization of punishment is by appeal for clemency to the King, and apparently such appeals are not based on the ground of standardization but of mitigation of such punishment.

(c) Desirability.—According to Maj. van Ackere, punishments can not and should not be standardized, either by limitations of punishment, by maximum and minimum, or any other way. Exactly the same offenses committed under different circumstances make it necessary that the punishments should widely differ if justice is to be properly administered. For instance, it was his opinion that even the sleeping on post of a sentry in the face of the enemy in time of war on an active sector should sometimes be very lightly punished, where the soldier had a good record for military service and in civil life, and where he had performed exhausting laborious duties the previous day, to such an extent that he was absolutely physically exhausted and was, by the most powerful exertion of his will power, unable to maintain consciousness. Although frequently the death sentence was pronounced and executed in the armies of Europe in this present war for such an offense, under the above circumstances it was Maj. van Ackere's idea that practically no punishment whatsoever should be inflicted. This illustration of his makes clear his contention and settled belief, based upon the experiences of this war, that standardization of punishments is not the wisest plan with which to reach exact justice or the nearest possible approach to that standard.

XIX. REVISION OR REVIEW OF ACQUITTALS.

The Government, through the auditeur militaire within three days, or through the auditeur general in 15 days, may appeal from a decision of the courts-martial to the cour militaire against an acquittal of an accused. The auditeur general, Baron van Nyevelt believed that such right was of the greatest benefit to the Government and no wrong whatsoever to the accused. He gave as an illustration of the wisdom and justice of such right, a case where the courts-martial held an improper belief as to the law controlling some certain acts as not constituting treason, such as the selling of gold to the German authorities in Belgium. The possession of this gold was absolutely necessary to Germany in order to pay the bills contracted in foreign countries in the prosecution of the war, and to form a reserve for the protection of the paper money issued by the Government. An acquittal by a courts-martial on such charge was followed by an appeal by the Government to the cour militaire, which court reversed the ruling of the lower court. Thus, in a very large class of offenders by the reversal, they were tried and the trials resulted in the punishment of the guilty parties. If the Government had not the right of appeal, the entire class of offenders described above would have gone unwhipped of justice.

XX. INCREASING PUNISHMENT—WEIGHT OF SENTENCE.

(a) On revision.—There is no revision of a judgment of a Belgian military court.

(b) On new trial.—On an appeal by the accused or the person injured in his property rights, the cour militaire can not increase the penalty inflicted over that pronounced by the courts-martial. On an appeal taken by the Government, however, the cour militaire can increase the penalty adjudged over that adjudged by the courts-martial. Likewise, if a new trial is ordered by the courts-martial in its entirety on an appeal taken to the cour militaire for the Government, an increased punishment can be adjudged by said courts-martial upon the new hearing.

XXI. NEW TRIAL.

(a) Right.—At the present time (and at the conclusion of the war by the signing of the armistice on November 11, 1918), the absolute right exists in the Government, the accused and the person injured in his property rights to appeal from the decision of the courts-martial to the cour militaire. However, as above stated, herein before, the right of the person injured in his property is only entitled to a revision of such pecuniary compensation to him and not to any chance of the punishment of the offender. During a short period of the war, on account of the exigencies of the service, the right of appeal was limited to certain classes of cases, but the right was soon extended so that all classes of cases were appealable.

(b) Conditions.—The right of appeal as set forth in above head (a) is unconditional except as to the time limit, to wit, such appeal must be taken by the accused, the person injured in his property rights or the Government acting through the auditeur militaire within three days, while an appeal for the Government taken by the auditeur general must be taken within 15 days.

(c) Desirability.—It is the belief of most of the Belgian officials, including Maj. van Ackere, based upon their experience in this war, that, in time of war, it is not desirable to grant appeals at all except, if any exception be made, on the question of the jurisdiction of the court. Baron de Broqueville, former minister of war, on this subject stated as follows, to wit, "It is my firm conviction that in time of war there should be no appeal at all from any courts-martial decision; but I wish to emphasize again that in time of war the preliminary instruction (investigation) should be very thorough, so that the court

(b) Conditions.—The right of appeal as set forth in above head (a) is unconditional except as to the time limit, to wit, such appeal must be taken by the accused, the person injured in his property rights or the Government acting through the auditeur militaire within three days, while an appeal for the Government taken by the auditeur general must be taken within 15 days.

(c) Desirability.—It is the belief of most of the Belgian officials, including Maj. van Ackere, based upon their experience in this war, that, in time of war, it is not desirable to grant appeals at all except, if any exception be made, on the question of the jurisdiction of the court. Baron de Broqueville, former minister of war, on this subject stated as follows, to wit, "It is my firm conviction that in time of war there should be no appeal at all from any courts-martial decision; but I wish to emphasize again that in time of war the preliminary instruction (investigation) should be very thorough, so that the court would have all the necessary information and would proceed in a careful and just way. In that way there should be no necessity for any appeals in war time. It has been my personal observation during the present war that appeals from courts-martial have a bad influence on the discipline of the army. However, in peace time, appeals should be allowed to a higher court from courts-martial." (See Exhibit —, p. —, interview with Baron de Broqueville, June 13, 1919.)

XXII. SECURITY AGAINST SECOND TRIAL FOR SAME OFFENSE.

(a) "Once in jeopardy."—There appears to be no statutory or constitutional provision that prevents the trial of the accused a second time for the same offense where the decision of the court in the first instance was reversed upon appeal.

XXIII. JURISDICTION OF COURTS-MARTIAL OVER CIVIL OFFENSES COMMITTED BY PERSONS SUBJECT TO MILITARY LAW.

(a) In time of peace.—The provisions of Belgian law with reference to this subject are quite elaborate, being found in chapter 2 of the Code of Military Penal Procedure of the Belgian Army, articles 21 to 34, inclusive. (See Exhibit — hereto.) Briefly stated the military courts have full jurisdiction to try all soldiers for violation of civil offenses with the exception of the following matters, to wit:

"1. For anything concerning public taxes, direct or indirect.

"2. In matters concerning hunting and fishing.

"3. For the infractions of the laws and regulations concerning public roads, carriages, coach officers, post offices, gates, railway police, rural or forestry police; also for the infractions of the provincial and criminal regulations.

"4. In matters concerning duels, when a soldier fought with a nonmilitary person, even when the latter will not be prosecuted. The infractions indicated under No. 3 remain, however, subject to the military jurisdiction when they have been committed during the service, or by a soldier billeted by a particular person, upon request of the public authorities, or being a part of a troop marching on campaign."

Under some limited circumstances, the military courts have jurisdiction over civilians attached to the army, and joint offenders with military persons.

(b) In time of war.—The same provisions as above quoted seem to apply in time of war as well as in time of peace. However, in time of war, the jurisdictions of the courts-martial are greatly extended, particularly as to persons not in the military service. Practically during the present war all penal matters of both civilians and soldiers were settled by the military tribunals.

XXIV. INSANITY.

The code of military penal procedure seems to be silent on military procedure in cases of insanity. The practice is described by Baron van Nyevelt in his interview (see Exhibit No. —, p. —) in the following to wit:

"Q. If a question of the insanity of the accused arises, is that question of insanity settled at this preliminary hearing, or is that settled before the courts-martial; and if so, in either case, what method of procedure do they so ascertain the sanity or insanity of the accused?—A. In the beginning of the preliminary inquiry, the question is always put as to whether the man is sane or insane, and it is a medical officer belonging to his regiment who gives the first decision as to his sanity or insanity.

"Q. Are any other medical experts called in if the matter is still in doubt in addition to the surgeon of the regiment?—A. If during the preliminary hearing the question is raised as to the man's sanity, the judiciary commission has the right to name experts who are generally medical officers to examine as to the man's sanity.

"Q. This commission determines before taking this testimony that the accused is sane. Is his counsel permitted to raise the question later before the courts-martial or is that prohibited?—A. Yes; he has the right to raise the question again."

XXV. OFFICERS.

(a) Conduct unbecoming an officer and gentleman: I find no specific charge in the Belgian Code of Military Penal Procedure or in the rules and regulations of discipline or in the military penal code corresponding to the charge under the ninety-fifth article of war of "Conduct unbecoming an officer and a gentleman." In many of the cases of officers in our Army during the present war, charged under the ninety-fifth article, the specification therein set forth drunkenness in public and gross immorality. Not only does such misconduct in the Belgian Army not call for dismissal from service, but usually it is punished without the intervention of a courts-martial by summary disciplinary action, which punishments are described in article 28 and article 55 of the rules and regulations of discipline. (Exhibit No. — hereto.) Without in any wise expressing my own personal opinion in the matter, it is very evident that there is a very wide difference of opinion held in the Belgian service and in the American service as to what conduct is unbecoming an officer and a gentleman in the sense in which we use it under the ninety-fifth article of war. In private conversation with Belgian officers, not reduced to writing, and not filed as exhibits to this report, great astonishment was expressed at our dismissing from the Army in time of war an officer for being drunk and disorderly and being guilty of immoral conduct. It is my opinion that entirely too many cases against officers in the American Army were charged under the ninety-fifth article of war, and most of them should have been charged under the ninety-sixth article of war, where dismissal was not mandatory upon conviction. If the armies of our allies had proceeded upon the theory upon which we acted, with reference to this conduct, according to my best information, they would have deprived themselves in this conflict of some, and perhaps I may say very many, of their most competent officers. I do not wish to be understood in any way as condoning such misbehavior in an officer, but I do wish to be most thoroughly understood as believing that some other punishment than dismissal in most cases should be the penalty therefor.

(b) What charged as.

(c) Mandatory dismissal for.

Both of these subheads have been discussed under subhead (a) last above.

XXVI. DEATH SENTENCES—VOTE REQUIRED.

I am informed, as above stated in this report, that during the entire war only 126 death sentences were pronounced against soldiers of the Belgian Army, and that of these only 14 were carried into execution and the other 112 being commuted by the King. These death sentences I have reference to were solely for military offenses. You will recall that President Wilson, for our Army, did not permit any death sentences to be carried into effect during this war for strictly military offenses. The number of death sentences pronounced in the Belgian Army, however, for military offenses alone seems to have been infinitely less even proportionately than that in the armies of our other Allies. Their statistics as to death sentences in the Belgian Army are not available as yet.

There seems to be no difference in the vote required for the infliction of the death penalty from that for any other punishment—the majority vote being all that is required. (See art. 8, law decree, dated Feb. 24, 1917, Exhibit No. —.)

IN CONCLUSION.

From what I have learned in this investigation the administration of military justice in the Belgian Army during the present Great War has been carried on with distinguished ability, and the personnel of the department of military justice well deserve the bestowal of the distinguished-service medal at the hands of our Government. Especially is this true with reference to Baron (Gen.) van Zuylen van Nyevelt, auditeur general, and Maj. Jacques van Ackere, auditeur militaire, both of whom are men of distinguished ability and learning, and who have been indefatigable in their service to me in this investigation. I trust you may see it consistent with your duty to recommend to the Secretary of War, therefore, the bestowal of this medal upon each of the above-named officers.

I file as exhibits to this report the following documents, to wit:

(8) The powers conferred by this section shall be in addition to and not in derogation of any powers as to the mitigation, remission, commutation, or suspension of sentences conferred by the Army act, and a superior military authority under this act shall, as respects soldiers so employed as aforesaid, be an authority having power to mitigate, remit, or commute sentences of penal servitude or imprisonment under subsection (2) of section 57 of the army act.

(9) In this act the expression "superior military authority" means the officer commanding in chief of any force employed on active service beyond the seas, or any general officer commanding an army comprised in that force; the expression "competent military authority" means a superior military authority, or any general or other officer not below the rank of field officer duly authorized by a superior military authority.

CHAPTER 103, AN ACT TO AMEND THE ARMY (SUSPENSION OF SENTENCES) ACT, 1915. (JANUARY 27, 1916.)

Be it enacted by the King's most Excellent Majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the Lords Spiritual and Temporal, and Commons, in this present Parliament assembled, and by the authority of the same, as follows:

1. (1) The army council, and any general officer whom the army council may appoint for the purpose, shall be a superior military authority within the meaning of the army (suspension of sentences) act, 1915.

(2) Subsection (5) of section 1 of that act shall have effect, and shall be deemed always to have had effect, as if for the words "intervals of not less than three months" there were substituted the words "intervals of not more than three months," and subsection (8) as if for the words "superior authority" there were substituted the words "superior military authority."

2. This act may be cited as the army (suspension of sentences) amendment act, 1916, and the army (suspension of sentences) act, 1915, and this act may be cited together as the army (suspension of sentences) acts, 1915 and 1916.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. Those acts were drawn, I was told, by Maj. Gen. Childs, and he says in his statement, which is already in evidence, that by the operation of these acts between 30,000 and 40,000 men were restored to the colors during the war.

Senator WARREN. That was before the armistice?

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. Before the armistice; yes, sir. They were very well pleased with the results of the operation of this act. It is the act of 1915 and the amendment of 1916 which they call the "cat and mouse act." The gist of that plan is that the soldier sentenced, perhaps for a long term of confinement, has no certainty that he is thereby getting out of danger. He might be sentenced to a long period of imprisonment and suddenly find himself ordered to the front line, and then back into prison, and then perhaps again to the front line. He never had any feeling of safety from danger by reason of the fact that he had been sentenced to confinement, and the result was that they found after the men were ordered to the front once or twice that they were perfectly content to do their duty, and almost all of them made good soldiers.

Senator WARREN. The idea was that if they felt that they were redeemed they would suspend the sentence?

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. Yes.

Senator WARREN. Now, right there: How does that compare with the American troops? Was there any such percentage or any such number of sentences suspended?

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. No, Senator. I think I can give you the total number of suspensions. Of course it was much smaller, because we were just barely getting into it in a way, whereas the British had an army of four or five million men for the whole war.

Senator WARREN. Had we the same or, if not the same, something that corresponded with that procedure?

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. We could not suspend and then order back to prison and then suspend again and so bring the men back and forth, as they could. We did not have the "cat and mouse power," as they call it, and of which they think a great deal.

Senator WARREN. And in our case, if it was desired to put the men back into service and expose them to danger at the front, the sentence would be carried out in the first instance?

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. The sentence may be suspended at the time of its approval; but we do not have the right to send a man to prison and then take him out and send him to the front, and then to send him back the second time, and play with him, which was the object of the British suspended-sentence act, of which they think very highly.

I might say in connection with the figures on the restoration to duty from our disciplinary barracks which I have furnished, that every restoration from the barracks, as I am informed—of course I am only speaking now from information—with, I think, one exception—represents an actual shortening of the term. When a man is allowed to serve out his full term, of course, the dishonorable discharge takes effect at the end of his term, and he goes out of the service; and there has been only one case where he was allowed to serve until within one day before his term expired and was then restored to the colors. In one case they let him come back into the service in that way, without being discharged.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Where a man is restored to the colors, there is no provision of law which would prevent the War Department from then honorably discharging him the next day, is there?

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. Oh, no, sir; but it would be an honorable discharge.

Senator WARREN. Is it fair for us to assume that every one of these men who have gone to the disciplinary barracks afterwards received an honorable discharge?

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. You are speaking of men restored to the colors in this way. That depends on the men, when they come back. There is this "blue ticket;" and under the 139th and 150th Army Regulations, if he is an undesirable man, there is a way of letting him go without dishonorable or honorable discharge; simply "discharge."

Senator WARREN. He will not be fit for a soldier, but that does not debar him from getting the benefit of his service if there is anything accruing to him?

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. Not at all.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. If a man is sentenced to dishonorable discharge from the Army and forfeits his pay, that carries with it deprivation of citizenship?

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. Yes.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Now, in such a case, if a man is restored to the colors and gives a good account of himself, and then he is honorably discharged from the Army, that wipes out the former conviction, does it?

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. Yes, of course, Senator. Or, rather, in that case the sentence of dishonorable discharge never takes effect. That

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. Yes.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Now, in such a case, if a man is restored to the colors and gives a good account of himself, and then he is honorably discharged from the Army, that wipes out the former conviction, does it?

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. Yes, of course, Senator. Or, rather, in that case the sentence of dishonorable discharge never takes effect. That is the value of the suspension of the dishonorable discharge. With the suspended sentence there is the opportunity for the man if he makes good to get back into the service and simply wipe the dishonorable discharge out. It never does take effect.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Suppose the sentence is dishonorable discharge from the Army, and forfeiture of pay for a certain length of time, and imprisonment in the penitentiary for a given number of years. Now, in that event, while the man is restored to the colors and makes good, do you mean to say that that wipes out the dishonorable discharge.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. Of course, Senator, you are putting a case that is not likely to happen; that is, his restoration to the colors from the penitentiary. Almost invariably when a man is sentenced to the penitentiary, the sentence of dishonorable discharge is not suspended, but is executed, so that when he gets through his service in the penitentiary he is out of the Army.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Suppose before his time of imprisonment expires he is given permission to restore himself. Is it ever done? Do they ever say to a man in the penitentiary, "I will release you to the colors; you may reenlist"?

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. They do sometimes transfer men in the penitentiary to the disciplinary barracks if they think they are worthy of it for any reason, and then give them the opportunity to get back from the disciplinary barracks.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Does that wipe out the sentence of dishonorable discharge?

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. Where there has been an executed sentence of dishonorable discharge, where it was not suspended in the first place; no, it does not, as I understand it; but the man is given an opportunity to reenlist. The sentence that is absolutely wiped out is the suspended sentence, and almost all of the men who are sent to the disciplinary barracks are sent under a suspended sentence of dishonorable discharge. So that if they are restored, the sentence of dishonorable discharge never takes effect. As I remember, last year, the latter part of the year, it was running something like 65 per cent of all the dishonorable discharges were suspended, including in the total the penitentiary cases. Of course, in the case of a man who is sent to the penitentiary for a civil crime, like a crime against nature, or burglary, or something of that sort, the ordinary criminal that is sent to the penitentiary, that sentence is not very often suspended. Those men are not desirable for the Army; and the plan is, after they have served their sentence, to let them go.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Could you put in the record, without too much trouble, the number of men who are now serving in prison and where?

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. Yes; I could do that, and I could, if desired, elaborate that and show the number in at the beginning of the war, and the number received, and the number discharged, and the number now in prison, if that is desired.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. With the terms of sentence?

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. I think with the terms of sentence—well, to put in all the terms of sentence would make an enormously big set of figures.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. I would like to know the main facts.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. Of course we could give the average term of sentence and divide that up among different offenses and not make too long a table.

Senator WARREN. Well, I should say elaborate as much as you can without making it so long that we shall not even read it.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. I will be glad to do that. I will consult with Col. Dinsmore and get the authority of Gen. Kreger to put it all in. The number in confinement at the beginning of the war, or rather, to be exact, on April 1, 1917, in the various institutions, disciplinary barracks, and penitentiaries, and the number so in confinement on August 30, 1919, are shown in this table:

	Disciplinary barracks.					Penitentiaries.
	Fort Leavenworth.	Fort Jay.	Alcatraz.	Fort Douglas.	Total.	Leavenworth.	Atlanta.	McNeil Island.	Total.
In confinement on Apr. 1, 1917.....	1,368	280	452	.....	2,100	212	.....	.....	212
In confinement on Aug. 30, 1919.....	1,862	1,087	660	119	3,728	676	128	51	855

The British restored from their detention barracks during the war 54,000 men, roughly.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Many of them died in battle?

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. Undoubtedly many of them died in battle. They found their system working very successfully. They are really very proud of it.

Now as to the punishment, just a word as to the plan adopted in Senate bill 64. The theory of the whole scheme of punishment in the bill seems to be to put definite maximum sentences in terms of confinement for offenses, which is a radical change from the present plan, which leaves the quantum of the sentence to the judgment of the court-martial, with few exceptions.

That is different also from the British plan; and it comes from the theory that, as I understand it, the punishment should be adjudged, having in view simply the individual man, and his individual sentence, and not with reference, or much reference, to the circumstances of the Army, the purposes of discipline; and is part of a theory that as I understand it is expressed sometimes that the courts ought not in any sense to be agencies of discipline. I think possibly it is easy to get confused somewhat in the use of the word "discipline," and the term "agencies of discipline." It seems to me that there are two aspects of the judgment of the court-martial, and really of every court. In the first place, the determination whether or not a man is guilty is purely judicial. One ought never to be willing to sacrifice the question of guilt or innocence to any question of expediency or the needs of discipline in the Army, and I do not understand that anyone desires to do so. But when a man has been found guilty, then a guilty man has no vested interest in the quantum of punishment that shall be adjudged to him; and the quantum of punishment is the thing in which the commander of the Army is directly and vitally interested for disciplinary purposes. And that is really not so different in substance from the administration of justice in the civil courts; because I know, in Iowa, in the time of my grandfather's first settlement there, back in the thirties, they used to hang a man who would steal a horse.

Now, it does seem to me that that is a rather vital consideration in fixing the punishment. The man who stole a horse, a horse thief, in Iowa, in 1836, or in Wyoming and other places later than that, was not, perhaps morally—looking at the act simply by itself—any more guilty than the man who steals a horse in Iowa to-day. But a man who stole a horse in Iowa to-day would not be hanged for the act. In other words, the object of punishment in civilian life, as well as in the Army, is primarily to deter others; rather than as vengeance for the act that is done, and the court necessarily, and the Army commanders in the Army, in determining the quantum of the punishment, can not look inside a man's mind and absolutely find out just how guilty he was or just what his motives were, but must fix the punishment in relation to the surrounding circumstances. Now, the act, for instance, of going absent without leave, looked at solely from the standpoint of the man, is no more serious in one division of the Army than another; maybe no more wrong near the front than in a place 3,000 or 4,000 miles away from the front. But its effect upon the discipline of the Army, which is just another way of saying its effect upon the citizenship of the Nation, is very different; depending on the circumstances, or the morale of the other men in that division, and on other things which no one else can judge nearly as well as the commander who is charged with the responsibility of maintaining the discipline in the division and of making that division an effective fighting machine. He knows better than any one else possibly can know—and the military men and officers under him know, as no outsider can know—the men who have the responsibility on them—how serious that act is, judged under the circumstances at the time. And for that reason, there being in the man who has once been found guilty, no vested right, it seems to me, in a particular punishment, it is right, as well as necessary for the purposes of the Army, to leave the determination of the quantum of the punishment in the hands of the officer responsible for making a success of the organization; and we ought not, as it seems to me—at any rate it would be an experiment which has never been tried so far as I know in any other Army—to take that determination of the weight and severity of the punishment out of the hands of the military commanders responsible for the success of the outfit, and put it in the hands of civilian lawyers, or a man like the proposed judge advocate, who is really a civilian, although temporarily clothed with a uniform.

Senator WARREN. Right on that point, are those the maximum that are named in the proposed measure—what is their weight? Are they very extreme, providing that in all trials under them the accused should be given the limit, or are they too moderate for some cases that might arise?

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. Senator, it seems to me that they vary.

Senator WARREN. What is the general trend of them?

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. The general trend of them, it seems to me, would be to unduly reduce the possible sentence that might be adjudged under extreme circumstances. On the other hand, it might tend to cause an undue severity of sentence under ordinary circumstances; because, for instance, where you provide a maximum punishment, fix, I think it is, six months for striking an officer, as provided in one article here, manifestly, it seems to me under many circumstances that is unduly lenient to say the least. On the other hand, circumstances might arise off duty, away from the front——

Senator WARREN. A man might get a drink or two in him?

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. Precisely, where the court ought not to have held up to it the suggestion of six months in the statute—the idea that the six months ought to be given. I fear that if you put down those limits in the statutes it would tend to a kind of rigidity, and that the court in every case would tend to give that sentence.

Senator WARREN. We are to understand, then, from that, that you fear that in many cases it would be too severe, I assume with officers not experienced, and so forth, while in other cases you fear it would not be severe enough. What would be the proportion? About even? Or would the less extreme predominate?

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. That would be hard to estimate, depending on whether we were at war or whether it was in time of peace.

Senator WARREN. In view of what has happened?

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. It would seem as though this act had been in force during the past two years, it would have tended in many cases, where the troops were in training, to too severe sentences. On the other hand, with the troops actually on the battle front, it might be a handicap to the giving of a sentence that would really deter a man from committing an offense for the mere purpose of getting out of danger.

Senator WARREN. Perhaps I have misread the testimony, but the testimony of those who have been at the front has seemed to indicate fully as much leniency, perhaps more, except in those special cases, than what the testimony shows as to the trials here. In fact, I think that the trials here, as I have read the testimony, taking into consideration the distance and the fact that one was at the front and the other in training, have been more severe at this end of the line.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. I think that is true. But it is at the front, Senator, that the need must always be to apply in cases of necessity the severe deterrent, and it would be at the front, I would fear, that a comparatively low maximum would operate most injuriously by handicapping and preventing the deterrent effect of the few heavy sentences being given.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Colonel, could the British system be woven into our Articles of War, with their suspended sentence system, without much dislocation of our Articles of War?

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. I see no reason why it could not be, Senator.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. You know, the British system that you have talked of, as it is described in your testimony, appeals largely to me.

Senator WARREN. It does to me; even this cat and mouse business.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Yes. Would it be much trouble for you to formulate the British system, of the judge advocate general and the judge advocates under the British system, giving their suspended sentence system, and present it to the committee?

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. I would be very glad to do that, Senator.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. The judge advocate there is a civilian?

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. Yes.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. While he has not the jurisdiction to review appeals and to reverse or to modify them under the system there, his opinions are pretty generally followed, and it does not interfere with the discipline in the army. The commanding officer in the British army still has the power of command. Why could not that system of appointing judge advocates be adopted in this country, and their functions over there as the adviser of the court be made part of our law here?

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. The only real difference, as I understand it, between their system and ours is the fact that their judge advocate general is a civilian. The court-martial officers, as they call them, could be introduced here just as they were there, merely by general order. You see they introduced it simply by a war-office order, which corresponds to a general order, in 1916. There is no reason why we could not do the same thing.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. The great trouble about leaving it to an order is the fact that incoming judge advocates, where the office is not a permanent one, show a disposition to change it all the time, so that while one judge advocate general might approve of a certain order, another comes in and changes it. But where it is crystallized into a statute, that is not possible.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. It is true that in order to increase the personnel of the Judge Advocate General's department, that must be by statute.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. You know there is a general feeling among enlisted men with whom I have come in contact that justice has not been squarely administered; that there is too much of the military in it. If that impression could be removed by introducing into the system something of the civilian kind, you would better the morale of the Army by making them feel that there is not that strict military method of enforcing the law.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. I do think that something—for instance, the British, instead of using a hard-and-fast plan of punishment fixed by statute, had a standing order, one of the Rules of Procedure, which was simply a cautionary order cautioning the commanding generals that, while the court-martial has power to award a sentence within its discretion, yet ordinarily, and unless there is some special reason seeming to require a heavier sentence, that the sentence ought not to exceed so and so; and then follow provisions like we have in our Executive order for use in time of peace. That stands always with them.

Senator WARREN. I was going to ask if they changed it from time to time?

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. They do from time to time, but it is always in effect, and it is always cautionary; so that if an emergency arises the commanding general does have the power to approve a heavier sentence under special circumstances; and I have thought, I see no reason why, if our forty-fifth article of war was simply amended by omitting the words "in time of peace," the President could not, by an Executive order, which he might change from time to time, provide, not necessarily the same uniform maximum punishments to be inflicted everywhere always—for instance, there could have been during the past year, so far as I can see, a standing order effective within the United States, and another standing order effective with the Expeditionary Forces in France, and if necessary or advisable, still a different order for the Expeditionary Forces in Siberia, and those could be molded so as to fit the circumstances in each army, and as they changed from time to time; so as to prevent unduly severe sentences, while at the same time allowing the necessary latitude in emergent circumstances.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. I would like, Colonel, to have you prepare a bill, embodying our old articles of war in it, and as a part of it a system like the British system so far as the Judge Advocate General is concerned and the judge advocates in the Army, making the Judge Advocate General a civilian and the judge advocates with the field corps, and having practically the same powers as the British officers. Secondly, I would like to have a bill prepared embodying our articles of war with such amendments as you have in mind all along the line, but providing for an appellate tribunal here, with one or more civilians on it, the court to consist of three or five, and if of five, then with two civilians on it, so that that appellate tribunal would have the power to revise and to reverse or to modify or to set aside the sentence of the court-martial. With those two measures before us, I think that our committee will be aided very much in thrashing out a modification of the articles to some extent.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. I will be very glad to prepare them for you, Senator.

Continuing what I was saying as to the fixed punishment, just as an illustration, I want to call the committee's attention to a provision of article 67 of Senate bill 64, providing that as to quarrels, affrays, and disorders—giving the power which is substantially the same as that given by the corresponding article of the present Articles of War—68 is the present article—the power to any officer to part and quell quarrels, frays, and disorders, and providing punishment for anyone who “refuses to obey such officer or noncommissioned officer, or draws a weapon upon or otherwise threatens or does violence to him.”

The present article of war provides that such a person shall be punished as a court-martial may direct. The proposed article 67 provides that such person shall be punished by confinement for not more than one year. To take an extreme case of what might happen under that, a soldier at the front might draw a weapon on Gen. Pershing, or might do violence to Gen. Pershing, and could only be punished by confinement for not more than one year. That does, to my mind, illustrate what I mean, as to the danger of fixed punishments in all cases of these military offenses.

I have this suggestion that I want to bring to the attention of the committee. Of course, the matter of punishment and the length of confinement, where confinement is used, and as to the character of the punishment to be given in war, in emergencies, is a problem in other armies as well as in our own. The great danger, the great trouble, is that there are men in time of stress, and, particularly, if for any reason the morale of the organization has weakened, there are quite a good many men who will inflict wounds on themselves for the purpose of getting confined in prison and getting away from danger at the front; who will go absent without leave; who will commit other offenses, for the purposes of getting safety. We, during this war, were compelled to meet those cases by long terms of imprisonment. The long term of imprisonment gets to the point where it rather loses effect sometimes. There is a point beyond which you really do not add any deterrent effect by piling on further years to the nominal term of imprisonment. For practical purposes, I do not believe a 40-year term means any more than a 10-year term.

Senator WARREN. It is simply absurd.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. It is simply absurd. If anybody stops to think of it, he knows that it will not be carried out. The British have met that problem to some extent by their plan of what they call field punishment No. 1, which they substituted in 1881 for the old plan of flogging; which is to tie a man up an hour a day to a fixed object, and in a public place more or less, where it is not only mighty unpleasant, but exposes him to contempt of his fellow soldiers. Of course our people would not, we all know, stand for that kind of punishment being introduced. But it is interesting in a way, because the question as to that being an inhuman punishment, and the need of it, has been raised in the British Army, and you will find attached to the statement of Gen. Childs, which I put in evidence, copies of letters from Field Marshal Haig, and from Gen. Allenby, and from all of the other commanders in chief of the British Army throughout the world, on that subject, in answer to a circular letter which went out from the war office on the 18th of last April as the result of an inquiry in Parliament.

Senator WARREN. I was going to ask whether that was considered desirable or not, but I presume you will get at it there?

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. It is all very fully discussed.

I desire particularly to call attention to the suggestion of Gen. Shaw, the commander in chief in Ireland, who in one paragraph of his letter—the whole letter is interesting—says this, speaking of the punishment No. 1:

It is not clear that any substitute is really necessary and it is very difficult to suggest one for what is after all only a portion of field punishment No. 1.

The main consideration is that any form of field punishment should be equal in its incidence, and that the delinquent should not escape the risks suffered by his comrades by reason of his bad behavior. In a large Army, such as the British Army in France, it was found in practice very difficult to secure these conditions.

The only method of doing so was to send men behind the line and therefore out of immediate danger. Consequently many men preferred to do severe field punishment well behind the line, than to run the risks attendant on the so-called period of "rest" in close support of the trench line, where long and arduous night working parties under fire, caused the soldier to prefer his tour of duties in the trenches to that of his short tour of "rest."

I think a solution might be found in the formation of penal companies or battalions, to which all men with sentences of 14 days field punishment or upward would be sent.

These penal units could be used for working parties in the dangerous zone, and moreover, could be given a special diet without luxuries of any description. As long as a man remains with his unit, a special diet is impracticable.

I consider that if a penal company formed part of each division, it would be possible to adopt the system for any form of warfare.

Senator WARREN. It would make a lot of trouble, handled that way.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. It would, and the question would be whether it could be worked.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Why could it not be worked by accepting the advantages mentioned?

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. Of course, it is an old, old plan simply to order the men to the front without trial, and our commanders used that this last year. I believe Gen. O'Ryan testified to his use of it and its effectiveness. The difficulty with it in so many cases seems to be that—well, the Germans tried it, for instance, last fall; and the spirit of their army, the morale of the army, was injured by mixing up those men with good soldiers right in the regular organizations. One of the things stated, for instance, is that the sailors from Kiel sent to the front infected many of their organizations with Bolshevism. And then it is a nuisance to have along with your organization those men who ought to be punished.

In Belgium, there has been the suggestion—and you will find it in Maj. Wells's report elaborately worked out by Maj. Van Ackere, Auditeur Militaire, and with the approval of the Belgian authorities—of a plan rather elaborately to form separate penal battalions. So that if the men are sentenced to those battalions, or if sentenced to confinement, the commanding general would have the right to take the men from confinement and to put them in that penal battalion, which would be given the most disagreeable and dangerous work; and then with the opportunity, if a man made good in the penal battalion, to have his sentence entirely wiped out. They planned three ways for him to make good in the penal battalion: He could distinguish himself by exceptional gallantry, which would ordinarily give him the croix de guerre, and that would of itself wipe out the record of a sentence. They had a plan of writing across it in red ink "redeemed by gallantry."

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Many of those men who commit these petty crimes are the bravest men in the Army.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. Precisely. Then they would also allow him to serve for a time, I think for four months, in the penal battalion, and if he did his duty regularly and bravely, they would restore him to his place in the regular outfit, and wipe out the effect of his sentence. Or if he was killed in the penal battalion in the course of his duty, that would wipe out the sentence so that there would be no dishonorable record against him for his family. On the other hand, if in the penal battalion a man committed an offense, then it was a very short shrift for him, usually a sentence of death. That same plan was to some extent in force in the French Army by a provision providing for penal battalions which was introduced into the French system, but I was not able to get very much information as to how it worked. But the same problem, you see, has been meeting all of the armies, to find something that would be effective, would not take man-power away from the army, and that would not give a man an opportunity by committing an offense to go to prison and thereby to safety.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Did we not amend the articles last year so as to reach that? Did we not provide in some way, did we not place a power in the commanding general over there, to utilize these men?

Lieut Col. RIGBY. By the amendment of the 50th Article of War you provided a broader power to commute sentences, and by amendments to the fifty-second and fifty-third articles of war extended the power to suspend sentences.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. That was the purpose of it, really, to enable him to handle those men and not lose them from the firing line.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. The vital difference between that and the suggestion made here is that this would keep the men under sentence and in separate battalions where they would be recognized as men undergoing a sentence, where they could not, in case of a hard situation, infect other men by their grievances. I only call your attention to it as a matter that has come up and has been discussed in those other armies.

I think that is all that I have to offer to the committee.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Colonel, we have been very much edified by your testimony, and I shall be glad indeed if you will formulate those bills and let me look them over.

(Thereupon, at 3.40 o'clock p. m. the subcommittee adjourned until to-morrow, Saturday, September 27, 1919, at 2.30 o'clock p. m.)

ESTABLISHMENT OF MILITARY JUSTICE—PROPOSED AMENDMENT OF THE ARTICLES OF WAR.

SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 27, 1919.

UNITED STATES SENATE,
SUBCOMMITTEE ON MILITARY AFFAIRS,
Washington, D. C.

The subcommittee met, pursuant to adjournment, at 2.30 o'clock p. m., in the room of the Committee on Appropriations, Capitol, Senator Francis E. Warren presiding.

Present, Senators Warren (chairman), Lenroot, and Chamberlain.

Senator WARREN. General, will you please state your rank and service to the stenographer?

STATEMENT OF BRIG. GEN. EDWARD A. KREGER, JUDGE ADVOCATE GENERAL'S DEPARTMENT.

Gen. KREGER. Lieutenant colonel, Judge Advocate, in the permanent establishment; brigadier general, Judge Advocate General's Department, in the emergency establishment.

Senator WARREN. Will you please state your service, General?

General KREGER. Captain, Company M, Fifty-second Iowa Volunteer Infantry, during the Spanish War; captain, Thirty-ninth Infantry, United States Volunteers, during the Philippine insurrection; appointed first lieutenant of Infantry, permanent establishment, in 1901, since which date my service has been continuous.

Senator WARREN. You were in the Volunteer service up to that time, and then went into the permanent establishment?

Gen. KREGER. Yes. In 1907 I was detailed as acting judge advocate. In 1911, coincident with my promotion to the grade of captain in the Infantry, I was appointed a major in the Judge Advocate's Corps, and since then have served in that corps.

Senator WARREN. I think you said you were not graduated from West Point.

Gen. KREGER. No. However, from August, 1914, until April, 1917, I served as professor of law at the United States Military Academy.

Senator WARREN. You did line service, as you have indicated?

Gen. KREGER. My service was in the line from 1898 until my appointment in the Judge Advocate's Corps in 1911, except that for a time I served as an acting judge advocate by detail.

Senator WARREN. This subcommittee, General, is seeking information regarding the present Articles of War as compared with the bill which is before us, S. 64, called the Chamberlain bill, and our research has widened somewhat into a comparison of our system of courts-martial with the systems of other countries, and we have endeavored to ascertain as to the application abroad as well as here at home, whether sentences have been oversevere or less severe, or how the workings have been under our law.

As we understand, you have served during the war one year on the other side, as your stripes would seem to indicate, and the balance of the time here, but all of the time in the Judge Advocate General's Department, and we should like to have you give us your ideas of the present law as compared with the proposed law, or some other one that might be proposed, or some system that you might think better than either one. Do I state the case fairly, Senator Chamberlain?

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Yes.

Gen. KREGER. From the time the United States entered the war until shortly before my departure for Europe in March, 1918, I served in the Provost Marshal General's office, and therefore was not connected during that period with the administration of the Judge Advocate General's Department.

I think I ought to say at this point that the work coming to my desk has kept me so busy that I have had substantially no opportunity to examine the pending bill. The notice of this call to appear before this committee reached me late yesterday afternoon, and there has been no opportunity since then to make special preparation.

Senator WARREN. You have seen this pamphlet, have you, this print in parallel columns of the proposed bill with the present law?

Gen. KREGER. I have seen a copy. My statement was intended as a suggestion that perhaps the committee had better question me specifically, rather than expect a statement from me.

Senator WARREN. I am inclined to think that there would be quite a good many interrogatories propounded even if you laid out the work pretty well beforehand, giving us what is in your mind as to the issue. Senator Chamberlain, would you like to draw him out by questions?

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. I think Senator Lenroot might like to ask him some questions.

Senator LENROOT. Were you a lawyer when you went into the Spanish-American War?

Gen. KREGER. Yes.

Senator WARREN. You were not at West Point as a student?

Gen. KREGER. No.

Senator WARREN. You have been there as one of the teachers since, have you?

Gen. KREGER. From August, 1914, to April, 1917, I served as professor of law at the Point.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. What were your duties in the Judge Advocate's office up to the time you were detached from that and placed in the Provost Marshal General's office?

Gen. KREGER. During the period prior to my assignment at West Point?

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Yes.

Gen. KREGER. From March, 1911, until August of 1914, I was on duty in the Judge Advocate General's office.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Here in Washington?

Gen. KREGER. In Washington.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. What were your particular functions?

Gen. KREGER. During a considerable portion of the time I had charge of what was termed the legislative desk.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Preparing measures that affected the Judge Advocate General's Department and looking over measures which had been proposed as affecting that?

Gen. KREGER. The study of legislation affecting the Army and the War Department, and making reports on such propositions when either a committee of Congress or a branch of the War Department asked for a report.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Then after you left West Point as an instructor of law there—that was in 1914?

Gen. KREGER. I left West Point in 1917.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Then you came back here and took another tour of duty in the Judge Advocate General's office proper?

Gen. KREGER. I served in the Provost Marshal General's office; was connected with the draft administration.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. You remained there how long?

Gen. KREGER. From May 1—that is the approximate date——

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. That is, 1914?

Gen. KREGER. 1917.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. 1917?

Gen. KREGER. Until about February 9, 1918.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. And when were you detached from the service in the Provost Marshal General's office?

Gen. KREGER. About February 9, 1918.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Then you went to France?

Gen. KREGER. I was attached to the Judge Advocate General's office until my departure for France. I left Washington about the 9th of March, 1918, having been attached to the Judge Advocate General's office about a month immediately preceding my departure for France.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Did you go over there to act in the capacity of a judge advocate?

Gen. KREGER. I did.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. And while you were there you were designated as the representative in France of the Judge Advocate General?

Gen. KREGER. I was.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Assuming the functions there that he would have assumed if he had been there?

Gen. KREGER. Yes.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. As distinct and separate from the staff judge advocate of Gen. Pershing?

Gen. KREGER. Yes.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. That avoided the necessity of sending papers that would ordinarily have come from the staff judge advocate to the Judge Advocate General here? You disposed of them there for the Judge Advocate General?

Gen. KREGER. In respect of cases involving death, dismissal, or dishonorable discharge, in which either the original appointing authority or the commanding general of the American forces in Europe had the power to enter a final order.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Now, how much experience did you have while you were in the office of the Judge Advocate General here and before you were detailed for duty in France, with respect to the administration of the criminal law—military law?

Gen. KREGER. During the entire period of my service in the Judge Advocate General's office, prior to my assignment at West Point, I had work connected with the administration of military justice. From time to time I was called upon to write reviews and prepare opinions in respect to what may be termed the more important cases: those that had to go to the President.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Could you state approximately how many records you examined from court-martial sentences, generally?

Gen. KREGER. Any statement I might make on that point would be a guess rather than an estimate, Senator, because the number of cases that came to me from time to time depended partly upon the inflow of that kind of work and partly upon whether or not my desk was otherwise in a condition to permit me to study the cases promptly.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. In other words, as a matter of fact you did not have as much to do with the review of these appeals as others in the Judge Advocate General's office?

Gen. KREGER. During my connection with the office I had as much to do with them as any other officer had. The duty was not assigned especially and particularly to any one officer. There was a small force in the office at that time. I came here to the office from duty as judge advocate, or acting judge advocate, of the Department of the Colorado. I was detailed as acting judge advocate of the Department of the Colorado in December of 1907, and was relieved there in March of 1911 to come to Washington. In the meantime, however, I had served detached from the Denver office for duty as instructor in law at the Army Service Schools at Fort Leavenworth, and also in connection with the provisional government in Cuba; so that during the three years and a half that I was connected with the Department of the Colorado I was not present for duty there all the time.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. What I was trying to get at was your experience in handling these sentences of courts-martial that came for review to the Judge Advocate General's office.

Gen. KREGER. I had had the experience of a department judge advocate, and the experience of an assistant in the Judge Advocate General's office.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. You can not say approximately how many cases you reviewed after you came here to the Judge Advocate General's office?

Gen. KREGER. No.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. What were your functions when you reviewed a sentence of a court-martial after you came here to the Judge Advocate General's Office? What did you do?

Gen. KREGER. That is, you mean in 1911, when I came here as an assistant?

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Yes; all the time you were in the Judge Advocate General's Office? What were your functions in reviewing cases? What did you do?

Gen. KREGER. I studied the entire record to determine, first and foremost, whether the record was legally sufficient to support the sentence, and in the second place, if it were a Presidential case—that is, one that was not closed—to determine whether there was ground for the exercise of clemency.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. And, third, whether or not the court had jurisdiction?

Gen. KREGER. That is naturally a part of the question of whether or not the record is legally sufficient to support the sentence.

Senator LENROOT. What was the test of legal sufficiency?

Gen. KREGER. There had to be a showing that the court was appointed by some one having authority to appoint the court; that the warrant of appointment appeared of record; that the man brought before the court was a man subject to military law; and then, of course, there are various and sundry additional points to be considered; for example, the court must be sworn, and the right of challenge accorded.

Senator LENROOT. Perhaps I can put it in this way: Did it go beyond the determination of whether or not the court had jurisdiction?

Gen. KREGER. You mean the examination of the record?

Senator LENROOT. Yes.

Gen. KREGER. Oh, decidedly, Senator. It was a complete and thorough examination——

Senator LENROOT. Oh, I did not mean that; but I mean, in coming to your determination of legal sufficiency——

Gen. KREGER. Oh, yes.

Senator LENROOT. For instance, if there were prejudicial error such as would cause a reversal in a civil case, how was that treated?

Gen. KREGER. Prejudicial, say, in the introduction of testimony?

Senator LENROOT. Yes.

Gen. KREGER. The theory on which we proceeded with the examination of cases covered by General Order 7 of 1918, was this, that if there were error in the introduction of testimony, the case could not stand unless the competent evidence was sufficiently strong practically to compel a reasonable man to find as the court had found, after disregarding all incompetent testimony.

Senator LENROOT. Did the court exclude evidence?

Gen. KREGER. The court, on motion of either the prosecutor or counsel for the defense, often excludes evidence.

Senator LENROOT. Then you say you tried the case upon the strength of the evidence produced, and in case you found error, where evidence had been improperly excluded?

Gen. KREGER. That might be prejudicial to the same extent as the actual improper introduction of evidence.

Senator LENROOT. Yes, and you could act on it in the same way, could you, General? I can readily see, if all the evidence was there and some of it had been improperly admitted, nevertheless, on the whole case, justice had been done; but that you could not determine if there had been improperly excluded evidence?

Gen. KREGER. That would ordinarily appear in the record, because, assuming that the evidence had been offered by counsel for the accused, and objection had been made to it, he would ordinarily indicate the nature of the evidence to such an extent that one could determine whether or not the exclusion, if erroneous, was prejudicial. Do I make myself clear?

Senator LENROOT. Yes. Well, suppose you determined that it was prejudicial; what then?

Gen. KREGER. If it were determined that it was actually prejudicial, I held that the conviction was invalid.

Senator LENROOT. In other words, you applied the same rule that an appellate court of civil jurisdiction would apply?

Gen. KREGER. That has been my theory.

Senator LENROOT. That is what I was getting at.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Then what is the practice?

Gen. KREGER. If the conviction is held invalid, wholly or partly, either the sentence is set aside, or there is action by way of clemency.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. I do not understand that you agree with the general contention there in the Judge Advocate General's Department. I understand that your department acted under section 1199 of the Revised Statutes, did you not?

Gen. KREGER. Section 1199 of the Revised Statutes never became a subject of discussion, so far as I recall, until some time near the end of 1917.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Well, take a supposed case before that controversy came up. Would the Judge Advocate General, where you found that a sentence was irregular, set it aside and order the prisoner discharged; or would you simply, from the record you made, advise the court or the commanding officer as to what ought to have been done; or did you order a retrial or a reversal?

Gen. KREGER. The action of the office always was advisory.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. That is what I am getting at. I understand that the action of the office was simply advisory to the commanding officer?

Gen. KREGER. It was.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. So that you really did not set aside a sentence?

Gen. KREGER. If I used that terminology I should ask to correct it.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. I rather understood that you did.

Senator LENROOT. I think you did.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Did you not so understand him, Senator?

Senator LENROOT. Yes.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. My understanding is that no matter what you found in the record, provided the court had jurisdiction and there was some evidence to sustain the judgment, you did not interfere except in an advisory way?

Gen. KREGER. That is correct. However——

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Yes; that is right.

Gen. KREGER. I might suggest that there must have been more than "some evidence." The "scintilla rule" never was followed in the office. The rule requiring substantial evidential support for every essential allegation in a specification governed.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Now then, suppose you found that state of facts, that there was evidence—a scintilla of evidence, if you please; did you then undertake to reverse the sentence?

Gen. KREGER. We undertook to advise the Secretary of War respecting it.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. That is my understanding of it, General. I do not want any misapprehension between us as to that.

Gen. KREGER. Yes.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. If the court had had jurisdiction and the trial had been regular, then no matter how small the evidence might have been, you acted only in an advisory capacity?

Gen. KREGER. In any event we acted in an advisory capacity, because even a declaration of nullity was made by the Secretary of War.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. So that if you found the court did not have jurisdiction, then what happened?

Gen. KREGER. We advised the Secretary of War and drew a declaration of nullity.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. So that you did not exercise the power of reversal or modification or amendment prior to the time when this controversy arose?

Gen. KREGER. We exercised it in an advisory way.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. After the controversy arose you did not change the rule which you had adopted?

Gen. KREGER. There has been no change, except as required by General Order 7 of 1918.

Senator LENROOT. Did you follow cases after your action had been taken?

Gen. KREGER. I naturally did, over in France.

Senator LENROOT. With reference to this—this is what I had in mind, this advisory action. Were there any cases where your action was not confirmed or your advice was not followed?

Gen. KREGER. Yes; in a very few cases, the proportion being so small as to be practically negligible.

Senator LENROOT. Generally speaking, who was it that did not follow the advice? Would it be the court or the commanding officer or the Secretary of War?

Gen. KREGER. I shall have to speak, now, more particularly with reference to the period of the recent war, because the cases preceding that period have faded out of my recollection.

Senator LENROOT. Yes.

Gen. KREGER. During the time that I was acting judge advocate general for the American Expeditionary Forces in Europe I can now recall only two cases in which my advisory recommendation was not in the end followed with reference to the question of whether or not the sentence should be held good. In one of those cases the judge advocate of the appointing power and the appointing power disagreed with me on the law, and they followed their own judgment rather than mine. Speaking from recollection, the case was one in which a man was found guilty of desertion. I held that there was sufficient evidence erroneously introduced on the issue of desertion, as distinguished from absence without leave, to invalidate the finding of guilty of desertion, and recommended that the finding of guilty of desertion be disapproved, or rather that only so much of the finding of guilty of desertion be approved as involved a finding of guilty of absence without leave, the lesser included offense. My advice was not followed.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Was that a death sentence?

Gen. KREGER. No. My recollection now is that it was not a question of releasing the man from confinement, even had my advice been followed, but it was a question of reducing or mitigating the adjudged punishment, and, of course, a question of clearing the man's record of the charge of desertion.

The other case was a case in which the judge advocate of the appointing authority, the appointing authority, the judge advocate of the confirming authority, the confirming authority, and also the Secretary of War disagreed with me. There was an appeal from my opinion.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. To whom?

Gen. KREGER. Primarily to the Judge Advocate General. Unfortunately that case arrived in Washington after I had become Acting Judge Advocate General. Naturally, having judged the case below, I did not participate in judging it up here. I sent the case to the Military Justice Division, presided over by Col. Read. That division passed on it; passed it up to the Secretary of War.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Agreeing with you?

Gen. KREGER. That is my understanding. I did not look into it, but recently I was advised that the office here, the Military Justice Division, had agreed with me, but that the Secretary of War had agreed with the other judge advocates.

I do not mean to state definitely that those are the only two cases out of some 2,500 that I passed on over on the other side, in which there was disagreement. My recollection is now that those were the only ones in which, in the end, the advice of my office respecting the validity of a conviction was not followed.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. In the 2,500 cases that you speak of over there, in what proportion of them did you advise a modification and reversal of the sentence?

Gen. KREGER. I should have to make a guess as to that. Modification or reversal probably ran somewhere between 5 and 10 per cent.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Of your recommendations?

Gen. KREGER. I should judge so. Now, I shall want to check that up, however.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Yes; you can correct that.

(NOTE BY GEN. KREGER.—The chief of the statistical section, Judge Advocate General's Office, states that in approximately 6 per cent of the cases examined by the branch office in France while I was in charge of that office reversal or modification of findings or sentences was recommended.)

Senator LENROOT. Did it not frequently happen that a court-martial would receive evidence of other offenses or conduct of the defendant, other than that charged?

Gen. KREGER. Occasionally. That was, I think, part of my quarrel on the first case I discussed here.

Senator LENROOT. That is what I was going to ask you about. But you took the position that it might have so prejudiced the minds of the court that a correct conclusion was not arrived at?

Gen. KREGER. Yes, sir.

Senator LENROOT. I see.

Gen. KREGER. When a man is brought before a military court, the theory is that all charges against him that are properly cognizable by a court shall be cleared up at that time.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. So that he may be tried on three or four charges; but not unless they are specified?

Gen. KREGER. Not unless they are specified. The rule is that a man may not have his other offendings exploited before a court, except that after the court has arrived at a finding of guilty, and before adjudging a sentence, the court may hear evidence of previous convictions within one year. It may not go further back than that, and may consider only previous convictions of which there is record evidence; and only previous convictions before military courts, not before civil courts.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. You went over all of the cases that were tried before courts-martial where sentences were rendered to go up to the Judge Advocate General for revision?

Gen. KREGER. Over those within my jurisdiction, as heretofore indicated.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Were they all carefully revised—all carefully examined into and reviewed?

Gen. KREGER. Every case had a careful review. I speak only of the review or revision respecting cases that my office reviewed or revised.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Is it not true that there were sentences of courts-martial rendered and executed before the record reached your office and you went over them?

Gen. KREGER. Of what period are you speaking?

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. I am speaking of the time before the issuance of that general order which required all cases where a death sentence had been adjudged, to be sent to the Judge Advocate General's Office.

Gen. KREGER. No sentence of death or dismissal adjudged in time of peace may be executed before the President has passed upon it.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. But when was that regulation adopted?

Gen. KREGER. That has stood in the statutes of the United States since the Government was founded.

Senator LENROOT. It is the original law.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. But here are those Texas cases where those negroes were hung—were executed—before the records got to the Judge Advocate General's Office.

Gen. KREGER. That was in time of war, Senator.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. That possibility was removed by a regulation later, was it not?

Gen. KREGER. Yes.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. When?

Gen. KREGER. General Order No. 7, War Department, January 17, 1918.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. That was after the war started?

Gen. KREGER. Yes.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. That general order was really the basis of your having been sent to France, was it not?

Gen. KREGER. Yes.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. So that the Judge Advocate General could review the cases in pursuance of this regulation?

Gen. KREGER. Yes.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Without having the records sent here?

Gen. KREGER. Without having the records sent here.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. There was a case, notwithstanding the law you speak of—take the Texas case—even in time of war, where the sentence was executed without your office having opportunity to review or suggest or revise; is not that true?

Gen. KREGER. Yes; but those cases were tried before General Order 7, 1918, was promulgated. Under the law, in time of war, in the absence of a regulation, the department commander's action on the sentence was final.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Take the Texas cases where those negroes were executed. Did you review the record after the men were executed?

Gen. KREGER. I did not. I have had nothing to do with those cases except in passing on applications for clemency.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. It would not have helped the men very much for you to have examined the record and found that it was irregular, or even that the court had not jurisdiction, would it?

Gen. KREGER. No. Of course, in time of peace, no sentence of death or dismissal can be executed without the confirmation of the President; and that, of course, brings the record up here for formal revision.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. In time of war, however, that was done until the adoption of General Order No. 7?

Gen. KREGER. Yes.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Those sentences were carried into execution without the reviewing authority or the President having a chance to pass on them?

Gen. KREGER. Yes; as even now certain sentences are carried into effect before the record gets up to the office here for review.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. What kind of cases are they?

Gen. KREGER. Those are sentences that do not involve any permanent change in the status of a man.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. That is, dishonorable discharge or the death sentence?

Gen. KREGER. Yes. No sentence involving death, dismissal, or dishonorable discharge can be executed until this review is had. If it is a question of confinement or forfeiture only, then the general order publishing the final action of the reviewing authority is published and the execution of the term begins. Of course, if, when the record reaches us here, we find it bad, we advise the Secretary to that effect, and he either publishes, himself, or directs the reviewing authority to publish, a modifying order.

Senator WARREN. May I ask you about that Order No. 7; has that been changed, or rescinded, or altered?

Gen. KREGER. General Order No. 7 is in force to-day.

Senator WARREN. The status of your office according to the opinion in your office is that we are still in war times, is it not?

Gen. KREGER. Yes.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Was not General Order No. 7 modified by General Order No. 84?

Gen. KREGER. Yes; there was a modification of the jurisdiction of the office on the other side.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. The modification or the amendment of it practically brought you back to the United States?

Gen. KREGER. No; the first modification which was made in September—September 11, 1918—extended my jurisdiction over there to include not only the cases involving death, dismissal, or dishonorable discharge, but all other cases.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. When was that modification, about?

Gen. KREGER. Speaking from recollection, September 11, 1918; that is, General Order No. 84.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Yes; 84. Was there a still further modification of it?

Gen. KREGER. The order which brought me back here placed the functions of the French office in abeyance, temporarily, and when the office began to function again, there was a modification in the terminology of the order.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. What was that number?

Gen. KREGER. Forty-five or 49, or something like that, of 1919—about March 22, 1919.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Will you put those three general orders, Order No. 7, and each of the modifications thereof, in this hearing?

Gen. KREGER. I shall be glad to.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Put them in together, so that we will have them.

Senator WARREN. Because of those you were sent over to the other side, for service over there?

Gen. KREGER. Yes.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. And then you were brought back?

Gen. KREGER. Yes.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. And then you were sent over and brought back again?

Gen. KREGER. No; I went over there once only, in the early part of March, 1918, returning about the middle of March, 1919. During that time my sole duty on the other side was to review general court-martial records. I had no other jurisdiction.

Senator WARREN. No one took that up, to follow it up afterwards?

Gen. KREGER. Yes. When the period of temporarily suspended animation was over with, Col. Herbert A. White, of the Judge Advocate General's corps, was placed in charge of the office, and the office has been functioning from that time on until the present.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. The result being somewhat the same as if you had been brought back here and then sent over again?

Gen. KREGER. Exactly.

General Orders, No. 7.

WAR DEPARTMENT,
Washington, January 17, 1918.

I. Section I, General Orders, No. 169, War Department, 1917, is rescinded and the following rules of procedure prescribed by the President are substituted therefor. This order will be effective from and after February 1, 1918:.

1. Whenever, in time of war, the commanding general of a territorial department or a territorial division confirms a sentence of death, or one of dismissal of an officer, he will enter in the record of trial his action thereon, but will not direct the execution of the sentence. His action will conclude with a recital that the execution of the sentence will be directed in orders after the record of trial has been reviewed in the Office of the Judge Advocate General, or a branch thereof, and its legality there determined, and that jurisdiction is retained to take any additional or corrective action, prior to or at the time of the publication of the general court-martial order in the case, that may be found necessary. Nothing contained in this rule is intended to apply to any action which a reviewing authority may desire to take under the fifty-first article of war.

2. Whenever, in time of peace or war, any officer having authority to review a trial by general court-martial approves a sentence imposed by such court which includes dishonorable discharge, and such officer does not intend to suspend such dishonorable discharge until the soldier's release from confinement as provided in the fifty-second article of war, the said officer will enter in the record of trial his action thereon, but will not direct the execution of the sentence. His action will conclude with the recital specified in rule 1. This rule will not apply to a commanding general in the field, except as provided in rule 5.

3. When a record of trial in a case covered by rules 1 or 2 is reviewed in the office of the Judge Advocate General, or any branch thereof, and is found to be legally sufficient to sustain the findings and sentence of the court, the reviewing authority will be so informed by letter, if the usual time of mail delivery between the two points does not exceed six days, otherwise, by telegram or cable, and the reviewing authority will then complete the case by publishing his orders thereon and directing the execution of the sentence. If it is found, upon review, that the record is not sufficient to sustain the findings and sentence of the court, the record of trial will be returned to the reviewing authority with a clear statement of the error, omission, or defect which has been found. If such error, omission, or defect admits of correction, the reviewing authority will be advised to reconvene the court for such correction; otherwise he will be advised of the action proper for him to take by way of approval or disapproval of the findings or sentence of the court, remission of the sentence in whole or in part, retrial of the case, or such other action as may be appropriate in the premises.

4. Any delay in the execution of any sentence by reason of the procedure prescribed in rules 1, 2, or 3 will be credited upon any term of confinement or imprisonment imposed. The general court-martial order directing the execution of the sentence will recite that the sentence of confinement or imprisonment will commence to run from a specified date, which date, in any given case, will be the date of original action by the reviewing authority.

5. The procedure prescribed in rules 1 and 2 shall apply to any commanding general in the field whenever the Secretary of War shall so decide and shall direct such commanding general to send records of courts-martial involving the class of cases and the character of punishment covered by the said rules, either to the office of the Judge Advocate General at Washington, D. C., or to any branch thereof which the Secretary of War may establish, for final review, before the sentence shall be finally executed.

6. Whenever, in the judgment of the Secretary of War, the expeditious review of trials by general courts-martial occurring in certain commands requires the establishment of a branch of the Judge Advocate General's office at some convenient point near the said commands, he may establish such branch office and direct the sending of general court-martial records thereto. Such branch office, when so established, shall be wholly detached from the command of any commanding general in the field, or of any territorial, department, or division commander, and shall be responsible for the performance of its duties to the Judge Advocate General.

II. There is hereby established, in aid of the revisory power conferred on the Judge Advocate General of the Army by section 1199 Revised Statutes, a branch of the office of the Judge Advocate General, at Paris, France, or at some other point convenient to the headquarters of the American Expeditionary Forces in France, to be selected by the officer detailed as the head of such branch office, after conference with the commanding general of the American Expeditionary Forces in France. The officer so detailed shall be the Acting Judge Advocate General of the American Expeditionary Forces in Europe, and shall report to and be controlled in the performance of his duties by the Judge Advocate General of the Army.

The records of all general courts-martial in which is imposed a sentence of death, dismissal, or dishonorable discharge and of all military commissions originating in the said expeditionary forces, will be forwarded to the said branch office for review, and it shall be the duty of the said Acting Judge Advocate General to examine and review such records, to return to the proper commanding officer for correction such as are incomplete, and to report to the proper officer any defect or irregularity which renders the findings or sentence invalid or void, in whole or in part, to the end that any such sentence or any part thereof so found to be invalid or void shall not be carried into effect. The said Acting Judge Advocate General will forward all records in which action is complete, together with his review thereof and all proceedings thereon, to the Judge Advocate General of the Army for permanent file.

By order of the Secretary of War:

Major General, Acting Chief of Staff.

Official:

H. P. MCCAIN,
The Adjutant General.

General Orders, No. 84.

WAR DEPARTMENT,
Washington, September 11, 1918.

IV. The last subparagraph of section II, General Orders, No. 7, War Department, 1918, is amended to read as follows:

The records of all general courts-martial and of all military commissions originating in the said Expeditionary Forces will be forwarded to the said branch office for review, and it shall be the duty of the said Acting Judge Advocate General to examine and review such records, to return to the proper commanding officer for correction such as are incomplete and to report to the proper officer any defect or irregularity which renders the finding or sentence illegal or void in whole or in part. The execution of all sentences involving death, dismissal, or dishonorable discharge shall be stayed pending such review. Any sentence, or any part thereof, so found to be illegal, defective, or void, in whole or in part, shall be disapproved, modified, or set aside, in accordance with the recommendation of the Acting Judge Advocate General. The said Acting Judge Advocate General will forward all records in which action is complete, together with his review thereof and all proceedings thereon, to the Judge Advocate General of the Army for permanent file.

PEYTON C. MARCH,
General, Chief of Staff.

Official:

P. C. HARRIS,
Acting The Adjutant General.

General Orders, No. 41.

WAR DEPARTMENT,
Washington, March 25, 1919.

I. Review of records of general courts-martial. The last subparagraph of section II, General Orders, No. 7, War Department, 1918, as amended by section IV, General Orders, No. 84, War Department, 1918, is further amended to read as follows:

The records of all general courts-martial and of all military commissions originating in the said Expeditionary Forces will be forwarded to the said branch office for review, and it shall be the duty of the said Acting Judge Advocate General to examine and review such records, to return to the proper commanding officer for correction such as are incomplete, and to report to the proper officer any defect or irregularity which renders the finding or sentence illegal or void in whole or in part, to the end that any such sentence or any part thereof so found to be illegal or void shall not be carried into effect. The execution of all sentences involving death, dismissal, or dishonorable discharge shall be stayed pending such review. The said Acting Judge Advocate General will forward all records in which action is complete, together with his review thereof and all proceedings thereon, to the Judge Advocate General of the Army for permanent file.

By order of the Secretary of War:

FRANK MCINTYRE,
Major General, Acting Chief of Staff.

Official:

J. T. KERR,
Adjutant General.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. When were you made acting Judge Advocate General?

Gen. KREGER. The order is dated March 10 of this year. I was furnished a copy of the order on landing in the United States on March 13.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. As a matter of fact, General, taking your testimony as a basis for the question, and the testimony of other witnesses, there is really no appellate tribunal in the military establishment? There is a reviewing tribunal with an advisory power; that is about all, is it not?

Gen. KREGER. That is one way of putting it.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. If there is any other way, let us have it, because we want to know what the fact is.

Gen. KREGER. In practice every case does undergo a careful review.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Yes; a review, but not an exercise of appellate jurisdiction to modify, reverse, or change, and it is not modified?

Gen. KREGER. The office does not assume to exercise the power to decree a reversal. A recommendation is made to the reviewing authority or to the Secretary of War on the subject.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. So that if a man has been prejudicially convicted; or convicted where some substantial right has been invaded, the only thing for him is clemency, is it not?

Gen. KREGER. Oh, no.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. I want to know where there is any appellate tribunal that can grant relief except the Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy.

Gen. KREGER. Take the case of a man tried for desertion, who is found guilty and sentenced by the court, and whose sentence as adjudged by the court is approved by the reviewing authority. The record goes up to the Judge Advocate General's Office, because execution of the judgment is stayed by the operation of General Order No. 7, 1918. It is reviewed in the Judge Advocate General's Office. That office finds the record legally insufficient to support the sentence, and advises the commanding general to that effect. The commanding general enters his disapproval on the record in lieu of his original approval. The case is ended; and the man is released from confinement and restored to duty. That is on the assumption that the commanding general will respond to the legal advice given by the Judge Advocate General.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Suppose he does not?

Gen. KREGER. If he does not, he runs counter to what is intended to be brought about by General Order No. 7; namely, that no sentence shall be carried into effect if the Judge Advocate General finds the record legally insufficient to support it.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. General Order No. 7 is not a law, but is simply a regulation of recent origin and adoption?

Gen. KREGER. Yes. It is an effective one, however. I can now recall only one case arising during the six months I served as Acting Judge Advocate General in which the reviewing authority disagreed with us on the question of disapproving a sentence.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. In violation of General Order No. 7?

Gen. KREGER. The reviewing authority appealed to the Secretary of War.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Yes.

Gen. KREGER. In other words, I do not now recall that, during the six months of my service as Acting Judge Advocate General, a single sentence was carried into effect by a commanding general after our office had advised him that the record was legally insufficient to support the sentence.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. What was done with the commanding officer who disobeyed General Order No. 7?

Gen. KREGER. Meaning——

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. In those two cases you spoke of?

Gen. KREGER. That I spoke of—cases that arose on the other side?

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Yes.

Gen. KREGER. In one of those cases my advice was simply disregarded. I do not know that anything happened to the commanding officer. I never investigated that. That was a matter for the Secretary of War.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Suppose the commanding officer, even after the adoption of General Order No. 7, had seen fit to disobey the advice of the Judge Advocate General's office, and to disregard General Order No. 7; what would you have done?

Gen. KREGER. The question you are raising, Senator, is as to the legality of the action of the reviewing authority in acting against the advice of the Judge Advocate General?

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Of the Judge Advocate General, yes.

Gen. KREGER. I suspect that under the statute, as it stands, the action of the reviewing authority would have legal foundation.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Yes; that is what I say: General Order No. 7 has for its purpose the restraint of the commanding officer by compelling him to obey the advice of the Judge Advocate General's Office, and then if he disobeys that advice, he is perfectly sustained by the law, although he may disobey a regulation.

Gen. KREGER. However, he is subject to discipline by higher authority.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Yes; did they do it in either of those cases you mentioned?

Gen. KREGER. The final authority in one of these cases was the Secretary of War; and in the other case, a major general, who stood on the advice of his own judge advocate. It was a case of two lawyers disagreeing.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Do you think that there ought to be some appellate jurisdiction that has power not only to act but to compel obedience to its judgments?

Gen. KREGER. I do.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. There has not been any disagreement on that proposition, so far as I have heard the testimony here. The only question about which there is a difference is as to whether that appellate tribunal should be composed in part or in whole of civilians, and whether or not it should be entirely within the Military Establishment, or partly within the Military Establishment, or a civil tribunal entirely. You think, I presume, that it ought to be entirely within the Military Establishment, composed entirely of military men or men in uniform?

Gen. KREGER. I think the course of appeal should remain within the Military Establishment, and end finally with the President.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. That is in accordance with the amendment proposed by the Judge Advocate General's Office to the Committee on Military Affairs in January, 1918.

Gen. KREGER. I have not examined that recently. That is my recollection, however, of the theory of that amendment. I did not participate in its preparation.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. And confirmed by the Kernan report?

Gen. KREGER. That is as it may be. I do not remember about that.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. And recommended by the majority of the American Bar Association, I suppose. And you do not think there ought to be any civilians on that appellate tribunal?

Gen. KREGER. I do not.

Senator WARREN. I just want to ask a question outside the lawyers' domain. What proportion of the officers of the Judge Advocate General's Department came from civil life and what proportion from West Point graduates?

Gen. KREGER. You are speaking of the Permanent Establishment?

Senator WARREN. Yes; and further than that, in the selection of these various judge advocates, whether there is any difference in the selection between those that come from civil life and those that happen to come from West Point and were in the line before they were sent into the Judge Advocate General's Department?

Gen. KREGER. Have you an Army Register, Senator? I can answer definitely by reference to an Army Register. Otherwise I can only give an impression.

Senator WARREN. Give your impression, and then you can correct it afterwards.

Gen. KREGER. I think about half from West Point and the other half from other sources; though if there is any difference, it is in favor of the other sources.

(NOTE BY GEN. KREGER.—The present commissioned personnel of the Judge Advocate General's Department, Permanent Establishment, consists of 10 officers who are graduates of the United States Military Academy, and 18 who are not graduates of that institution.)

Senator WARREN. Those that come from West Point have not been prepared of course to take up the duties of law officers, have they?

Gen. KREGER. They get an elementary course in law there.

Senator WARREN. But do they not have to go to some other educational institution or be in some school of the Army?

Gen. KREGER. Practically all of the men coming from the Point who have been appointed judge advocates are men who have embraced an opportunity to take a course in law. Of course they never practiced as lawyers in civil life, because they went to the Point as young men.

Senator WARREN. There is a difference between the two paths, isn't there, Gen. Kreger?

Gen. KREGER. Yes.

Senator WARREN. Now, we all understand that when a man gets a uniform on he is in the Army, whether for a month or for life. I wanted to get at, if I could, what the line of—I will not say prejudice, because none of us are supposed to be prejudiced—but whether it really made any difference in the selection for that place whether a man has been in the line of the Army or whether he has been practicing law in civil life, and the qualities of the men were known.

Gen. KREGER. It is essentially a question of the earning character and capacity of the man, rather than where he comes from.

Senator WARREN. Do you think he is better fitted if he has had a good service in civil life in various lines of crimes and misdemeanors than if he has had no experience whatever?

Gen. KREGER. Successful experience as a practicing attorney is exceedingly valuable. It is from that class that the Judge Advocate's corps was recruited during the war.

Senator WARREN. Now the laws in civil life and the laws in the Army are quite different, and the punishments and mode of procedure are exceedingly different, especially in war. Do those who come in from civil life adapt themselves to the exigencies of the Army life and Army law and Army punishments as readily as those that are from the Army in the first instance?

Gen. KREGER. There are compensating advantages and disadvantages. The lawyer from civil life who comes to the law work of the Army, with no military experience, is hampered somewhat by his lack of knowledge of conditions. He finds it difficult to orient himself. To begin with he is somewhat in the dark with respect to facts and circumstances that the man who has served in the Military Establishment knows and feels.

Senator WARREN. Now that is one side of the proposition. Now let us look at the other. The man who has had no Army life, but is well grounded in law, outside—in other words, I want to get at whether it does not make a better court to use them together than to use either one exclusively.

Gen. KREGER. Undoubtedly. The man who has served long in the Military Establishment has missed some lines of legal experience that the civilian practitioner gets. That is his disadvantage. When the two classes of officers are employed together, using one as the complement of the other, we have the ideal arrangement.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. I do not think it is a disadvantage from the civilian's viewpoint. I do not think it is a disadvantage. He has been accustomed to seeing the criminal laws of his country administered along well-settled and well-adjusted rules of evidence, with every safeguard thrown around a man who is charged with a crime, while I sometimes doubt very much if a military man sees anything else than the strict military rule in the investigation of a crime.

Gen. KREGER. The civilian lawyer coming into the legal work of the Army, particularly the disciplinary side of it, without previous military experience, seems to be impressed with an erroneous theory that the law of criminal procedure and the substantive criminal law on the military side differ so much from law and procedure on the civil side that he is quite likely to say, "This might be bad in a civil proceeding, but certainly we can not permit technicalities to stand in the way of substantial justice in a military court," with the result that at times the civilian lawyer when first coming into military law work will pass as valid a proceeding that the experienced military judge advocate would not pass. After a time that works itself out.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. General, the function of a judge advocate in the smaller as well as in the larger unit is that of the prosecutor. is it not?

Gen. KREGER. Not at all. You are speaking of the member of the judge advocate's corps, the staff judge advocate?

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Well, I am speaking now of the man who appears in the court, after a court is appointed to try a man?

Gen. KREGER. The trial judge advocate?

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Yes; the trial judge advocate. His function is that of a prosecutor?

Gen. KREGER. That is one of his functions, and if there is counsel for the accused, that is his main function; but if there is no counsel for the accused, a rare occurrence, the trial judge advocate is charged with the protection of the rights of the accused. Of course that gives him a difficult duty to perform.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. That gives him an impossible duty to perform if he is to do it impartially.

Gen. KREGER. It is certainly next door to impossible.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Why should your corps oppose something like the British system where the judge advocate is there as the legal officer of the court, protecting the court, the Government, and the defendant as well, protecting the court from the commission of error, and protecting the defendants against the admission of incompetent or improper testimony?

Gen. KREGER. You are speaking of a judge advocate who is detailed by the judge advocate general of England to sit with a general court-martial?

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Not as a part of the court, but as an adviser?

Gen. KREGER. That is, in the comparatively few specially important cases that go to general courts-martial?

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. It might be few, or it might be all.

Gen. KREGER. I think it runs only 25 or 30 cases per annum in time of peace. The district court-martial in the British Army, in time of peace, performs to a very large extent the functions that are performed by our general court-martial.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Why should not the judge advocate here appear only as an adviser?

Gen. KREGER. The trial judge advocate?

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Yes.

Gen. KREGER. Now, the trial judge advocate is the representative of the Government in presenting the case.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Now?

Gen. KREGER. Yes.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Why should not he be there rather as adviser of the court?

Gen. KREGER. Who would present the case for the Government?

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. The court could appoint a special prosecutor if it wants, just as now it appoints a man to defend the accused. As it is now, the commanding officer appoints the court, the judge advocate appoints the man who afterwards rules on the admissibility of evidence, who disapproves or approves the evidence. As a matter of fact it is a Government of men mostly, not a government of law.

Gen. KREGER. I think, Senator, I should have to take issue with you there.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. I would like to have you enlarge on that, because that is what I get from the hearings.

Gen. KREGER. It is true that the commanding officer appoints the court. It is true that he refers the charges. It is true that he designates the judge advocate. Under present regulations, he must also designate, with each court, a competent officer to represent the accused if the accused does not select someone else. And he passes upon the validity of the findings. He passes on all of these under the sanction of his oath as an officer, requiring him to conform to the law. As a matter of fact, the commanding general, in legal matters, rests upon the advice of his staff judge advocate. Again it is advisory. However, referring to the period when I was judge advocate of a department, I do not recall a single case in which the commanding general applied a different view of the law than the one I advised him was the correct one.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. That might have been so in your case, but it is not so in every case, if the records here are to be relied upon. But now wherein do we disagree? Wherein is the issue between us? You have practically repeated what I said a while ago as to the power of the commanding officer.

Gen. KREGER. Someone must do these things.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Well, I know; but you took issue with me on what I said a while ago.

Gen. KREGER. I took issue with you upon the statement, Senator, that the judgment of a military court is merely the judgment of a man, not a judgment according to law.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. That is merely a difference in the inference that we draw from a set of facts that exists.

Senator LENROOT. General, on this appellate procedure, perhaps you do not want to say that you agree with the Kernan report. Who, in your opinion, should have the appellate power and how should it be constituted?

Gen. KREGER. It should be lodged finally in the President.

Senator LENROOT. And intermediate between the commanding officer and the President, would there be any?

Gen. KREGER. So far as the details are concerned, the Judge Advocate General's Department should be sufficiently strong in the number and the capacity of its personnel to study and report upon every case promptly and with sufficient cogency to dispose of it according to law.

Senator LENROOT. Still in an advisory capacity?

Gen. KREGER. Still in an advisory capacity.

Senator LENROOT. What difference, then, would there be between that and the present law? Is not that practically the power of the President?

Gen. KREGER. About the only change that seems to me to be necessary would be to make it perfectly clear that until a case is finally disposed of by the supreme appellate power it remains open for reversal or modification of the judgment below, so that no man would have to rest under any finding or sentence that is finally regarded as unwarranted by the record.

Senator LENROOT. Well, I speak now only of prejudicial error of law. Why should the President be the final power in that? Surely he is not presumed to have any special knowledge upon that subject.

Gen. KREGER. I think that is where the power should finally be lodged, because it is essential to the efficiency of any military organization that the final authority rest in one man.

Senator LENROOT. Why—confining ourselves now to prejudicial errors of law?

Gen. KREGER. The moment another is empowered to speak the final word with respect to anything connected with a military organization we establish a second line of command.

Senator LENROOT. Let us see about that, General. Bear in mind that I am now confining myself to prejudicial errors of law. Is it your idea that in a given case, although a competent authority should judge that prejudicial error has been committed, nevertheless there should be power vested in somebody with authority to disregard that error and confirm a sentence that was actually illegal?

Gen. KREGER. No; I do not think that will be done.

Senator LENROOT. I am not speaking of what would be done. I am asking if that would not be so. Why should not there be a competent authority to settle that question of prejudicial errors of law when it would be deemed that the President himself would not necessarily be that competent authority?

Gen. KREGER. If a way were pointed out to effectuate that without establishing a second line of command, I should be ready to consider it.

Senator LENROOT. Is not this the difficulty, General, that in these different plans that have been suggested of an appellate tribunal there is always conveyed with the power of that tribunal not alone to pass upon prejudicial errors of law but really to pass upon the record as a whole and substitute its judgment for that of the court, and is not that where you get your objection?

Gen. KREGER. There is no authority and there never has been an authority that could impose a sentence more harsh than the one adjudged by the court, or enter any finding more harsh than the one arrived at by the court.

Senator LENROOT. I understand that, but there is now an authority that, although it might be admitted by every lawyer and by any competent court that prejudicial error had been committed, nevertheless, may confirm that sentence.

Gen. KREGER. If the commanding general sees fit—

Senator LENROOT. I am speaking now of the power.

Gen. KREGER. If the commanding general sees fit to disregard the advice of his judge advocate; yes.

Senator LENROOT. Yes. Now then, my question is, why should there not be a competent authority to pass upon those questions, not to substitute its judgment, but revise the action of the court-martial with reference to its judgment upon the facts? If there is error committed prejudicial to the defendant, why should not there be some competent authority to settle that, and then go to the President or to the court-martial, or to the commanding officer, it may be, for further decision in the case?

Gen. KREGER. The law at the present time lodges that power and duty in the commanding general.

Senator LENROOT. But the commanding general is not competent upon that. He takes the advice, and it is only advice, from those who are competent to pass upon it?

Gen. KREGER. The moment we lodge that final power in some one other than the commander, however, we make that other the more powerful in the organization.

Senator LENROOT. How can that be so if the jurisdiction of this other authority is limited only to ascertaining whether prejudicial error of law is committed?

Gen. KREGER. Reducing the inquiry to one single feature?

Senator LENROOT. I have stated several times, General, that that was how I was limiting it.

Gen. KREGER. On the face of the question, it would seem not to be specially important. But if the judge advocate may pass upon that finally, it makes him to that extent the superior of the major general commanding the division.

Senator LENROOT. Does it not amount to just this: that the law is superior to the commanding officer? The commanding officer, or whoever affirms the sentence, is supposed to follow the law, and the suggestion that I have made would be purely an authoritative interpretation of the law as applied to a given case. It has nothing to do with the command.

Gen. KREGER. And yet that interpretation rendered by a major would overrule a major general?

Senator LENROOT. That might be so, of course. Let me put the question then, would you think a major general, absolutely ignorant of law, should have a higher power upon the rights of an accused, knowing nothing of those rights as a matter of law, in the matter, than a subordinate officer who is fully competent to pass upon the interpretation of law?

Gen. KREGER. I see no reason for departing from the statement that I have made that the commanding general, with the advice of a competent judge advocate, and acting under the sanction of his oath, should have this final authority.

Senator LENROOT. Even though he is incompetent to exercise it?

Gen. KREGER. I can not assume that he is incompetent to exercise it.

Senator LENROOT. Well, let me give you a case. Assume then that he has no knowledge of the law.

Gen. KREGER. That is why he has a law officer to advise him.

Senator LENROOT. That comes right back to the beginning.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. That is reasoning in circles. Put it this way: If I may use your own illustration a little further, we will say Senator Warren here and Senator Lenroot and Chief Justice

White constitute the Department of the Judge Advocate General. Every record of conviction of these higher crimes, we will say, approved by the commanding general comes up to them for review. It has been approved by the commanding general, and yet these gentlemen, with Mr. Lenroot, who is a distinguished lawyer, and Justice White, who is a distinguished judge, take that record up by the four corners and they find that there has been prejudicial error, that the defendant was not properly represented, that evidence was excluded that ought to have been admitted, hearsay evidence was admitted that ought not to have been admitted, and that there was gross error in the trial of the case; in other words, that the man did not have a fair trial. They make their finding to that effect. It may not be that they can enforce the judgment of the lower court, but they can at least advise the court of the errors, whether these men had the rank of major or no rank at all.

Gen. KREGER. If the law officers properly advise the commanding general, he will never, in anything like a clear case, give effect to a different view of the law of the case.

Senator LENROOT. That is exactly what we want an appellate tribunal for.

Gen. KREGER. It is not necessary to depart from the theory of military command in order to get the result. It is not necessary to assume to deprive the President of the power to command the Army in order to get the result. It is not necessary to put the division commander in the position of commanding the division, minus the Judge Advocate, in order to get the result. In practice, the advice of the law officers is followed, except in the rare cases as to which two law officers may or do disagree.

Senator LENROOT. So far as the interpretation of the law is concerned, is there any more reason why the President should not be bound by the interpretation of the law of some other body in the military side of the Government than he is bound, as he is bound now, by the very men that he appoints, the Supreme Bench of the United States?

Gen. KREGER. That is a coordinate branch of the Government. But the President is not bound by the opinion of the Attorney General; neither is the Secretary of War bound by the opinion of the Judge Advocate General, nor the Secretary of the Navy by the opinion of the Solicitor.

Senator LENROOT. No; but Congress is given the power to make laws for the government of the Army. I do not see why it is not just as competent for Congress to create a body for the authoritative interpretation of the law as applied to a given case as it is in the civil branch of the Government. I want to be thoroughly understood. I appreciate fully the objections that have been made to mingling the power or jurisdiction of the appellate court, the substitution of its judgment for that of the court-martial, to take a sentence and do with it whatever in its judgment it thinks ought to be done. I can see how that would interfere with discipline. I am unable to see why a competent authority, however constituted, that merely interprets the law as to a given case, could possibly interfere with the military command.

Gen. KREGER. Are we able, Senator, entirely to disassociate law and fact in the trial of a case?

Senator LENROOT. Exactly; the same way that the appellate tribunals are able to do in civil law. They do not disturb the judgments of the lower courts except for errors of law. They do not attempt to substitute their judgment of the facts.

Gen. KREGER. Neither is that the rule in the administration of military justice.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. There have been absolutely some of the grossest errors committed in cases where men have been convicted that I have ever seen anywhere. And there is no use in shutting our eyes to that fact, and yet the commander is absolutely supreme in those cases?

Gen. KREGER. Error has been committed occasionally and sentences have been imposed that I should not regard as necessary; but the corrections authorized by law have also been applied.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Well, now, do you see any objection to making those errors as few as possible?

Gen. KREGER. Not only do I not see any objection to such a course, but I believe thoroughly in making them as few as possible.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. It seems to me that that proposition which you now advocate, and which was recommended to the Military Affairs Committee in January, 1918, is simply an appeal to Philip drunk and Philip sober. In other words, instead of limiting the power of the Judge Advocate General, it broadens it and gives greater power for errors than existed before.

Gen. KREGER. The power of the Judge Advocate General?

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Yes; and the military régime, I do not care what you call it. In the last analysis, the President would be governed in 99.9 cases by the advice of the Judge Advocate General or the Chief of Staff, or both. It is still the military machine that is functioning under the plan that you propose.

Gen. KREGER. It is the legal side of the military machine that is functioning. Does a man necessarily cease to be a lawyer because he puts on a uniform?

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. No; but there is the military viewpoint that you spoke of a while ago that you find cropping out all the time, of making a superior officer obey the command of a junior officer.

Gen. KREGER. That situation, of course, can not exist in a military establishment that is to function effectively.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. It does exist. I will tell you what I mean by that. Here is the commanding officer, who may be the colonel of a regiment, or he may be a higher authority. He appoints a court inferior to him. He appoints the judge advocate who prosecutes the case. He appoints the man who defends the accused. All these men are in the Military Establishment and subordinate to him. The wishes of the commanding officer may be known by these subordinate officers. Is it humanly possible that those men are not influenced at all by what they know the wishes to be of the commanding officer in the case that comes before them?

Gen. KREGER. I do not think that that would influence, in an unlawful way, the judgment of a sworn member of the court.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. You know there have been cases where the commanding officer has disapproved the findings and had the court reconvened and the accused tried over?

Gen. KREGER. I have never heard of a case, once legally tried, being tried over.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. To reconsider the case?

Gen. KREGER. To consider the evidence received before the original verdict was arrived at? If a commanding general sent down an order to the court to find otherwise than it had found, if he did more than point out cogently wherein he believed the court had erred, we should have no hesitation in holding the proceeding invalid.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. That is advisory?

Gen. KREGER. That is ancient history now, because no commanding general is now permitted to send a case back with a view to substituting a finding of guilty for one of not guilty, or to revise a sentence upward.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Well, I wish you would examine the case of a young man down in Natchez, Miss., named Winchester. I think you will find in his case that in France he was charged with embezzlement and absence without leave. He was found not guilty of embezzlement, and guilty of absence without leave, and dismissed from the Army, but the commanding officer reconvened the court—that is possible, as you say—and ordered the reconsideration of it by the court, with the result that he was convicted of embezzlement and absence without leave, dishonorably dismissed from the Army, and sentenced to the penitentiary, on the suggestion merely of the commanding officer that a man who was charged with embezzlement ought to be convicted on general principles. If I have misstated the case, I should like to have you give the record of it.

(NOTE BY GEN. KREGER.—A statement respecting this case, prepared from records on file in the Judge Advocate General's office, follows:)

1. First Lieut. Eugene K. Winchester, 155th Infantry, was tried in France on October 23 and 24, 1918, before a general court-martial convened by order of Maj. Gen. Hodges, commanding the 39th Division, American Expeditionary Forces, upon the following charges and specifications, viz:

Charge I: Violation of the 93rd article of war.

Specification: In that First Lieut. Eugene K. Winchester, 155th Infantry, did, at Masseurve, France, A. P. O. 904, on or about the 10th day of October, 1918, fraudulently convert to his own use and benefit and knowingly embezzle company funds to the value of about $1,225.00, the property of Company A, 155th Infantry, intrusted to him as company commander of said Company A, 155th Infantry.

Charge II: Violation of the 61st article of war.

Specification 1: In that First Lieut. Eugene K. Winchester, 155th Infantry, did, at Masseurve, France, without proper leave, absent himself from his command from about nine o'clock a. m. October 5th, 1918, to about seven o'clock p. m., October 5th, 1918, by going to the city of Bourges, France.

Specification 2: In that First Lieut. Eugene K. Winchester, 155th Infantry, did, at Masseurve, France, without proper leave, absent himself from his command from about seven o'clock a. m., October 10th, 1918, until about seven o'clock p. m., October 10th, 1918, by going to the city of Bourges, France.

Charge III: Violation of the 96th article of war.

Specification: In that First Lieut. Eugene K. Winchester, 155th Infantry, having been intrusted with the care and custody of the company council book of Company A, 155th Infantry, as commanding officer of said Company A, 155th Infantry, did, in France, at some time between the 3rd day of September, 1918, and the 10th day of October, 1918, while he was charged with the care and custody of said council book, negligently lose or thru design destroy the said council book, together with all vouchers connected therewith.

Charge IV: Violation of the 69th article of war.

Specification: In that First Lieut. Eugene K. Winchester, 155th Infantry, having been placed in arrest by his commanding officer on account of being charged with a crime, did, at Masseurve, France, on or about the 17th day of October, 1918, break his arrest before he was set at liberty by proper authority.

2. Lieutenant Winchester, who was represented at the trial by First Lieutenant Maurice L. Geisenberger, 155th Infantry, as counsel, pleaded not guilty to all of the charges and specifications.

3. The court found Lieutenant Winchester guilty of Charges I, II, and IV, and the specifications thereunder, not guilty of Charge III and the specification thereunder, and sentenced him "to be dismissed the service."

4. In a written review, dated October 27, 1918, Major W. W. Thompson, division judge advocate, expressed the opinion that the record was legally sufficient to support each of the findings of guilty. With reference to the charge of embezzlement, after reviewing at some length the evidence of record, Major Thompson said:

"There can be no question in my mind about the guilt of the accused on this charge."

Major Thompson concluded his review as follows:

"On the question of punishment I am of the opinion that the court has not given proper consideration to the seriousness of the offenses of which it has convicted the accused. To my mind it is still immaterial that the accused did, on the day of the trial, refund what he claims to be the amount he is due the company fund. He occupied the responsible position of company commander and was charged with the obligation of caring for the company fund of that company. Not only did he fail to do that but in some manner he lost the fund, and from what he stated to Colonel Hoskins, we may surmise in what manner he lost it, for he said he had gotten drunk and lost the funds. Could it be argued that if an enlisted man stole a thousand dollars that he would be given a dishonorable discharge and told to go home. Is it any more reasonable in morals or law that this accused should be permitted to escape the consequences of his criminal act. I am of the opinion that this record should be returned to the court and that the reviewing authority should call the court's attention to the fact that the punishment awarded is absolutely and ridiculously inadequate for the offenses of which it convicted the accused."

5. Pursuant to the foregoing recommendation of the division judge advocate, the reviewing authority, Major General Hodges, on October 27, 1918, returned the record to the court by means of an indorsement reading as follows, viz:

"The reviewing authority is of the opinion that the sentence awarded in this case is absolutely and entirely inadequate for the offenses of which the court has properly convicted the accused. The evidence is convincing beyond any question of a doubt that the accused embezzled his company funds. It is likewise clear that he absented himself without leave on two occasions and that when placed in arrest for embezzlement he had so little regard for the restriction that he broke that arrest. In the opinion of the reviewing authority, embezzlement is one of the most reprehensible and detestable offenses which any man may commit.

"The accused was entrusted with this company fund. He was occupying the honorable position of an officer in the United States Army. He violated that trust and dishonored that position by embezzling that company fund. Could it be argued that if an enlisted man had embezzled one thousand dollars or more of property or funds entrusted to him by the Government that a simple dishonorable discharge would be sufficient for the offense? Can it be argued with any more a degree of reason that simple dismissal is sufficient for this offense of embezzlement? The object of all punishment is its deterring effect on others. The reviewing authority is of the opinion that this sentence is not sufficient to impress upon the mind of the accused or upon the minds of others the grave seriousness of the crime which this accused committed by embezzling the fund.

"Having the foregoing views of this case, the reviewing authority is returning the record to the court for a reconsideration of the sentence in the light of the foregoing remarks."

The court having reconvened on October 30, 1918, revoked its former sentence and sentenced the accused "to be dismissed the service of the United States and to be confined at hard labor, at such place as the reviewing authority may direct, for a period of five years."

The reviewing authority approved this sentence, and forwarded the record of trial to the commander in chief of the American Expeditionary Forces for action under the 48th article of war.

Gen. KREGER. Did the commanding general order a finding of guilty against the accused?

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. No; he does not have to make an order. Fortunately those cases do not happen often, but they do happen, and it ought to be made impossible for them to happen at all.

Gen. KREGER. It has been.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. I do not think so. I do not agree with you, General. I would like to have you state how it has been made impossible. You mean by this recent order of the President after the war was over?

Gen. KREGER. Yes.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. That is locking the door after the horse has been stolen, and the very discussion of this subject. I have no doubt, caused the adoption of that order. What is the number?

Gen. KREGER. General Order No. 88, War Department, 1919, paragraph 1.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. I should like to have that put in the record.

GENERAL ORDERS, }
No. 88. }

WAR DEPARTMENT,
Washington, July 14, 1919.

1. Procedure respecting the return of proceedings to courts-martial for revision. The following rule of procedure prescribed by the President modifying the existing procedure respecting the return of proceedings to courts-martial for revision is published for the information and guidance of all concerned:

1. No authority will return a record of trial to any military tribunal for reconsideration of—

(a) An acquittal; or

(b) A finding of not guilty of any specification; or

(c) A finding of not guilty of any charge, unless the record shows a finding of guilty on a specification laid under that charge which sufficiently alleges a violation of some article of war; or

(d) The sentence originally imposed, with a view to increasing its severity, unless such sentence is less than the mandatory sentence fixed by law for the offense or offenses upon which a conviction has been had.

2. No military tribunal in any proceedings on revision shall reconsider its finding or sentence in any particular in which a return of the record of trial for such reconsideration is herein prohibited.

3. This order will be effective from and after August 10, 1919.

By order of the Secretary of War:

PEYTON C. MARCH,
General, Chief of Staff.

Official:

P. C. HARRIS,
The Adjutant General.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. That is a mere regulation, which, in my opinion, was adopted because of criticisms of the administration of military justice. Now, the next President who comes in may be a splendid man, honest in every purpose, and yet he may be a strict military man, and may have that order revoked. It ought not to be possible that that should lie in the power of any one man to administer justice.

Gen. KREGER. I have not the slightest objection to this regulation being embodied in a statute, because it is something that I have stood for since coming into the Army, possibly due to my training as a lawyer.

Senator LENROOT. General, if it were not for the fact, as you state, of an apparently incongruous situation of a subordinate officer controlling the action of a superior officer, would you be in favor of the action of the Judge Advocate General's office upon the review of cases for errors of law being made final?

Gen. KREGER. If it were entirely possible to divorce the whole procedure from any effect upon the necessary all-inclusiveness of the power of command, then perhaps it would make no difference, but that is practically impossible.

Senator LENROOT. I can not see, General, how the matter of prejudicial error of law can affect command, except—I do not think that affects it—the idea of the subordinate officer controlling the action of the superior officer. In that sense it might perhaps affect command, but so far as the command itself is concerned, how can securing the rights of an accused affect command?

Gen. KREGER. If the commanding general can not be trusted in respect of one thing he can not be trusted in respect of another. The moment we begin to take from him the power to decide in respect of everything, of course always under the law, in respect of everything that has to do with his command, we weaken his control over his organization. The commanding officer must be responsible for everything in connection with his organization. It is only where he is in fact the commanding officer that he can get the best out of his command.

Senator LENROOT. So in theory he must be an absolute autocrat?

Gen. KREGER. No; because we do nothing autocratically.

Senator LENROOT. In theory—I am not speaking of what you do—he must be an absolute autocrat.

Gen. KREGER. Not in theory even; because he acts always under the sanction of the law.

Senator LENROOT. Acts under the law when it is admitted that he himself may be absolutely independent to interpret the law?

Gen. KREGER. That is proceeding upon the assumption that he not only knows no law himself, but will not consider any legal advice. The commanding officer acts upon the advice of his staff officers in a very large proportion of the decisions that he makes, the things that he orders. If we are to permit the judge advocate to be final in respect of certain things said to be within his jurisdiction, why not make the quartermaster final in respect of his, and the ordnance officer in respect of his?

Senator LENROOT. Do you make no distinction, General, between protecting the rights of a citizen accused of crime and carrying out an ordinary policy, attempting to make a comparison between the conduct of the Quartermaster's Department and the court-martial trial?

Gen. KREGER. They are two different functions, each of which ought to be performed in the best possible manner. The difference seems to be that I take the view that the commanding general will perform his duties according to law, and that there is a theory on the part of others that he will not, that he will be autocratic, and arbitrary, and will disregard the law. In my 20-odd years of service in the Army, I have served under no commanding officer that would arbitrarily override considered legal advice.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Do you think that the British discipline is impaired by the fact that the judge advocate general of Great Britain holds his position for life, with a large salary, and the cases are reviewed by him and he determines whether or not there was error, and wherein the error consists, and his finding goes through the assistant adjutant general to the minister of war, and the opinion of the attorney general may then be asked by him, but not in all of the cases, the judge advocate general is followed, his opinion is followed? Do you think the British discipline is impaired by the fact that he is a civilian and that his opinions are followed in the administration of military justice?

Gen. KREGER. He is a subordinate of the prime minister, responsible to him, indirectly it is true.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Well, the appellate tribunal that Senator Lenroot is suggesting here has only the power to find whether or not there has been error. It does not propose——

Gen. KREGER. But that is establishing a separate, independent tribunal; whereas the judge advocate general of England simply reports to the Secretary of State for War through the deputy adjutant general—through a military channel—to the supreme executive authority.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Senator Lenroot was not here when that system was gone into, but the rights of the accused are further protected in the British system in this way, that if the court goes ahead and imposes a sentence in violation of the advice of the judge advocate who attends the trial, the court subjects itself to liability for damages.

Gen. KREGER. I suspect that if a court were to proceed without jurisdiction with us the same result would occur.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Then it would “break” some of the officers of the Army if it were pursued relentlessly.

Gen. KREGER. Following the Milligan case were there not a number of civil actions against the members of the commission?

Senator LENROOT. I think there were. I do not know what became of them.

Gen. KREGER. The Supreme Court held that the military commission that tried Milligan was without jurisdiction to do so; and I think that later there were civil proceedings for damages against the members of the commission with judgment for Milligan.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. That is a provision of law and regulation in Great Britain.

Senator WARREN. Have you anything to offer that has occurred to you bearing on this general subject, as to the other angles of it?

Gen. KREGER. Nothing occurs to me at the present time.

Senator LENROOT. General, you are familiar with how this bill proposes to constitute the court, allowing enlisted men to sit on the court. What would you say about that?

Gen. KREGER. I think that would not be a satisfactory means of securing both justice and discipline.

Senator LENROOT. Would you think that the sentences or that the attitude of those enlisted men would be more or less severe toward the accused as a rule?

Gen. KREGER. I am inclined to think that their attitude would not be as consistent as those of the officers. They would be more likely to be swayed by what might be termed a local view of the offense, the offender, or the occasion; because naturally the view of the enlisted man is somewhat more circumscribed than that of the officer.

Senator LENROOT. On courts-martial generally, is it your experience that officers of a court are more sympathetic to officers that are accused than to enlisted men, or otherwise?

Gen. KREGER. Taking it by and large, I do not see that there is any material difference. In some instances it has seemed to me to be manifest that the court was swayed by sympathy for an officer; in others it was quite manifest that the court was swayed by sympathy for an enlisted man, especially his family.

Senator LENROOT. It would depend on the facts in the particular case?

Gen. KREGER. Yes; it would depend on the facts in the particular case. The proceedings in the cases of officers are ordinarily more extended than in the cases of enlisted men. The issues in the cases of officers are usually the more complex, affording more opportunity for the activities of counsel and for a harder fight.

Senator LENROOT. But you do not think that the mere classes, the fact that one is an officer being tried and the other an enlisted man, without reference to the personality of either, makes any difference?

Gen. KREGER. I do not think that that appears as a consistent thread running through the administration of military justice. It is possible that when an officer is dismissed, and also sentenced to confinement, or in a case where confinement might be authorized in addition to dismissal, the period of confinement may sometimes be tempered on the theory that dismissal is, by itself, a substantial punishment. However, that is not a theory that has appealed to me. To my mind, the dishonorable discharge adjudged in the case of an enlisted man stands on a par with and amounts to as much punishment for the enlisted man as dismissal does to an officer. The two are identical, except that the words descriptive of the judgment are different.

Senator LENROOT. In addition to that, in case of two identical crimes, one by an officer and the other by an enlisted man, as a rule would it not be said that the officer should be held to a higher standard?

Gen. KREGER. That is my theory. If an officer and an enlisted man were concerned in the same offense, I should be inclined to try the officer and let the enlisted man go with an admonition.

Senator WARREN. There has been some difference of opinion and some discussion as to whether the list of specific crimes and misdemeanors and the punishments named should be enlarged, or whether the trials and the sentences and the punishment should rest upon the circumstances under which the offense occurred, the situation and surroundings when the offense was committed. What would you say about that?

Gen. KREGER. It might be practicable to enlarge somewhat the specific description of offenses, though the revision of 1916 goes considerably further than the prior form of the Articles of War did. But to lay down a specific punishment for each particular offense I think is, in the long run, impracticable, because the circumstances under which an offense may be committed vary so widely as to make it necessary to leave a very wide discretion in the court.

Senator WARREN. Now, on the whole, would the sentence be liable to be more or less severe, taken by and large, if such transgression were enumerated in the law, or if it were left to the court to provide a maximum?

Gen. KREGER. My own theory is that the statute itself should describe the various offenses and indicate maximum limits of punishment somewhat generally, and that the executive should have the power to define the limits of punishments, not only in peace time, but also in war time.

Senator WARREN. Do you mean to have some standard maximum or not?

Gen. KREGER. Yes.

Senator WARREN. If you have that standard there are times, of course, when you want to reach above that standard and times when it seems desirable to go below it. What I was getting at was, what would be the probable effect, especially with the newer officers in time of war and the surrounding excitement—whether they would be less liable or more liable to go to that maximum, or to consider the line from zero to the maximum entirely within their decision.

Gen. KREGER. I am inclined to think, from observing what occurred at the beginning of this war, that if there were a list of maximum limits in the statute, sufficiently high for all possible conditions, the courts would crowd the limit pretty closely. The necessarily high statutory limit would serve as a suggestion, whereas, without that, perhaps the effect of peace-time limits, defined by the executive, would not be entirely lost even though the army were extended. Does that in anywise answer your question, Senator?

Senator WARREN. Yes; that answers it. Now, if you care to. I think you, perhaps, would have more knowledge of the comparison between the severity of sentences over on the other side, in the trials by courts-martial, with those here, in the preliminaries, when these men were being trained, than perhaps would any other officer or any other one who has come before the committee. You have had those cases come to you both from the United States and from the other side, have you not?

Gen. KREGER. Yes.

Senator WARREN. Well, now, taking it as a class, and especially in the minor offenses, has there been a difference, and if there has been a difference which has been the more severe, taken as a lot, those abroad or those at home?

Gen. KREGER. I should have to give my impression. It is something that I asked the statistical section, some little time ago, to investigate with a view to getting something definite to back up my impression. The section has not yet found the time to make the necessary examination. My impression, however, is that the sentences adjudged in Europe did not include so large a proportion of what may be regarded as severe sentences as was the case over here.

Senator LENROOT. It ought to have been the other way.

Senator WARREN. You took the words out of my mouth. That is the reason why I am making this inquiry, and of course we should like to get the testimony back as soon as we can, but we should like to have you give some information on that and as specifically as possible, because I have had the impression, from listening to this testimony, and also from what I have seen from time to time in the press, but more especially from the statements made here, that at the front, right up under the guns, those sentences have been far less in the whole aggregate of years or months of imprisonment than they have been over here. I should like to be set right about it.

Gen. KREGER. I will try to have such a statement prepared.

Senator WARREN. It is not entirely a matter of curiosity, but while these younger men who are associated with me on this committee will see more wars, I do not expect to see more than a dozen more, and I think this legislation ought to be founded not only on our experience of what we have had, but on the practices that might be adopted in another war, judging from this last one. For instance, if we are going to bring in another large army, we shall have to do it as we did this time, from the body of the people, those that do not volunteer but who are willing to do their duty; and matters will be left largely in the hands of officers that will be taken from such a body of men, some from the Regular Army and some from the new army, and I want to see what the tendency was this time in order to guard against it in the next, if necessary.

Gen. KREGER. Discipline and justice must go hand in hand. No organization that is without discipline can dispense justice, and no organization that does not dispense justice can have discipline. The question or the difference of opinion is how may we best secure the desired result.

Senator WARREN. Now, from reports we get, it would seem that out of the thousands of cases—and there must be thousands—there must be some erroneous judgments, and there have been some sentences that seem to me have not only verged on the absurd and ridiculous, but have exceeded ordinary absurdity. Of course, if that is only occasionally, here and there, that is one thing. But on the other hand, if the general current is in that direction, I think we ought to seek a way to check it. Discipline must accompany justice and there must be in the face of the enemy a way of reaching it and reaching it quickly.

Gen. KREGER. I have some statistics that touch indirectly on that subject. During the period from April 6, 1917, to August 31, 1919, 30,916 men were tried by general courts-martial.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. General courts?

Gen. KREGER. General courts-martial. These trials resulted in 24,668 approved convictions. The approved convictions included 5,991 cases in which dishonorable discharge or dismissal was executed; 6,674 cases in which dishonorable discharge was adjudged but the execution thereof suspended; and 12,003 cases in which the judgment did not include death, dismissal, or dishonorable discharge, what may be termed minor sentences, involving ordinarily terms of confinement not in excess of six months, and in approximately 3,000 cases no confinement whatever.

Senator WARREN. It must be less than six months in certain courts, must it?

Gen. KREGER. Yes. Of course the general court-martial can adjudge anything from reprimand on upwards. Speaking of general court-martial cases, of the approved convictions, approximately half carried neither dishonorable separation from the service nor confinement for terms in excess of six months. Of the 30,916 trials, 6,248 resulted in acquittals or disapproved convictions. This does not include the cases in which the records were found legally insufficient to support the sentences when they came on up to the Judge Advocate General's office.

Senator WARREN. That 31,000 covered what—the entire force on the other side; 2,000,000 men?

Gen. KREGER. That covered the entire United States Army, all over the world.

Senator WARREN. For how long a time?

Gen. KREGER. For the period from April 6, 1917, to August 31, 1919, barring a few cases that are still in the office here in the course of examination, and which therefore have not been included.

Senator WARREN. Well, then, that comprehended 4,000,000 men that were being demobilized during that time?

Gen. KREGER. Yes.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Did those cover life sentences?

Gen. KREGER. Yes. Cases of life sentence would come in with the dishonorable discharges or the dismissals.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Have you the aggregate of the number of years of sentence passed on those 31,000 men?

Gen. KREGER. I can give it to you in an indirect form, I think. This is a table prepared a day or two ago covering 21,111 convictions involving confinement, and therefore not covering the total number of convictions. It runs from April 6, 1917, to September 20, 1919, and is divided up into three periods. During the period from April 6, 1917, to June 30, 1918, 8,840 convictions carried an average of 2.66 years as the term of confinement.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. That is the original sentence?

Gen. KREGER. That is the original sentence.

Senator WARREN. Those were to disciplinary barracks as well as to the penitentiaries?

Gen. KREGER. Yes. This is a statement prepared by Lieut. Col. Dinsmore, the chief of the statistical section of the office, showing the average sentence to confinement adjudged by general courts-martial and approved by reviewing authorities from the beginning of the war up to and including September 20, 1919.

Senator WARREN. Now, that is the sentence that was given?

Gen. KREGER. Yes.

Senator WARREN. Of course, I presume you can not tell exactly the actual service under those sentences, and I suppose a great many of them were changed.

Gen. KREGER. I have some figures here; but possibly you would like the figures for the other two periods.

Senator WARREN. Yes.

Gen. KREGER. From July 1, 1918, to June 30, 1919, the average term of confinement adjudged in 11,016 cases was 3.95 years. During the period from July 1, 1919, to September 20, 1919, it was 1.92 years.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. That is the average?

Gen. KREGER. Yes; by periods.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. What is an average, how many years?

Gen. KREGER. The average sentence for the 21,111 cases is 3.29 years.

Senator WARREN. Now, what we want to get at is the actual service. I suppose a good many are still serving.

Gen. KREGER. I think I can put a statement in the record, after reference to the records in the office, touching that.

Senator WARREN. Do that.

Gen. KREGER. I have a showing here as to the average length of time served by 1,107 men who were honorably restored to duty through the disciplinary barracks at Fort Leavenworth. The average sentence originally adjudged upon those men was 7.4 years. The average period actually served in confinement before their honorable restoration to duty was .43 of one year.

Senator WARREN. A little less than 6 months.

Gen. KREGER. Yes; a little less than 6 months.

Senator WARREN. That is for Leavenworth. What about the other two?

Gen. KREGER. I do not happen to have the figures for the other two.

Senator WARREN. You can insert them, can you?

Gen. KREGER. Yes; if the transcript does not have to come back too soon, I can get the information.

Senator WARREN. I suggest that you wire for it.

Gen. KREGER. I would have to telegraph to Jay and Alcatraz for the figures.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Are there only three prisons?

Gen. KREGER. Only three disciplinary barracks; yes. Here is a statement showing the number of men restored to the colors from the disciplinary barracks.

Senator WARREN. The ones that served out their sentences and received dishonorable discharge? What proportion should you say of the whole was passed out at the end, dishonorably discharged; that is, dishonorably discharged from the Army? Of course the figures are all staggering, because of the size of the Army.

Gen. KREGER. Those figures I do not happen to have at hand; but I do have some that are indicative of the speed with which convicted men have flowed through the disciplinary and penal institutions. On April 1, 1917, there were 2,101 general prisoners in the disciplinary barracks, and 212 in penitentiaries.

Senator WARREN. That was about the commencement of the war?

Gen. KREGER. Yes; April 1, 1917. During the period from April 1, 1917, to July 31, 1919, there were received from all sources at the disciplinary barracks 11,492 men, and in the penitentiaries 1,352 men.

Senator WARREN. That is, inclusive of the first?

Gen. KREGER. No; those are the new receipts. The total to be accounted for for the period is: In the disciplinary barracks, 13,593 men, and in the penitentiaries, 1,564 men.

Senator LENROOT. Does that include those in France?

Gen. KREGER. Yes; with comparatively few exceptions. This report was made as of July 31, and on August 16 there were only 34 general prisoners in France.

Senator LENROOT. It does not amount to much.

Senator WARREN. They are supposed to bring the prisoners home as fast as possible?

Gen. KREGER. The homeward movement of the general prisoners in France began in May and was practically carried to a conclusion by the end of July. The whole number of men in confinement in disciplinary barracks on August 30, 1919, was 3,728.

Senator WARREN. Four weeks ago?

Gen. KREGER. Yes.

Senator WARREN. How many in the penitentiaries?

Gen. KREGER. Eight hundred and fifty-five in the penitentiaries.

Senator WARREN. That would be over a thousand more than there were at the commencement of the war in both.

Gen. KREGER. The total at the commencement of the war was 2,313 in both classes of institutions; and in both classes of institutions on August 30, 1919, there were 4,583 men. In other words, the increase through the 4,000,000 citizen army was about 2,200. That is the increase up to August 30, 1919.

Col. Rigby told me that there had been some inquiry about the restorations to duty. We have sufficient figures upon which to base a statement by quarters: During the quarter, April to June, 1917, 172 men were restored to duty; July to September, 1917, 136; October to December, 1917, 237; January to March, 1918, 153; April to June, 1918, 160; July to September, 1918, 270; October to December, 1918, 267; January to March, 1919, 427; April to June, 1919, 453; July and August, 1919, 200.

Those figures give the most definite information our office had last night on restorations to duty at the three disciplinary barracks.

I gave you, a short time ago, the average length of time that men had served at Fort Leavenworth prior to restoration.

Senator WARREN. Well, General, I can not figure how you should have so very many to go through the penitentiaries and disciplinary barracks in the short time of this war and come out with so few left if they have served the time that you have given us, on the average.

Gen. KREGER. I am giving the average sentences adjudged.

Senator WARREN. I thought you were giving us the length of service as you went along.

Gen. KREGER. No.

Senator WARREN. I am very glad to see the way it is. I am not finding fault.

Senator LENROOT. The majority were short sentences?

Gen. KREGER. Yes; as indicated a bit ago, out of the twenty-four thousand and some hundreds of approved convictions there were 12,000 sentences that were minor sentences, six months or less.

Senator WARREN. That would bring it down, all right.

Gen. KREGER. And then, of course, the clemency agencies have been operating on these sentences.

Senator LENROOT. Has the clemency board acted upon practically all of the cases? Of course, they act upon them over and over again, more than once. Have all of the cases been gone through, practically?

Gen. KREGER. Very nearly so. A few cases from abroad have not yet been acted upon, because some of these prisoners reached home as late as the latter part of July. A small portion of the cases from France has not yet been disposed of. At the present time we are engaged to a considerable extent with the reexamination of cases that have heretofore been passed upon. We had in the office this morning 489 clemency papers.

Senator LENROOT. Does that cover definite periods, General?

Gen. KREGER. An automatic report was called for by special order of the Secretary of War in January. Some time ago I suggested that it be made the rule that, as soon as a prisoner reaches a penal institution, a report be made of his case. Such reports on recent cases are coming in now—cases that have been passed on by our board of review, and the legality of the sentences determined, within the last few weeks.

Senator WARREN. Are there any of those details that you wish to insert? Of course, you have got the meaty part of them, but would it enhance the value of the testimony to include any of those?

Gen. KREGER. I may be able to attach some additional statements.

Senator WARREN. Make it as plain as you can for us to review. Of course, a tabulated statement is always preferable to figures given in a conversational way.

Senator LENROOT. General, from a disciplinary standpoint alone, is there any material difference, in your judgment, between a sentence of 5 years and a sentence of 20 years; I mean upon the morale of the Army?

Gen. KREGER. In my judgment; no.

Senator WARREN. What about 40 years or 60 years?

Gen. KREGER. My judgment would favor the 5-year sentence, as against the 40 or 60 years, as a disciplinary measure. Justice along with discipline are dependent upon each other. If a command were to form the impression that the two are not traveling hand in hand, both will suffer.

Senator WARREN. I should consider the whole idea that the dispensation of justice is a matter of discipline; in other words, prepare the man in a way to be a better man or to retrieve him entirely unless it be a very few who, like mad dogs, ought to be penned up in the penitentiary.

Gen. KREGER. The military punishment can be combined in a very large proportion of the cases with salvage.

Senator LENROOT. What has been your observation on that and your experience in the Army?

Gen. KREGER. On the salvage proposition?

Senator LENROOT. Yes.

Gen. KREGER. The more experienced officers, I think, as a rule, are the ones that make the greater effort to save a man. Youth is likely to be somewhat intolerant of the errors or weaknesses of others.

Senator WARREN. Of other youths?

Gen. KREGER. Yes. There is a wide difference, Senator, in the extent to which the court-martial system is invoked by different officers. A number of years ago, while serving as judge advocate of the department, I found the number of summary court trials in one organization running very high. A letter was written to the company commander, inviting attention to his high summary court record. He insisted it was due to local circumstances, the character of the men, the origin of the men. However, at the same station, under identical conditions, with men from the same source, there was another company commander who was getting along with less than one-half as many summary court trials. Therefore it was proper to point out to the first captain that his explanation of his high summary court rate was not convincing. He began to study the problem more fully, with the result that there was a very decided reduction in the number of summary court proceedings in his command.

Two district attorneys will probably lay different budgets before their grand juries; so two company commanders will proceed differently in the matter of the trial of their men. I confess that I am somewhat inclined to gauge the efficiency of a command by the rate of trials by courts-martial. Other things being equal, the lower court-martial rate ordinarily is found in the more efficient organizations.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. On the 26th of February last, when the subject of trials by court-martial was under consideration, Senator McKellar went into the proposition of the stigma of conviction and the question of punishment, and Gen. Crowder in answer to a question asked by Senator McKellar, on page 281 of the hearings, said:

Gen. CROWDER. Now, addressing myself to the two elements of that briefly. I want to say that before 30 days I shall have 60 per cent, or maybe 70 per cent, of these sentences remitted in their excessive portions; and within 60 days I hope to have the whole field cleared up, so that you need not consider the question of the punishment. That is the order. They will be worked out very expeditiously. So there remains to be considered only this question of removing the stigma of conviction.

Has the whole thing been cleared up within 60 days from February 26, 1919?

Gen. KREGER. With comparatively few exceptions the examination of the approximately 5,000 cases of men then confined in disciplinary barracks and penitentiaries in the United States—the cases to which, I believe, Gen. Crowder referred—was completed about June 1. About that time we began to give special attention to cases from the other side. Nearly all of the cases from the other side have now been examined. Of course, the task of the clemency agencies is not entirely completed. They are working continuously—considering the cases of men convicted since March 1 of this year, and upon application considering, for a second and even for a third time, the cases of men who had been convicted at an earlier period. From February 25 to September 12, 1919, the clemency agencies examined and reported upon the cases of 6,598 men.

JOHN P. DINSMORE,
Lieutenant Colonel, Judge Advocate,
Chief, Statistical Section.

It would seem to be appropriate for me to add here, with the permission of the committee, a brief statement concerning certain matters mentioned in the record at earlier stages of the hearings.

On pages 162 and 163 of the record it is stated in substance that Col. William S. Weeks, judge advocate, was relieved from duty in the Judge Advocate General's office in an unusual manner, without notice, and "ordered to Charleston, an insignificant place, which, of course, will carry immediate reduction." The assignment of Col. Weeks to duty at Charleston was ordered upon my recommendation, made while I was serving as Acting Judge Advocate General. In March, Col. Weeks orally expressed to me a desire to be transferred from Washington to West Point as professor of law at the United States Military Academy. Subsequently he expressed the same desire in writing. No request for his detail was received from the superintendent of the academy. Early in June Col. Weeks was offered an assignment as department judge advocate at Charleston, which he declined. He was then advised that it was my intention to request an order assigning him to duty at Charleston. In July he was again advised to the same effect. On August 21 I filed a request for the order, which was issued on the following day. The transfer did not involve a reduction in rank. He still holds an emergency commission as colonel.

On pages 192 and 193 of the record appears a statement to the effect that the commandants of the disciplinary barracks, who were very potential factors in the granting of clemency, were brought on to Washington and that they and the Acting Judge Advocate General conferred with the special clemency board and the clemency examiners, and agreed upon some principles governing the award of clemency, but that Col. Ansell, president of the board, though present in his office, was not notified of, and was not present at, the meeting. I was Acting Judge Advocate General when the conference referred to took place, but did not arrange it; neither was I present.

On pages of 193-196 and 203-207 of the record it is suggested that Col. Ansell was denied the necessary freedom and authority in the performance of his functions as president of the special clemency board; that his views with reference to the personnel of the special clemency board and the agencies connected therewith did not receive due attention; and that I, as Acting Judge Advocate General, obstructed the exercise of clemency in appropriate measure and delayed unnecessarily the examination of the cases of general prisoners from abroad.

The facts are otherwise.

Following receipt and examination of the memoranda dated March 21 and March 24, 1919 (Ansell Exhibit S and Ansell Exhibit T, record, pp. 193 and 195), I informed Col. Ansell that by virtue of his assignment as president of the special clemency board he was vested with authority to communicate his views and instructions respecting the exercise of clemency to all of the personnel serving under him—the personnel of the special clemency agencies. No orders or instructions to the contrary were issued, at any time, by me or by my direction. On April 7, at my suggestion, and in my presence, Col. Ansell redated the memorandum of March 21 (Ansell Exhibit S, record, p. 193), modified the address by striking out my name and substituting therefor "The special clemency board, the special clemency examiners, and the special board of review," and adding, after his own name at the end of the memorandum, the title "Lieutenant Colonel, Judge Advocate, President Special Clemency Board."

By my direction the memorandum, thus dated, addressed, and authenticated, was mimeographed and distributed to the personnel of the clemency agencies of the Judge Advocate General's Office. A copy of the memorandum, as published, appears as an inclosure to my first indorsement, dated June 19, upon a subsequent memorandum from Col. Ansell, dated May 17, and therefore is not copied here but is copied later in connection with a copy of that indorsement. Throughout his service under my direction as Acting Judge Advocate General, Col. Ansell was left free to exercise all the authority that his assignment to duty as president of the Special Clemency Board implied.

In his memorandum of March 24 (Ansell Exhibit T; Record, p. 195) Col. Ansell requested that Col. Easby-Smith be relieved from duty with the special clemency board. Col. Easby-Smith was an industrious member of that board, conscientiously devoted to his task, who acted throughout with due regard for the rights and the interests of the individual as well as for the rights and interests of the Government. After careful observation and consideration I could discover no reason, other than Col. Ansell's request, for relieving Col. Easby-Smith, and therefore declined to do so, advising Col. Ansell accordingly. So far as I now recall, this is the only specific request touching the personnel of the special clemency board and cooperating agencies that was preferred by Col. Ansell and denied by me. He was uniformly consulted with reference to the assignment of officers to duty in connection with the special clemency board or their relief therefrom, and no such assignment or relief was ordered by me against his expressed wishes.

With reference to the suggestion that due to my action or inaction examination of the cases of general prisoners from abroad was unnecessarily delayed, the records of this office show that the special clemency board, in outlining a plan for carrying on the work of the board, said:

It is believed that consideration of the cases of prisoners serving confinement outside of the United States must be deferred until after the examination of the cases of those serving sentences of confinement within the United States, since, it is thought, the obtaining of the necessary information and the relationship of the offense to the theatre of war are considerations which would concur in such postponement.

Col. Ansell's concurrence in this plan is indicated by the fact that his signature is appended to the report (filed February 21, 1919) without any indication of dissent. On May 15, two days before Col. Ansell's memorandum of May 17 (Ansell Exhibit U; Record, p. 204) was written, I took steps toward bringing home the general prisoners from abroad, in order that their return might coincide substantially with the completion of the examination of the cases of general prisoners confined in the United States at the time the special clemency board was organized. The homeward movement of general prisoners from abroad began during the latter part of May and was practically completed by the end of July. The task of examining into their cases was taken up coincident with the completion of the first branch of the task of the special clemency agencies. At no time since the middle of March have the clemency agencies of the Judge Advocate General's Office been without all the work they could dispose of, and at no time during that period has the personnel of those agencies been reduced so as to be unable to meet the demands of the situation.

In this connection it may be added that the cases of nearly all of the general prisoners sent home from abroad have been examined and reported upon by the clemency agencies of the Judge Advocate General's office.

The measure of the clemency granted and the extent of the field covered during the period of my service as Acting Judge Advocate General is disclosed by the "statement showing activities of clemency agencies in the office of the Judge Advocate General of the Army during the period from February 25 to September 12, 1919, inclusive," inserted in connection with some of my earlier remarks on the subject. The nature of the activities of the clemency agencies is disclosed somewhat in detail by the official correspondence which followed the filing of Col. Ansell's memorandum of May 17, 1919 (Ansell Exhibit U; record, p. 204). A copy of that correspondence is appended.

MAY 17, 1919.

Memorandum for the Secretary of War

(Through the Acting Judge Advocate General):

I recommend:

1. That the special clemency work which is now limited in its considerations to prisoners confined in the United States be extended to prisoners in our Army serving sentences in Europe.

2. That a more thorough review now be made of all doubtful cases here of prisoners still having more than three months to serve; this in recognition of the fact that the work of special clemency examination has been done so hastily as to preclude assurance of satisfactory results.

3. That a thorough review now be made of all cases here and abroad in which the record of the proceedings would indicate the advisability of extending a full pardon.

4. That if I should be entrusted with this work as president of the special clemency board I be permitted to select, as far as possible, the personnel of the board in order that it may be in general sympathy with my views as to clemency.

S. T. ANSELL,
*Lieutenant Colonel, Judge Advocate,
President of Special Clemency Board.*

WAR DEPARTMENT, J. A. G. O., June 19, 1919.

To The Adjutant General of the Army.

1. Attention is invited to the foregoing memorandum for the Secretary of War, submitted by Lieutenant Colonel S. T. Ansell, judge advocate, president of the special clemency board functioning in this office, which reads as follows:

“I recommend:

“1. That the special clemency work which is now limited in its considerations to prisoners confined in the United States be extended to prisoners in our Army serving sentence in Europe.

“2. That a more thorough review now be made of all doubtful cases here of prisoners still having more than three months to serve; this in recognition of the fact that the work of special clemency examination has been done so hastily as to preclude assurance of satisfactory results.

“3. That a thorough review now be made of all cases here and abroad in which the record of the proceedings would indicate the advisability of extending a full pardon.

“4. That if I should be intrusted with this work as president of the special clemency board, I be permitted to select, as far as possible, the personnel of the board, in order that it may be in general sympathy with my views as to clemency.”

2. On January 22, 1919, the following instructions, the promulgation of which has been recommended by the Judge Advocate General of the Army on January 18, 1919, were telegraphed by The Adjutant General of the Army to officers exercising general court-martial jurisdiction, viz:

“In view of the cessation of hostilities and the reestablishment of conditions approximating those of peace within the territorial limits of the United States, the propriety of observing limitations upon the punishing powers of courts-martial as established by Executive order of December fifteen, nineteen sixteen, is obvious. Where in exceptional cases a court-martial adjudges and a reviewing authority approves punishments in excess of the limits described in said Executive order, the reasons for so doing will be made a matter of record period. Trial by general court-martial within the territorial limits stated will be ordered only where the punishment that might be imposed by a special or summary court or by the commanding officer under the provisions of the one hundred fourth article of war would be under all the circumstances of the case clearly inadequate.”

Since January 22, 1919, courts and reviewing authorities have, of course, functioned with the instructions of that date in view.

3. With the approval of the Secretary of War, an office order was issued on January 28, 1919, establishing a special clemency board in this office, under the presidency of Brigadier General S. T. Ansell. That board began to pass upon cases on or about February 25, 1919, and has been engaged continuously upon the task since that time. The effect of the instructions touching the jurisdiction and functions of the special clemency board, as I understand those instructions, is to require the board to examine with a view to the extension of clemency and the adjustment of penalties to the requirements of justice and discipline, but in view of the restoration of conditions approximating those of peace, the cases of all general prisoners confined in penitentiaries or in disciplinary barracks in the United States for offenses committed on or after April 6, 1917, and tried by general court-martial on or before January 22, 1919, the ate upon which the instructions mentioned in paragraph 2, supra, were promulgated.

4. At the beginning of the work it was estimated that the execution of the plan would require consideration of approximately 5,000 cases, there being at that time 5,027 men in confinement in penitentiaries and disciplinary barracks in the United States under sentences adjudged by general courts-martial. Up to the present time the special clemency board has examined and reported upon 220 cases and the clemency section of the Military Justice Division, which has been engaged in like examinations under instructions identical with those addressed to the special clemency board, has examined and passed upon 1,170 cases. The total number of cases thus examined and reported upon is, therefore, 5,390. Approximately 100 cases are still pending in this office. The consideration of these cases will be completed and reports made with the least possible delay.

5. That the total number of cases reported upon and still to be reported upon exceeds the 5,027 mentioned in the preceding paragraph is due to the fact that since February 25 additional men convicted during the war period have been sent to penitentiaries and disciplinary barracks in the United States. Some of these men have come from posts and camps in the United States, and others have been returned from Europe and Asia. As soon as the examination of the cases coming within the existing instructions addressed to the special clemency board has been completed, a more detailed report of the activities of that board will be submitted.

6. With reference to the second paragraph of Lieutenant Colonel Ansell's memorandum, attention is invited to the following outline of the plan pursued by the special clemency agencies in this office. An officer of the department examined a record, made a brief abstract thereof, and indicated the action that in his opinion should be taken. The record and the examiner's memorandum then went to one of the sections of the special clemency board, each such section consisting of two officers. These two officers, after a study of the examiner's memorandum and such examination of the record as appeared to them to be necessary or advisable, entered their recommendation. Thereafter the record went either to Lieutenant Colonel Ansell as president of the Special Clemency Board or to Lieutenant Colonel E. M. Morgan as vice chairman of that board, after which it came to the head or acting head of the office for consideration. In any case in which the legal sufficiency of the record or the fairness of the proceedings had been questioned by the examiner or by the section of the Special Clemency Board the record went to a Special Board of Review, consisting of: Lieutenant Colonel James S. Sanner, formerly justice of the Supreme Court of Montana; Major Andrew J. Copp, jr., of California, who has practiced law for 14 years; and Major Henry Buck, of South Carolina, who has practiced law for 16 years. In case the report of this board suggested action more favorable to the prisoner than had been recommended theretofore the record was returned to the Special Clemency Board for further consideration in the light of such report. It follows that the general result of the intervention of the special board of review was not to reduce the measure of clemency theretofore recommended by the Special Clemency Board, but to bring about, in certain cases, an increase in the measure of clemency so recommended. Upon completion the memorandum respecting each case considered by this office went to the office of the Secretary of War for final action.

7. A copy of a report dated June 15, 1919, made by Lieutenant Colonel Sanner as chairman of the special board of review, is inclosed herewith. In this connection it should be noted that, in harmony with the plan outlined above, the intention has been to recommend such appropriate corrective action as lay within the power of the Secretary of War in those cases in which the special board of review found the record legally insufficient to support the sentence either in whole or in part, and also to recommend similar corrective action in those cases in which that board found the record unsatisfactory, or of doubtful sufficiency, considered from a legal point of view. The files are now being examined with a view to making certain that there shall be no failure to recommend appropriate corrective action in all such cases. There is also inclosed herewith a copy of a memorandum addressed to the Special Clemency Board, the special clemency examiners, and the special board of review, under date of April 7, 1919, by Lieutenant Colonel Ansell as president of the Special Clemency Board. Consideration of the instructions under which the clemency agencies of this office have operated, in connection with my observation of the attitude of the officers engaged in the work, has led me to the conclusion that the work has been done with care and with a desire to do justice, and in case of doubt to lean to the side of mercy.

8. Recently the four officers who, at the present time, are functioning as members of the two existing sections of the Special Clemency Board, were called upon for an expression of their views as to the manner in which the clemency work has been performed, and as to the necessity, from the standpoint of fairness and justice, of reexamining the records heretofore examined under instructions addressed to the Special Clemency Board. A like expression of opinion was requested of the Chief of the Military Justice Division and the Chief of the Clemency Section of that Division. Copies of the memoranda submitted by the six officers referred to are enclosed herewith. The opinion of those officers, as disclosed by the memoranda they filed, is to the effect that the work in question has been performed with care and solicitude and that a reexamination of the records in the mass is not necessary. This would seem to be the correct view. The Special Clemency Board is now engaged in the study of the records in nearly 200 cases in which the Secretary of War after passing upon the original clemency memoranda submitted by this office deemed reconsideration advisable. Further applications for clemency will no doubt be filed in most cases—certainly in those cases in which for any reason the accused believes that full and complete justice has not been accorded him. Action upon such application will, it is believed, bring to light any deprivation of substantial legal rights or any undue severity in sentences that may have escaped attention and corrective action in the course of the examination thus far made. It is probable that in some, at least, of the cases in which the record was found legally insufficient to support the sentence, the corrective action heretofore taken should be supplemented by further action looking to the granting of full pardons, so as to remove any disabilities that may have resulted from the convictions. Steps to that end should be taken as soon as that may be done without interfering with the performance of other tasks, that may perhaps be regarded, for the present, as more pressing. Probably also in a number of other cases substantial justice, and a regard for the future usefulness of the individuals concerned as members of civil society, will require, or at least warrant, the granting of full pardons. However, it is believed that cases of this kind are more likely to be disclosed effectively by applications for pardon on the part of the individuals concerned, generally after they shall have been restored to their civil relations, than by a reexamination of the entire file of thousands of general court-martial records. Upon receipt of such application each can be given the careful and painstaking consideration to which it is entitled. The task of first importance to be performed in the immediate future by the clemency agencies of this office would seem to be the examination of the records of trial of general prisoners not thus far examined in this office with a view to the extension of clemency; i. e., the records of trial of general prisoners now being returned, or soon to be returned, from foreign parts.

9. In a memorandum entitled "Plan for carrying out work of clemency board appointed under office order of January 28, 1919," signed by the members of that board and approved by the Judge Advocate General, it is said, paragraph 5:

"It is believed that consideration of the cases of prisoners serving confinement outside of the United States must be deferred until after the examination of the cases of others serving sentences of confinement within the United States, since it is thought that the obtaining of the necessary information and the relationship of the offense to the theater of war are considerations which would concur in such postponement."

Under date of May 15, this office, in a memorandum addressed to The Adjutant General, requested information as to the number of general prisoners in confinement in Europe, classified with reference to the place and term of confinement under the following heads:

1. General prisoners under sentence to be confined in penitentiaries.
2. General prisoners under sentence to be confined in the United States Disciplinary Barracks or a branch thereof.

3. General prisoners under sentence to be confined in a place under military control, other than the United States Disciplinary Barracks or a branch thereof, under—

- (a) Sentences involving confinement for six (6) months or more,
- (b) Sentences involving confinement for less than six (6) months.

The information thus requested was furnished this office on June 4, in the form of a cablegram dated June 1, from Gen. Pershing, reading as follows:

"Number of general prisoners in Europe: First, penitentiary, 88; second, disciplinary barracks or branches thereof, 64; third, other places under military control—first, having six months or over still to serve, 751; second, having less than six months still to serve, 195.

10. Before my departure from France on March 4, 1919, information reached me unofficially that a clemency section had been established in the office of the Judge Advocate General Headquarters, American Expeditionary Forces. Information reaching me since that date indicates that the section has continued to function. It is known that clemency has been extended in a number of cases, and no doubt clemency has been extended in other cases in which the action taken has not come to the attention of this office. Nevertheless the cases of general prisoners in confinement in Europe should receive timely attention.

11. This office has been informally advised that contingents of general prisoners are en route to the United States. In the execution of the plan of demobilization all the general prisoners now in Europe no doubt will be returned to the United States in the near future. The cases of these men should receive attention as soon as possible after their arrival in the United States, and their cases should be dealt with in conformity with the principles that have guided this office in passing upon the 5,390 cases referred to in paragraph 4, supra.

12. Recently, as the inflow of applications for clemency and of clemency memoranda from the various places of confinement in the United States has decreased, a considerable portion of the personnel originally assigned to duty with the special clemency board has been assigned to other duty in order to meet the pressing demands made upon the department for officers of legal training and experience for service in connection with the solution of problems incident to the cessation of hostilities and the consequent demobilization. When the cases of general prisoners being returned or about to be returned from foreign parts are taken up for consideration it will be necessary again to augment the personnel of the clemency agencies of this office. This may perhaps be done in part by the assignment of officers now on other duty but whose services may become available for this purpose in the near future. Any remaining deficiencies of personnel will have to be met by means of new appointments of officers qualified for the duty in question.

13. The following recommendations are submitted for consideration, viz.:

(a) That general prisoners now being held in confinement in foreign parts be returned to the United States as soon as practicable.

(b) That as to all general prisoners returning from foreign parts steps be taken to assure that a clemency memorandum be forwarded to this office by the commandant of the place of confinement with the least possible delay after the arrival of the prisoner.

(c) That the records of all general prisoners returned from foreign parts be examined as expeditiously as practicable by the special clemency board and cooperating clemency agencies in this office, in conformity with instructions heretofore addressed to said board and cooperating agencies, the work to be prosecuted as has been done in connection with the records of general prisoners in the United States since the establishment of the special clemency board in this office.

(d) That so far as practicable general prisoners having only short terms left to serve be held near ports of debarkation until their cases can be examined and reported upon.

(e) That whenever a recently convicted general prisoner files his first application for clemency the commandant of the place of confinement shall forward the application without delay, with the proper notations and his recommendation thereon.

(f) That in any case in which the commandant of the place of confinement regards the sentence as unduly severe, or in which in his opinion there is any reason making for clemency, if none has been granted, or for additional clemency if any has been granted, he shall forward a clemency memorandum with his recommendation thereon, even though no application for clemency or for additional clemency has been filed by or in behalf of the prisoner.

(g) That applications for full pardons filed by persons convicted by general courts-martial be given prompt attention; and that in cases in which the record has been found or shall be found legally insufficient to support the sentences adjudged and in which the corrective action taken or to be taken under existing instructions should be supplemented by further action looking to the granting of full pardons so as to remove any disabilities resulting from convictions not well founded in law, such further action be taken as soon as that may be done without delaying the examination of the records of trial of general prisoners returned from foreign parts.

WAR DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE JUDGE ADVOCATE GENERAL,
Washington, June 15, 1919.

Memorandum for General Kreger:

The special board of review (cases in clemency) has examined to date 1,117 records, of which 107 were "repeaters," leaving for statistical purposes 1,010. Of these, 925 were found legally sufficient; 42 were found unquestionably bad; 12 were found very doubtful; 30 (presenting convictions for desertion) good to the extent of A. W. O. L. only. Of the 925 legally sufficient cases, 31 were found unsatisfactory (because not convincing or for some objectionable features); 71 presented one or more unsupported findings (not affecting the validity or justice of the final result).

Of the whole number (1,010), 218 presented formal irregularities of no vital consequence (these were, chiefly, failures to properly explain pleas or rights of accused as witness where it was obvious that no harm was or could have resulted from the failures); 342 were fairly characterized as "poorly" tried (included in the above "bad," "doubtful," or "unsatisfactory" classes whenever the misprisions rose to the dignity of prejudicial error).

The 1,010 records thus considered were selected as deficient out of the 4,268 cases examined by the boards and examiners. Taking the latter as the whole number, the percentages thus revealed are a trifle under one per cent bad; a trifle under two per cent bad, doubtful, or unsatisfactory; a trifle under five per cent show formal irregularities; a trifle over eight per cent were poorly tried.

Of the 342 "poorly tried" cases, the characterization was justified: In 206 cases, by the admission of improper evidence (chiefly hearsay); in 136 cases, by the inertness or inadequacy of counsel for the accused; in 69 cases, by poor preparation on the part of the prosecution; in 42 cases, by errors of the court in rulings at the trial; in 32 cases, by the fact that no evidence was presented aliunde the pleas of guilty; in 33 cases, by improper examination of witnesses or of the accused; in 23 cases, by the fact that the accused convicted himself; in 22 cases, by general debility or ineptitude; in 7 cases, by improper argument on the part of the trial judge advocate.

Memorandum for the special clemency board, the special clemency examiners, and the special board of review:

Here are my views, briefly and roughly stated, respecting the considerations which I think should govern the clemency examiners and the clemency board itself:

1. Clemency is not a matter to be governed by technical rules of law. It is a matter of conscience rather than strict professional judgment. It is a matter which requires us to see the human being, his motives, circumstances, and condition, and our vision in this regard must not be limited by what the record, legally considered, strictly shows.

2. Too much legal deference must not be paid to any record for purposes of clemency, and this is especially true of courts-martial records. They frequently show what is only too frequently true, that however closely the forms of trial may have been adhered to, the trial itself was not a fair, full, and impartial presentation of the case. Speaking more specifically, I think we must ask ourselves, among many others, the following questions:

(a) Were the facts, as revealed on the record and as they may be fairly inferred, such as to indicate a state of mind that is really criminal, or immoral, or chronically perverted, or intolerably reckless of the military obligation?

Or, especially in purely military offenses, was not the delinquency due to thoughtlessness, or ignorance, or a lack of understanding of the military environment, or was it not provoked, as is frequently the case, by an unsympathetic, if not an oppressive attitude upon the part of those in authority? Frequently the two serious charges, desertion and disobedience of orders, can be so resolved, in the light of the human facts, as to indicate that there was no intention to commit the offense at all. While every charge of disobedience of orders sounds bad upon paper, very frequently the order itself was one given in a light or improper manner, or was not a necessary one, or involved some inconsequential thing not sounding in those necessitous circumstances where disobedience of orders becomes a most serious, even a capital offense.

(b) Accused may have counsel, but too frequently counsel is so limited by reason of his lack of legal qualification or a lack of that rank which gives him standing before the court, or a general lack of those inclinations and appreciations which zealous and competent counsel must have in order to make a good defense, that it can be said, as a matter of fact, if not as a matter of law, that the accused did not have the substantial assistance of counsel which every accused should have. And frequently the court will permit a man to go to trial without counsel, when any man of legal appreciations knows such a course to be unwise. What is true of counsel is frequently true of other incidents of the trial.

(c) There is nothing that courts-martial are more inclined to do than follow a natural inquisitiveness to admit masses of hearsay testimony, and at the same time so limit the counsel as to prevent proper cross-examination where, as is none too frequently the case, the counsel is inclined to indulge in one. Military counsel frequently hesitate to examine superior officers, and courts-martial as a rule seem to think that it is improper to test a witness, especially if he is a superior officer, for bias, prejudice, or credibility.

(d) Special attention must be paid to improvident pleas of guilty. Frequently the entire case is given away by such a plea made by an accused without counsel, or advised by incompetent counsel; and very frequently, after such a plea, the accused makes statements in his own defense inconsistent with the plea, which courts frequently disregard. Pleas of guilty of serious offenses should be most carefully scrutinized. Courts-martial duty is uncongenial, and a plea of guilty is acceptable as a brief method of ending the trial.

(e) Of course, as a technical matter, every presumption should be made in favor of the action of the court, but frequently the action of the court, however it may appear in mere form, is not fair and its conclusion is prejudiced thereby.

(f) We should be on our guard against confessions or statements of any kind against interest, when made by a soldier to a military superior. The military relation is such as to induce confessions in such a way as to render them incompetent.

(g) I do not regard that the 37th article of war changes the rule with respect of the effect of prejudicial error, but simply redeclares it. Substantial error, in my judgment, must be presumed to affect the finding and sentence. As between evidence of the same degree of credibility, it may be that the effect of evidence erroneously admitted may be overcome by an overwhelming volume of evidence of such a nature as to compel the mind. But, for instance, take a confession which when worthy of belief is the most convincing of all evidence. If it should be improperly admitted, I should conclusively presume error.

(h) I observe that it is frequently said in the clemency memoranda that the evidence is sufficient to sustain the conviction. Evidence may be sufficient to sustain the conviction when tested by an appellate court for its purposes, and yet be so weak and unsatisfactory as to justify clemency. The tests and purposes of the tests of the evidence in the two cases are entirely different.

3. I believe that the great principles fundamentally established in our civil jurisprudence, designed for the purpose of securing a fair trial, are equally applicable, except where clearly withheld, to trials before courts-martial. A military accused is entitled to the same full, fair and impartial trial; to be informed of the nature and cause of the accusation; to have witnesses in his favor; to be confronted with witnesses against him, except in those cases where the rules of evidence reasonably prescribe otherwise; and, above all, he is entitled to the assistance of counsel for his defense, counsel that should represent him and his cause, and not simply to appear in the trial to satisfy a form of law. And a military accused is fully entitled to protection against self-incrimination, as much so as an accused in a civil court.

4. The articles of war and the military statutes are not the sole source to be sought in determining whether or not a man has had a full, fair and impartial trial. The fundamental principles of law which are a part of the common law and now a part of our Constitution must be resorted to and applied, except where by their very nature they are inapplicable to military proceeding.

5. I think our tendency should be, wherever we can justify it, to get rid of that kind of punishment which is continuing and damns a man forever, such as a dishonorable discharge. Such a punishment as that should be given only in extreme cases. It has been given altogether too frequently and we should lean towards finding a way to reduce that kind of punishment. In the ordinary case, we should try to restore a man to the colors or return him to civil life without marking him so he can never rehabilitate himself.

S. T. ANSELL,

*Lieutenant Colonel, Judge Advocate,
President, Special Clemency Board.*

JUNE 16, 1919.

Memorandum for Gen. Kreger:

Subject: Operations of Second Division, special clemency board.

The special clemency board of the office of the Judge Advocate General was subdivided, practically at the inception of its actual operations in general court-martial cases, into three coordinate divisions of two members each, and so functioned from and after March 5, 1919, under the presidency of General Ansell, who was also an ex officio member of each division. The second division was composed of the undersigned judge advocates, who since said date have continuously served in such capacity, and have functioned on approximately one-third of the entire number of cases which to date have automatically come before the said special clemency board for review and recommendation under the office order of January 28, 1919. We have endeavored to devote to the work done by the second division the best thought and consideration whereof we were capable, unrestricted by the action of those who may have preceded us in the consideration of cases from the making of the findings of the trial court to and including the action of the revisory agencies of this office, which, pursuant to established procedure, may have functioned in the case before receipt of the record by the second division for review and recommendation for clemency purposes. That is to say, we have apprehended our responsibilities and duties in the premises to be clearly quasi-judicial in nature, and hence have not viewed as conclusive or binding on us the action of whomsoever may have previously functioned in a case at any stage of the proceedings, although at all times we have been disposed to give respectful consideration to such prior action. Accordingly, whenever considerations of justice or clemency prompted us so to do, we would proceed to reopen a case as to all matters of law and issues of fact therein, and would act on each case according to our view thereof, adjusted to established War Department policy, and embody our decision in the clemency recommendation of record in the case, which would have regard to the extraneous facts and circumstances appearing in the clemency memorandum and accompanying papers prepared and submitted for our consideration in acting thereon. Contemplating in retrospect the work done by the second division, we are constrained to appraise the value of our operations and the results same have accomplished by the above-stated latitude of judgment wherewith the work was executed by us. In functioning, as aforesaid, on cases coming before the second division, we are convinced that the work was performed with reasonable thoroughness and due regard to the nature and importance of the same; that were we to reconsider such cases in the mass, we would, on the whole, but duplicate our action of record therein; and, consequently, we regard as unnecessary future reexamination, in the mass, of cases disposed of according to our recommendations.

The foregoing statement, which you desire us to make of record, we would respectfully submit for your consideration.

WAR DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE JUDGE ADVOCATE GENERAL,Washington, June 17, 1919.

From: Colonel James S. Easby-Smith, J. A., and Captain Charles T. Tittmann, J. A. constituting division No. 1, of the clemency board.

To: The Acting Judge Advocate General.

Subject: Report concerning work which has been performed by the clemency board.

1. The following report is submitted in compliance with oral instructions that the undersigned, after reading Senate joint resolution No. 18, introduced May 20, 1919, "Providing for a review of the findings of courts-martial" etc., submit a brief report of the character of the review of court-martial cases which has been made by the clemency board.

2. Practically at the outset, from and after March 5, 1919, there were three divisions of the clemency board, each composed of two officers. The board has recently been reduced to two divisions, Nos. 1 and 2, composed of two members each. The undersigned, James S. Easby-Smith was originally a member of division No. 1; and the undersigned, Charles T. Tittmann was originally a member of division No. 3. One member each of divisions Nos. 1 and 3 have recently been relieved, division No. 3 has been abolished, and the undersigned now compose division No. 1 and make this joint report as representing division No. 1 and former division No. 3.

3. Under the procedure which has been in effect since the creation of the clemency board, the entire record of a case (not only the transcript of the evidence but all formal orders, reviews and other accompanying papers) are submitted to the board, prefaced with a memorandum sheet, entitled "Clemency memorandum for the Secretary of War" which shows briefly the essential facts in the case, including a summary under the title "Circumstances attending offense." This summary is prepared by an examining officer who is not a member of the clemency board and is accompanied with his recommendation as to clemency. It was intended that the clemency memorandum should be so complete as to make it unnecessary for members of the clemency board to examine the record at length; but at the very outset of the work the members of the clemency board felt that the data contained in the memorandum was not sufficiently informative, and it has been the practice from the beginning for the members of the board to read the entire record and accompanying papers either exhaustively or to such an extent as to extract all the material information in the record.

4. In approaching the work of reviewing these cases with a view to clemency the board has constantly borne in mind the following statements, contained in a memorandum from the Secretary of War to the Judge Advocate General, dated January 13, 1919, commenting upon a memorandum, written to the Secretary of War on January 11, 1919, by Gen. Ansell, formerly acting Judge Advocate General:

"It would seem entirely clear that there ought to be some general plan for reviewing and modifying sentences of the kind illustrated by him (General Ansell) which have been imposed during the war and are characterized by severity which would not be the case in time of peace. To be sure, the offenses of which these men have been found guilty have a somewhat different color and gravity during the period of hostilities, but it goes without saying that a review of the sentences imposed during the last twenty months will disclose—(1st) very unequal degrees of punishment, and (2nd) perhaps generally a system of penalties which the ends of justice and discipline would not justify us in enforcing now that hostilities have ceased.

"I am not able to gather from General Ansell's memorandum whether he recommends action by general order on my part, addressed to all commanders, and imposing further limits upon the severity of sentences. I do not know what my powers in the premises are, but if I have the power to issue such an order, it would seem that it ought to be immediately prepared and issued so as to stop now any further accumulation of cases in which clemency would be necessary to prevent a harshness and severity which you and I both agree are unnecessary from any disciplinary point of view."

5. The board has also borne in mind the following statement contained in an order recommended by Judge Advocate General Crowder, on January 18, 1919, and issued by The Adjutant General on January 22, 1919: "In view of the cessation of hostilities and the reestablishment of conditions approximating those of peace, both within and without the theater of war, the pro-

4. The articles of war and the military statutes are not the sole source to be sought in determining whether or not a man has had a full, fair and impartial trial. The fundamental principles of law which are a part of the common law and now a part of our Constitution must be resorted to and applied, except where by their very nature they are inapplicable to military proceeding.

5. I think our tendency should be, wherever we can justify it, to get rid of that kind of punishment which is continuing and damns a man forever, such as a dishonorable discharge. Such a punishment as that should be given only in extreme cases. It has been given altogether too frequently and we should lean towards finding a way to reduce that kind of punishment. In the ordinary case, we should try to restore a man to the colors or return him to civil life without marking him so he can never rehabilitate himself.

Memorandum for Gen. Kreger:

Subject: Operations of Second Division, special clemency board.

The special clemency board of the office of the Judge Advocate General was subdivided, practically at the inception of its actual operations in general court-martial cases, into three coordinate divisions of two members each, and so functioned from and after March 5, 1919, under the presidency of General Ansell, who was also an ex officio member of each division. The second division was composed of the undersigned judge advocates, who since said date have continuously served in such capacity, and have functioned on approximately one-third of the entire number of cases which to date have automatically come before the said special clemency board for review and recommendation under the office order of January 28, 1919. We have endeavored to devote to the work done by the second division the best thought and consideration whereof we were capable, unrestricted by the action of those who may have preceded us in the consideration of cases from the making of the findings of the trial court to and including the action of the revisory agencies of this office, which, pursuant to established procedure, may have functioned in the case before receipt of the record by the second division for review and recommendation for clemency purposes. That is to say, we have apprehended our responsibilities and duties in the premises to be clearly quasi-judicial in nature, and hence have not viewed as conclusive or binding on us the action of whomsoever may have previously functioned in a case at any stage of the proceedings, although at all times we have been disposed to give respectful consideration to such prior action. Accordingly, whenever considerations of justice or clemency prompted us so to do, we would proceed to reopen a case as to all matters of law and issues of fact therein, and would act on each case according to our view thereof, adjusted to established War Department policy, and embody our decision in the clemency recommendation of record in the case, which would have regard to the extraneous facts and circumstances appearing in the clemency memorandum and accompanying papers prepared and submitted for our consideration in acting thereon. Contemplating in retrospect the work done by the second division, we are constrained to appraise the value of our operations and the results same have accomplished by the above-stated latitude of judgment wherewith the work was executed by us. In functioning, as aforesaid, on cases coming before the second division, we are convinced that the work was performed with reasonable thoroughness and due regard to the nature and importance of the same; that were we to reconsider such cases in the mass, we would, on the whole, but duplicate our action of record therein; and, consequently, we regard as unnecessary future reexamination, in the mass, of cases disposed of according to our recommendations.

The foregoing statement, which you desire us to make of record, we would respectfully submit for your consideration.

WAR DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE JUDGE ADVOCATE GENERAL,
Washington, June 17, 1919.

From: Colonel James S. Easby-Smith, J. A., and Captain Charles T. Tittmann, J. A. constituting division No. 1, of the clemency board.

To: The Acting Judge Advocate General.

Subject: Report concerning work which has been performed by the clemency board.

1. The following report is submitted in compliance with oral instructions that the undersigned, after reading Senate joint resolution No. 18, introduced May 20, 1919, "Providing for a review of the findings of courts-martial" etc., submit a brief report of the character of the review of court-martial cases which has been made by the clemency board.

2. Practically at the outset, from and after March 5, 1919, there were three divisions of the clemency board, each composed of two officers. The board has recently been reduced to two divisions, Nos. 1 and 2, composed of two members each. The undersigned, James S. Easby-Smith was originally a member of division No. 1; and the undersigned, Charles T. Tittmann was originally a member of division No. 3. One member each of divisions Nos. 1 and 3 have recently been relieved, division No. 3 has been abolished, and the undersigned now compose division No. 1 and make this joint report as representing division No. 1 and former division No. 3.

3. Under the procedure which has been in effect since the creation of the clemency board, the entire record of a case (not only the transcript of the evidence but all formal orders, reviews and other accompanying papers) are submitted to the board, prefaced with a memorandum sheet, entitled "Clemency memorandum for the Secretary of War" which shows briefly the essential facts in the case, including a summary under the title "Circumstances attending offense." This summary is prepared by an examining officer who is not a member of the clemency board and is accompanied with his recommendation as to clemency. It was intended that the clemency memorandum should be so complete as to make it unnecessary for members of the clemency board to examine the record at length; but at the very outset of the work the members of the clemency board felt that the data contained in the memorandum was not sufficiently informative, and it has been the practice from the beginning for the members of the board to read the entire record and accompanying papers either exhaustively or to such an extent as to extract all the material information in the record.

4. In approaching the work of reviewing these cases with a view to clemency the board has constantly borne in mind the following statements, contained in a memorandum from the Secretary of War to the Judge Advocate General, dated January 13, 1919, commenting upon a memorandum, written to the Secretary of War on January 11, 1919, by Gen. Ansell, formerly acting Judge Advocate General:

"It would seem entirely clear that there ought to be some general plan for reviewing and modifying sentences of the kind illustrated by him (General Ansell) which have been imposed during the war and are characterized by severity which would not be the case in time of peace. To be sure, the offenses of which these men have been found guilty have a somewhat different color and gravity during the period of hostilities, but it goes without saying that a review of the sentences imposed during the last twenty months will disclose—(1st) very unequal degrees of punishment, and (2nd) perhaps generally a system of penalties which the ends of justice and discipline would not justify us in enforcing now that hostilities have ceased.

"I am not able to gather from General Ansell's memorandum whether he recommends action by general order on my part, addressed to all commanders, and imposing further limits upon the severity of sentences. I do not know what my powers in the premises are, but if I have the power to issue such an order, it would seem that it ought to be immediately prepared and issued so as to stop now any further accumulation of cases in which clemency would be necessary to prevent a harshness and severity which you and I both agree are unnecessary from any disciplinary point of view."

5. The board has also borne in mind the following statement contained in an order recommended by Judge Advocate General Crowder, on January 18, 1919, and issued by The Adjutant General on January 22, 1919: "In view of the cessation of hostilities and the reestablishment of conditions approximating those of peace, both within and without the theater of war, the propriety of observing limitations upon the punishing powers of courts-martial as established by Executive order of December 16, 1916, is obvious."

6. The board has also borne in mind the following statement contained in an order of the Judge Advocate General, dated January 23, 1919, organizing the clemency board, to the effect that the purpose of the creation of the board was, "In order to comply with the directions of the Secretary of War for a review of sentences imposed for offenses committed during the war period, with a view not only of equalizing punishment but to adjust that punishment to present disciplinary requirements."

7. The board, having approached the consideration of cases with the above enunciated principles in view, has also carefully considered not only the record, strictly so called, but all extrajudicial and extralegal facts and circumstances which appear and which, in the opinion of the board, ought to be considered in rectifying and equalizing sentences by the exercise of clemency—such as illhealth, mental deficiency or irresponsibility, youth, dependents, alienage, education, civil life record, etc.

8. As to the attitude of the clemency board toward the work in hand and its apprehension of its duties and responsibilities in the premises, the undersigned adopt, as expressing their views, the memorandum upon this subject submitted by Lieut. Colonel Connor and Major Rogers, Judge advocates, under date of June 16, 1919.

9. It is the opinion of the undersigned that much of the work of the examining officers embodied in the item "Circumstances attending offense" was, of necessity, especially in the early stages of the work, so hurriedly done as to render many of the summaries of little, if any, value; but the information contained in these summaries, which was sometimes inaccurate and frequently incomplete, was supplemented by a full and exhaustive examination of the records by the members of the clemency board as heretofore described.

10. It is the opinion of the undersigned that no necessity exists for another review of the cases which have been examined by the clemency board, except as new and additional extrajudicial facts looking to clemency may be brought to attention from time to time in particular cases.

WAR DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE JUDGE ADVOCATE GENERAL,
Washington, June 17, 1919.

Memorandum for General Kreger.

Subject: Proposed legislation for review of all court-martial and retirement cases.

1. The clemency section of the military justice division, Judge Advocate General's Department, now composed of six officers and two law clerks, has considered all applications for clemency on behalf of prisoners sentenced by general courts-martial, and has recommended remission or commutation of sentences, or restoration to duty, as the facts and justice of each case required, having due regard to the public interests.

2. Since February 10, 1919, under office order dated January 28, 1919, consideration has been given to the return of conditions approximating peace and an effort made more nearly to equalize punishments. With these ends in view, punishments have been reduced more nearly in conformity with the peace-time limits set forth in the President's order of December 15, 1916.

3. Since the order of January 28, 1919, became effective, the clemency section has reviewed and recommended action in 1,141 cases. In almost every instance, these recommendations have been approved by the Secretary of War and have been carried into effect or are in process of being executed.

4. In cooperation with the special clemency board of this office, practically all the cases of prisoners convicted by general courts-martial of offenses during the war, and confined in the United States, numbering about five thousand, have been reviewed; and almost without exception the recommendations approximating the reduction in punishments to peace-time limits have been carried out by order of the Secretary of War.

5. Sentences of summary and special courts-martial, whose jurisdiction is limited to confinement not exceeding three and six months, respectively, are not reviewed in the Judge Advocate General's Department. In our opinion such review is neither necessary nor advisable. Nor are the so-called "retirement cases" subject to such review. But the general court-martial trials, involving the more serious offenses and punishments, have been most carefully reviewed, and, because of the return of peace-time conditions, have been mitigated and commuted in accordance with every humane and just consideration. There are of course many cases of prisoners confined in France whose records of trial have not yet reached this office.

6. As to the general court-martial cases, therefore, we are of opinion that the purpose and object of the proposed legislation have been accomplished.

OFFICE OF THE CHIEF OF STAFF,

Washington, June 26, 1919.

Memorandum for the Judge Advocate General.

Subject: Recommendations of the Acting Judge Advocate General relative to administration of military justice.

1. The Chief of Staff directs that you be advised, for your information and guidance that the Secretary of War has approved the following recommendations contained in paragraph 13 of your 1st indorsement, dated June 19, 1919, to The Adjutant General of the Army on the memorandum of Lieutenant-Colonel S. T. Ansell, president special clemency board, dated May 17, 1919:

"(a) That general prisoners now being held in confinement in foreign parts be returned to the United States as soon as practicable.

"(b) That as to all general prisoners returning from foreign parts steps be taken to assure that a clemency memorandum be forwarded to this office by the commandant of the place of confinement, with the least possible delay after the arrival of the prisoner.

"(c) That the records of all general prisoners returned from foreign parts be examined as expeditiously as practicable, by the special clemency board and cooperating clemency agencies in this office, in conformity with instructions heretofore addressed to said board and cooperating agencies, the work to be prosecuted as has been done in connection with the records of general prisoners in the United States since the establishment of the special clemency board in this office.

"(d) That so far as practicable general prisoners having only short terms left to serve be held near ports of debarkation until their cases can be examined and reported upon.

"(e) That whenever a recently convicted general prisoner files his first application for clemency, the commandant of the place of confinement shall forward the application without delay, with the proper notations and his recommendation thereon.

"(f) That in any case in which the commandant of the place of confinement regards the sentence as unduly severe, or in which in his opinion there is any reason making for clemency if none has been granted, or for additional clemency if any has been granted, he shall forward a clemency memorandum with his recommendation thereon, even though no application for clemency or for additional clemency has been filed by or in behalf of the prisoner.

"(g) That applications for full pardons filed by persons convicted by general courts-martial be given prompt attention; and that in cases in which the record has been found or shall be found legally insufficient to support the sentences adjudged and in which the corrective action taken or to be taken under existing instructions should be supplemented by further action looking to the granting of full pardons so as to remove any disabilities resulting from convictions not well founded in law, such further action be taken as soon as that may be done without delaying the examination of the records of trial of general prisoners returned from foreign parts."

2. You will be furnished a copy of such instructions as may be issued by the department in order to carry into effect such of the recommendations quoted above as relate to other agencies of the department than the office of the Judge Advocate General.

Memorandum for the Director of Operations:

Subject: Recommendations of the Acting Judge Advocate General relative to administration of military justice.

1. The Chief of Staff directs that the papers herewith be referred to you for the necessary action to carry into effect such of the recommendations as are contained in subparagraphs (a), (b), (d), (e), and (f) of paragraph 13 of the first indorsement of the Acting Judge Advocate General, dated June 19, 1919, herewith.

2. He further directs that a copy of such instructions as may be issued in this connection be furnished the Acting Judge Advocate General.

3. For your information there is transmitted herewith a copy of memorandum of this date to the Acting Judge Advocate General in this connection.

FULTON Q. C. GARDNER,
Colonel, G. S., Secretary, General Staff.

JUNE 24, 1919.

Memorandum for the Acting Judge Advocate General:

1. On May 17 I addressed to the Secretary of War, through you, a memorandum in which I recommended in effect that (1) clemency consideration be given our prisoners in France, as well as those in this country, which has not heretofore been done; (2) that, in view of the haste with which the first review was necessarily made, a more thorough review be made of doubtful cases, looking to still further clemency; (3) that another and thorough review be made with a view to granting in proper cases full pardon, and (4) that if I should be intrusted with the work, I be permitted to select, as far as possible, a personnel in sympathy with my views as to clemency.

Yesterday you indicated to me that you would approve my recommendation that the prisoners in France be given the same clemency consideration as the prisoners here, but that you were of a mind to disapprove the other recommendations.

2. With the greatest earnestness I urge you to reconsider, in the hope that you may be brought to that state of mind enabling you to view the situation as I do. The work has been hastily done. More than 5,000 records, each with its accompanying papers, have been examined. It is not humanly possible to give to that number of cases, their records and the facts and information de hors the record the consideration which justice to the enlisted man requires. The clemency examiner upon whom so much depends has been at times inexperienced in the work and at all times almost intolerably pressed. I have observed evidence, and have been conscious, of hasty action in all departments of the work, including my own. It has not been done with that accuracy, deliberation, and assurance which should characterize judicial action.

A second examination would not require the most thorough examination of every record, but only those in which there were some outstanding indicia of the necessity of reexamination. To indicate one class of cases, I myself believe that many of those in which clemency has been flatly denied ought now to be more thoroughly reexamined.

3. According to your view, the application for pardon should be initiated by the individuals who deem themselves so aggrieved as to justify that course. In view of all the circumstances surrounding the administration of military justice, this, in my judgment, would be an unjust as well as an unwise course. As long as clemency was permitted to be given consideration only upon the application of the individual, little clemency was had. It is the right of the individual to seek clemency; it is the duty of authority to give it. That duty carries with it, when there has been so much injustice as there has recently been, the duty of taking the initiative and not waiting upon individual application. We took the initiative in the granting of clemency; and why should we not, for the same reason, take the same initiative in granting pardons? Taking such initiative would, in my judgment, be to the great credit of the pardoning power. Pardon ordinarily is a matter of mercy and, as such, should not be strained out just to those who may be advised to seek it, and it never should be deferred for mere convenience's sake. In many of these cases in which we can say with fair assurance that the man ought not to have been tried or was not lawfully tried, or that the record as it stands can not fairly sustain the conviction, pardon becomes a matter not of mercy but of partial justice. In such a case we should act, not as a matter of grace, but in recognition of a high sense of justice. In such cases our sense of justice and our sense of duty should compel us to act. Furthermore, the military relation is such and the condition of the prisoner is frequently such that he has not the ability, nor the liberty, to make out the case that ought to be made for him.

We ought frankly to acknowledge and act upon the fact that courts-martial ran riot during this war, and now do all we can to correct their unjust results.

4. If you still adhere to your views of yesterday and report upon my previous memorandum accordingly, after you have considered this memorandum, permit me to request that you forward it with the other papers for the consideration of the Secretary of War.

July 17, 1919.

To The Adjutant General of the Army:

1 This paper was brought to my attention on the afternoon of June 26, 1919. Early the following morning I brought the paper to the attention of the Secretary of War, with the request that action upon my indorsement of June 19 upon Lieut. Col. Ansell's memorandum of May 17 be deferred until this paper could be formally indorsed over for consideration in connection with the earlier papers on the same subject. The Secretary, after reading the paper, advised me that he had already acted upon the earlier papers and directed that, after official notice of his action had reached me, this paper be forwarded for consideration by him in connection with the earlier papers. In accordance with those instructions and the request made by Lieut. Col. Ansell, the paper is forwarded, accompanied by the corresponding office file, including copies of each of the two memoranda, dated June 26, evidencing the action of the Secretary of War on the earlier papers.

2. It is requested that the accompanying office file be returned to this office.

Acting Judge Advocate General.

---

WAR DEPARTMENT, Washington, July 21, 1919.

Memorandum for the Judge Advocate General:

I return herewith the memorandum of Col. Ansell and your indorsement of July 17th.

Col. Ansell presses two points: First, that all of the records which have been examined by the clemency section of the office of the Judge Advocate General should be reexamined. Second, that this reexamination should be by a group of officers personally selected by Col. Ansell and having "a personnel in sympathy with my [his] views as to clemency." In support of the first recommendation, Col. Ansell expresses the belief that the work of the clemency board has been hastily done. Frankly, this is an incredible statement. The clemency boards were organized with great care. They were composed of men of courage, ability, and zeal, and their work was done in an atmosphere with every predisposition toward a humane and merciful consideration of the facts of the cases presented. I cannot bring myself to reflect upon work so devotedly done by any hasty assumption that it was ill done because either of its volume or speed. It is not to be forgotten that Col. Ansell was himself the head of this work and I know him too well to believe that, in a matter which so fully engaged his feelings, he sat by and saw hasty, slipshod, and therefore unjust work done.

The second suggestion that the next board should be one chosen by him and having his views as to clemency seems to me at variance to all of the suggestions he has hitherto made with regard to the administration of military justice, which he insists should be characterized by its adherence to law rather than its color of personal opinion.

However these two considerations may be viewed, I am persuaded that the remedies instituted by the Judge Advocate General in these cases are adequate and careful, and that the work which has been done and is being done deserves the confidence of the Secretary of War. I am further of the belief that when these reviews shall have been completed, the recommendations which we will inevitably receive from the commandants at the several disciplinary barracks, from the psychiatrists and medical officers, and the applications for clemency from the men themselves, will bring to our attention cases in which further clemency ought to be considered. I therefore adhere to the view I verbally expressed to you of approving the arrangement set out in the earlier papers.

NEWTON D. BAKER, Secretary of War.

(Thereupon, at 5.10 o'clock p. m., the committee adjourned subject to the call of the chairman.)

ESTABLISHMENT OF MILITARY JUSTICE—PROPOSED AMEND-MENT OF THE ARTICLES OF WAR:

THURSDAY, OCTOBER 23, 1919.

UNITED STATES SENATE,
SUBCOMMITTEE ON MILITARY AFFAIRS,
Washington, D. C.

The subcommittee met, pursuant to the call of the chairman, in the room of the Committee on Appropriations, at 10.30 o'clock a. m., Senator Francis E. Warren, presiding.

Present, Senators Warren (chairman), Lenroot, and Chamberlain.

Senator WARREN. Gen. Chamberlain, Inspector General of the Army, is present this morning, and we will hear his statement.

STATEMENT OF MAJ. GEN. JOHN L. CHAMBERLAIN, INSPECTOR GENERAL, UNITED STATES ARMY.

Senator WARREN. General, this committee has before it the result of some work and some examinations which you have had conducted with relation to courts-martial, so that all that we shall ask you to do is to add whatever you wish to say in addition to that.

Gen. CHAMBERLAIN. I have nothing to add to that report. In his testimony before this committee former Lieut. Col. S. T. Ansell has from time to time taken occasion to comment upon the Inspector General of the Army and the Inspector General's Department. With Gen. Ansell's opinions as to the Inspector General and the Inspector General's Department I am not concerned. However, certain concrete statements made by him appear to call for comment.

Referring to certain testimony given by Maj. Copp, of the Judge Advocate General's Department, before a committee of the American Bar Association, Lieut. Col. Ansell states:

Maj. Copp, speaking out of what he described as his experience as a judge advocate in a division during this war, said that it was customary for the Inspector General's Department to compel, by virtue of the power of office, a man to incriminate himself.

When the committee asked him time and time again, "Do you know this to be true?" he said, "Yes, because I not only observed it but the representative of the Inspector General's Department at the camp where I was stationed admitted that to be a fact."

Examination of the printed record of Maj. Copp's testimony before that committee fails to discover that upon any occasion he made a statement to the effect that these views were based upon personal knowledge. On the contrary one discovers the following statement, made by Maj. Copp:

This matter of compulsion probably is receiving more notice than I intended that it should. It never was under my observation, even in those investigations of the Inspector General, except as he related them to me. He said that he had that authority and it was his duty to compel witnesses to appear before him for investigation.

Again, in another place, appears the following:

I simply desire the committee to understand that I merely base my statement there upon what I have been told and not upon anything I personally observed or anything within my personal knowledge.

Lieut. Col. George W. England, on duty as senior camp inspector at Camp Sheridan, from August 30, 1918, to March 25, 1919, was the only officer of the Inspector General's Department who was on duty at that camp during the period that Maj. Copp was there, the other representatives of the Inspector General's Department being acting inspectors. Col. England in a letter to the Inspector General states:

The policy of requiring witnesses to give incriminating evidence against their protest did not exist in the office of the inspector, Camp Sheridan, nor was belief expressed or held that such procedure was proper. All of the testimony taken in the office of the inspector was taken under my immediate supervision, and in no case was this policy followed. * * * In no case before the inspector for investigation was the plea of self-incrimination disregarded or was a witness forced to answer questions which would incriminate him.

There are issued from the office of the Inspector General certain instructions to the officers of that department. One of the instructions I quote as follows:

Prior to interrogating a witness:

(1) Make sure that witness understands his or her constitutional rights * * *

Again referring to the same matter Lieut. Col. Ansell, in his testimony before this committee, stated:

There ought to be some law against permitting the Inspector General's Department of the Army to use these third-degree methods of menace and threats and taking advantage of the innocence or ignorance of the unhappy lot of the enlisted men.

It is a fact well known to officers and enlisted men of the Army that such methods are entirely foreign to the firmly established policy of the Inspector General's Department. It is also a fact that they are not resorted to.

It is also a fact that officers and enlisted men well understand that in the hands of the Inspector General's Department they get a square deal.

Referring to an investigation made by the Inspector General of certain controversies which had arisen in connection with the Judge Advocate General's Department, on page 209 of these hearings, Col. Ansell states:

And then the Inspector General, in my judgment forgetting whatever quasi-judicial character belongs to his position—and there ought to be a great deal to it—said, "You know, I am making a report on this subject by order of the Secretary of War. This thing is in Congress, and my report will go to Congress; and, Ansell, when it goes to Congress it will be very detrimental to you;" and I said, "Well, General, I would rather meet you in Congress than deal with you here."

Further on he states:

It was a menace, a threat that unless I played the department rôle the report was going in against me, would be published broadcast to the world, and would be very detrimental to me.

In regard to these statements I desire to state unconditionally and in language which will admit of no misinterpretation, I made no such statements, nor did I make any statements which admit of such interpretation.

That is all I have to say, gentlemen.

Senator LENROOT. In that connection, General, was there a conversation between you upon that subject?

Gen. CHAMBERLAIN. There was a conversation.

Senator LENROOT. Could you relate the conversation as you recollect it?

Gen. CHAMBERLAIN. I said to Lieut. Col. Ansell that I regretted very much that he had taken this view of the situation, as I was endeavoring to get at the facts of the case, and that I needed his statements in order to give me both sides of the controversy. That is the gist of what I said. Of course I do not recall the words.

I will add, in that connection, that because of the fact that Col. Ansell declined to make any statement, I had Col. Mayes brought home from France. Col. Mayes was Col. Ansell's—I might say—confidential assistant during most of the period involved. Col. Mayes came home, and his statements and testimony appear in my report.

In that connection I might state that Mr. Bennett, a stenographer in my office, who was present during this conversation, is now in the waiting room, if you care to call him in regard to this matter.

Senator LENROOT. What were the relations at that time between you and Col. Ansell?

Gen. CHAMBERLAIN. Perfectly friendly; always have been. They have never been otherwise.

Senator LENROOT. When did the controversy first arise between you?

Gen. CHAMBERLAIN. There never has been a controversy.

Senator LENROOT. There never has been?

Gen. CHAMBERLAIN. My relations with Gen. Ansell, he as acting judge advocate general, and I as inspector general, throughout the period of the war, were most friendly, and so far as I know there was full coöperation. I recall only one difference. That was in connection with an investigation of the conduct of an officer of the Judge Advocate General's Department. My office condemned severely the conduct of this officer and recommended disciplinary action. That action was not approved in Gen. Ansell's office, and the officer was not disciplined, but that was a matter to which I never gave a thought afterwards, and I do not believe that he did. That was purely official. So far as I can recall that is the only case where the two offices did not substantially agree in their recommendations.

Senator LENROOT. I just note in the testimony that you referred to in the record, it appears that whatever controversy there was in this conversation grew out of his refusal to make a statement in the investigation that you were charged with making.

Gen. CHAMBERLAIN. There was no controversy. Our conversation at that time was most friendly.

Senator LENROOT. Yes; but he put it in writing, and I have it here. He did refuse?

Gen. CHAMBERLAIN. Yes, he refused.

Senator LENROOT. And he gave as his reason, apparently, that you were charged with making an investigation upon a subject upon which, prior to that time, you had formed an opinion, and were therefore not an impartial investigator. That was the amount of it. That is stated on page 208.

Gen. CHAMBERLAIN. In that connection, Gen. Ansell must have referred to the fact that back in November, 1917, when the case which is now known as the El Paso——

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Mutiny cases?

Gen. CHAMBERLAIN. Mutiny cases.

Senator WARREN. Do you care to have that record, General?

Gen. CHAMBERLAIN. No; the matter is perfectly clear in my mind. Upon that occasion, or in connection therewith, Col. Ansell submitted recommendations relative to the interpretation of section 1199 of the Revised Statutes of the United States. The court-martial proceedings in those cases were handed to me by the Assistant Chief of Staff to look over and to prepare a memorandum for him. This was done because of the fact that a short time before, I had been at Fort Bliss in connection with another matter, the Twenty-fourth Infantry trouble. I had made some inquiries as to this artillery case, and had some little knowledge of the conditions. The memorandum which I prepared had no direct reference whatsoever to the interpretation of section 1199, and to the best of my belief—although I could not state that positively, as it was some time ago—I had no knowledge at that time that a memorandum with respect to section 1199 had been submitted by Ansell. In other words, my memorandum regarding those specific cases had no bearing whatsoever upon the general question of section 1199. In my memorandum I stated my disapproval of smashing those proceedings, because I believed them to be legal, and because such action would be detrimental to discipline. But on account of the peculiar conditions I suggested that clemency be exercised, and that those men be restored to duty, and that the young officer who had shown bad judgment be relieved from his command.

Senator LENROOT. That is, your participation was upon the merits of the case and not upon the construction of the statute?

Gen. CHAMBERLAIN. Absolutely so. It had no connection whatsoever with the statute.

Senator LENROOT. You prepared a memorandum upon it?

Gen. CHAMBERLAIN. A short memorandum.

Senator LENROOT. Could that be produced and put in the record? That would help to clear this up, here.

Gen. CHAMBERLAIN. That memorandum is embodied in my report.

Senator LENROOT. It is already in this record?

Gen. CHAMBERLAIN. It is in my report, I think.

Senator WARREN. We have that.

Senator LENROOT. That will be all right, then.

Senator WARREN. I have not brought that report before the committee for examination, Senator, but it is here, when you get ready to look it over.

Senator LENROOT. I can refer to it.

Senator WARREN. When you were out of the room, I believe, Senator Chamberlain, there was something said by Gen. Chamberlain about something that Gen. Ansell said.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Yes; I have the record here.

Senator WARREN. Would you like to ask the witness any questions on that?

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Of course this committee, as I understand it, is not interested in the personal controversy between you and

Gen. Ansell, but it is perfectly proper for you, General, to give your version of this particular statement of Ansell's.

Gen. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. Senator, my only object in coming here was to correct a positive statement of fact which seriously reflected upon the Inspector General in the performance of his duties.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. I say it is perfectly proper for you to do it; but the committee itself is not interested so much in the personal question as in the law itself.

Gen. CHAMBERLAIN. Certainly.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. What were you investigating with reference to Ansell? Were your instructions to make the investigation, in writing?

Gen. CHAMBERLAIN. In writing?

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Yes.

Gen. CHAMBERLAIN. Yes, sir.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. From whom did you receive instructions to investigate Ansell?

Gen. CHAMBERLAIN. I never received instructions to investigate Ansell.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. What was the subject——

Gen. CHAMBERLAIN. My orders are in writing, signed by the Secretary of War, and they are embodied in that report, fully. The Secretary of War told me, as I recall it, that a controversy involving questions of fact had arisen in the Judge Advocate General's Department; that he desired me to examine all the records and to fully investigate those matters. He specifically, in those written instructions, stated that the investigation would be conducted under the assumption, with every officer, that it was his duty—have you that report there?

Senator LENROOT. I have your memorandum here.

Gen. CHAMBERLAIN. I want to get the exact language. [Reading from report:]

In making the foregoing inquiry you will proceed on the fact that I recognize fully the right of any officer in the Military Establishment to testify frankly and fully upon any matter as to which he may be interrogated by the committees of the Congress, and do not desire any adverse inference to be drawn from the fact of such testimony, where it is frank and straightforward.

This investigation was directed with special reference to the question as to whether or not the controversy pertaining to the office of the Judge Advocate General had affected adversely the efficiency of that office.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. That is in your order from the Secretary of War?

Gen. CHAMBERLAIN. That is in my order from the Secretary of War.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Who prepared that?

Gen. CHAMBERLAIN. The Secretary of War dictated it, in my presence.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Was it usual, in a controversy between two officers in the same department, to refer the whole question of fact involved between those officers to the Inspector General's office?

Gen. CHAMBERLAIN. Yes.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. For investigation and report?

Gen. CHAMBERLAIN. Entirely so. That is one of the functions of the Inspector General's Department.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Is that your report?

Gen. CHAMBERLAIN. That is my report.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. It covers maybe a thousand pages of typewritten matter, does it not?

Gen. CHAMBERLAIN. The report itself covers 60 pages.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Sixty pages?

Gen. CHAMBERLAIN. And these are copies of all correspondence [indicating].

Senator WARREN. Did you say 6 pages or 60 pages?

Gen. CHAMBERLAIN. Sixty pages. This report is long because we made a study in the office of 1,500 court-martial cases taken in blocks of 500 each, 500 taken during the period about January and February, 1918, 500 taken a few months later, and 500 again a few months later than that. We took those cases and made a careful analysis and study of them, the result of which study is set forth in this report.

Senator LENROOT. You studied all the cases within a given period?

Gen. CHAMBERLAIN. We took 500 in chronological order. That is, we took a block of 500 here and a block of 500 there, and then another block of 500, so that they included cases from every department; from the Philippine Islands, from Hawaii, from the A. E. F.; so that they were typical cases.

Senator WARREN. You also had some from here in the United States proper, I presume?

Gen. CHAMBERLAIN. Yes.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Did you take cases as they came, that is in the chronological order, the order in which they were filed in the Judge Advocate General's Office?

Gen. CHAMBERLAIN. Yes.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Did you receive any aid from the Judge Advocate General's Office or in any way, from Ansell or anybody else, in your selection of the 1,500 cases.

Gen. CHAMBERLAIN. None whatsoever. I called for 500 cases in a block. The Judge Advocate General's Department had nothing whatever to do, directly or indirectly, with the selection of those cases, or in the analysis of them, or in the examination of them.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. How did you call for them? Did you say "I want 500 cases between January 1, and February 1," we will say, for illustration, or did you ask for 500 cases in the chronological order of filing? How did you get each block of 500? I think it is quite material that you should refresh your memory as to just how these cases were selected, because I can conceive of a situation—

Gen. CHAMBERLAIN. I can tell you upon what basis they were selected. There was a General Order, No. 7, which was published in the spring of 1918, which was the occasion of a great deal of controversy.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. That was the four cases in France—

Gen. CHAMBERLAIN. No, no.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. That order originated out of them?

Gen. CHAMBERLAIN. That order—

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. No; it originated out of the Texas cases.

Gen. CHAMBERLAIN. It originated out of the Texas cases.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Where the negroes were sentenced to be shot, and were shot?

Gen. CHAMBERLAIN. Yes. Now, my instructions were these: To get 500 cases before General Order No. 7 went into effect, 500 cases after it went into effect, and 500 cases after it had been in force a considerable time.

Senator WARREN. Here is what I want to know, and I think it is the same thing Senator Chamberlain wants to get——

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Will you please let me continue while I have this in mind?

Senator WARREN. I wish you would put it this way: I want to know whether every court-martial case that occurred, chronologically, within a certain period of time was taken, was selected, or whether a certain number of cases were selected. Is that what you want to know?

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Have him answer your question, and then I will put my question just as I want it.

Gen. CHAMBERLAIN. The 500 cases were chronological. Each block contained a certain number, taking in every number, as received in the Judge Advocate General's files. That is all brought out in the report.

Senator WARREN. That is all brought out. Excuse the interruption.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. This may be very material for what I am trying to get at. It may be that there were 500 cases before General Order No. 7 was issued where there was absolutely no irregularity, either on the record or otherwise, but I can conceive that there might have been 500 cases prior to the issuance of General Order No. 7 where there were grave irregularities. I can conceive that the 500 cases that were submitted to you might have been the cases where there were no irregularities. I do not charge it, but I suggest that might have occurred.

Gen. CHAMBERLAIN. There were no cases submitted to me, Mr. Senator. I sent an officer who got the cases. I think if you will read the report your question will be fully answered.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Please understand, General, that I am not charging that there was any such course as that pursued.

Gen. CHAMBERLAIN. I understand.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. But if you depended upon the Judge Advocate General's office, that might have been done?

Gen. CHAMBERLAIN. I did not. The Judge Advocate General's office had no more idea of what cases or blocks of cases we were going to take than you had.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. I am glad to know that, because you could only get a cross section of the court-martial proceedings by taking them without respect to anybody's selection.

Gen. CHAMBERLAIN. My first idea was, and my first suggestion was, that we take 1,500 cases in a block; and then Col. Patterson, who was assisting me in this work, suggested that we would get more general results, or more satisfactory results, if, instead of taking the whole 1,500 together, we took 500 here and then 500 and then another 500.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. And you think they were chronological?

Gen. CHAMBERLAIN. I know they were. The records show that Col. Patterson, from my office, went personally and took the records from the files of the Judge Advocate General's office.

On January 17, 1918, General Order No. 7 was issued, to become effective from and after February 1, 1918. These orders provided that not only the execution of all sentences of death, as provided in General Order 169, 1917, but also all sentences of dismissal and dishonorable discharge be stayed until the records of the trial could be reviewed in the office of the Judge Advocate General and their legality there determined.

Fifteen hundred records of trial by general court-martial were selected from the office of the Judge Advocate General for a twofold purpose: (a) Because it was believed that they would be representative of the 20,000 cases tried during the war, and that they would therefore indicate how military justice was actually being administered, and (b) by selecting the records from different periods an opportunity would be afforded to discover what results were being accomplished by the issuance of General Order No. 7.

Records of trial received in the office of the Judge Advocate General are given consecutive serial numbers; date of receipt is also stamped on each case.

Three periods were chosen as follows:

One beginning January 1, 1918. This was before the issuance of General Order No. 7. Five hundred records were chosen consecutively from that date forward. One beginning March 1, 1918. This was one month after General Order No. 7 became effective. Five hundred records were chosen consecutively from that date forward. One beginning May 1, 1918. By this time the object and purposes of General Order No. 7 were well understood throughout the Army. Five hundred records were chosen consecutively from that date forward.

Senator WARREN. Excuse me for the interruption. That is exactly what I was anxious to find out.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. If Ansell did decline to appear before you, he was only exercising a right which was usual and in accordance with the rule which you have just announced?

Gen. CHAMBERLAIN. Certainly. I have never criticized Ansell for that. I simply told him at the time that I regretted it, because I wanted everyone to tell me what he knew. It was his privilege to decline to give testimony.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Had you, previously to this request upon Ansell, formed any opinion as to section 1199 of the Revised Statutes as to the appellate jurisdiction of the Judge Advocate General's office?

Senator WARREN. As to review and revisory power?

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Yes.

Gen. CHAMBERLAIN. Do you mean as to the soundness---

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Of Ansell's interpretation of the law and of the soundness of the Judge Advocate General's interpretation of that statute.

Gen. CHAMBERLAIN. I have never presumed to pass upon that, Mr. Senator. I am not a lawyer. That is purely a matter of law and I have never presumed to pass upon that.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. You spoke of the case of these Texas mutineers. That controversy was primarily involved in the construction of the law that those two gentlemen had placed upon that statute. Which view of the law had you taken? You had held, I believe you say, that the conviction was proper, and you had only recommended that the young officer be transferred from his command.

Gen. CHAMBERLAIN. As I stated, to the best of my belief a concrete question of the interpretation of that section, 1199, was not at that time brought to my attention, and to the best of my belief I had no knowledge whatsoever that any question of the interpretation of section 1199 was up until the question came up before the committees over a year later:

In my mind there is no connection whatsoever between the interpretation of section 1199 and the memorandum which I prepared on those cases. Of course, as you look back over the records they were connected, but I do not think at the time I knew it, nor do I think I knew it until last spring when these hearings began. As to whether that section gives to the Judge Advocate General the appellate view of jurisdiction which Col. Ansell claims, I do not presume to express an opinion.

The trial of those men appeared to be entirely legal. There is no question, and was no question, that those noncommissioned officers were guilty of the technical charge of mutiny. There is no question that those noncommissioned officers refused repeatedly in the presence of other members of the command to obey the orders of the commanding officer.

The attending circumstances were such, however, as to very materially mitigate the seriousness of the offense.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. They were standing on their rights, and while they were under arrest on a former charge they could not be ordered to do a military duty.

Gen. CHAMBERLAIN. The first duty of a soldier, as I have always understood it, is to obey the orders of his commanding officer.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. There is no question about that, General, as an ordinary proposition; but is it not a fact that when a man is under arrest on a charge of some kind for a violation of a military duty he can not then be ordered to perform some military service?

Gen. CHAMBERLAIN. I do not think so.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. You think that if these men were charged with gambling and were under arrest for violation of that regulation they could nevertheless be ordered to perform a military service; to drill, for instance?

Gen. CHAMBERLAIN. I think it was improper to do so; but I do not think it was an occasion where a man, a noncommissioned officer, or an officer was justified in taking the law into his own hands and presuming to determine whether the commanding officer should order him to do it.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. That was the controversy. These noncommissioned officers claimed that, under the rules and under the regulations and under the law, they being under arrest, they had no right to be required to perform military service; and, as you say, it was not proper.

Gen. CHAMBERLAIN. I say that it was not up to them to decide whether the orders of the commanding officers were legal or proper. It was up to them to obey those orders, and if the commanding officer had given an illegal order, it was up to his superior officers to discipline him, which would have been done, probably, if it had been reported.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. What I am getting at, General, is this: There the controversy arose between Ansell and the Judge Advocate General. Ansell held, evidently, as you hold, that it was improper to have ordered these men to do a military duty while they were under arrest.

Gen. CHAMBERLAIN. Yes.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. And Ansell claimed that therefore, having been ordered to do a thing which was improper, the trial was irregular and ought to be—the sentence ought to be—set aside. On the other hand, the approving authorities held that that condition was proper.

Gen. CHAMBERLAIN. I think it was entirely proper.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. There, you see, there is opportunity for a fair misunderstanding between two officers in the Judge Advocate General's Office about the facts.

Gen. CHAMBERLAIN. Yes.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. So that you will agree, then, not with Ansell about the view of the law, but with Gen. Crowder's view of the law?

Gen. CHAMBERLAIN. Gen. Crowder up to that time had expressed no view at all. It had not then been put up to him.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Whether it had or not, you agreed with the view that he was maintaining?

Gen. CHAMBERLAIN. He had not expressed any view at all up to that time, so far as I know. The case had not at that time come before him.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Of these mutineers?

Gen. CHAMBERLAIN. Yes.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. That had come before him when you were called upon to investigate Ansell, and that was one of the questions you were called upon to investigate, was it not?

Gen. CHAMBERLAIN. I was not directed to investigate Ansell.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. The differences between Crowder and Ansell?

Gen. CHAMBERLAIN. Not at all. I was called upon to investigate statements of fact, where one had made certain statements of fact, certain charges, and where the other had made certain statements. I was not called upon to, nor did I in my investigation or in my report, touch upon the question of the interpretation of section 1199 or upon the merits of the action upon these or other court-martial cases.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. I do not see how you could possibly separate the one from the other.

Gen. CHAMBERLAIN. Well, if you will read this report, you will find out. I believe that I have done so. I believe that I confined myself strictly to the spirit and letter of my instructions.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. I want again to impress upon your mind, General, that I have no feeling upon this matter except to get the justice of the proposition.

Gen. CHAMBERLAIN. I appreciate that perfectly, Senator, and I have no feeling. I should not have taken the time of this committee, except for those concrete statements which were not true.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. If I had been in Ansell's place, if I had felt that you had already espoused that view of the law, even if you were going to investigate only a question of fact, I would have hesitated to appear before you, because it is human to follow the bent of a man's decision in a former case.

Gen. CHAMBERLAIN. He was within his rights, and I never have criticized him for that; the only thing I take exception to is his statement that I threatened him.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. In that controversy we have no particular interest. Both sides are interested.

Gen. CHAMBERLAIN. But the committee has accepted and has made of record his statements, which did charge me with having done that.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Yes.

Gen. CHAMBERLAIN. Therefore I consider that my statement in regard to the matter ought to be of record also.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. That is perfectly proper, General.

Senator WARREN. Now, see if I understand you as to your construction of the duties of soldiers and officers. Here is a mutiny, as I get it, from what has been said. Certain noncommissioned officers, and perhaps privates, refused to obey an order of their superior officer because of their knowledge or supposed knowledge of the law, or what might be the end, the ruling, that an officer had no right to give them orders while they were in arrest. I think, from what you say, you must take the view that a soldier must obey the order of his officer and find out afterwards, or call the officer to account afterwards if he has done wrong; that is, when an order is given, per se, he must obey it. Is that your idea?

Gen. CHAMBERLAIN. That is the way that I have been brought up. If I receive an order from my superior officer I obey it, and I inquire as to the legality of it afterwards. The only occasion under which I would assume the responsibility of disobeying an order of my superior now, with my present rank and experience, would be if by obedience to that order I would commit an act which would have serious results which could not be remedied after the act had been committed.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Here is the question we are interested in—that is, that I am very much interested in, General. Here was an order given to these men, which you admit was wrong under the circumstances, and it led to your recommendation——

Senator WARREN. I did not hear that order read. What was it for them to do?

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. It was for them to perform a military duty while they were already under arrest, and they, acting together, refused and were then charged with being mutineers.

Senator WARREN. It was not an order to do something that could result in wrong to anybody else?

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Oh, no.

Gen. CHAMBERLAIN. An order to go to drill.

Senator WARREN. An order in the technical application of the law?

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Yes. Now, let me get that over again. Here is what I am particularly interested in. Here were these non-commissioned officers who were under arrest. They were ordered by the commanding officer to perform a military service. They refused to do that service because they said that, being under arrest, it was violative of the regulations to order them to perform a military service. You say that order was wrong.

Gen. CHAMBERLAIN. I say that the commanding officer should not have given that order.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. But he did give the order, and the approving authorities held that it was proper. Now, what I am interested in——

Gen. CHAMBERLAIN. No, they did not hold that it was proper, I think, Mr. Senator.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. They approved the sentence.

Gen. CHAMBERLAIN. That is a very different thing.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. The sentence was approved, and those men were dishonorably discharged from the service. If that had not been the case you would not have recommended clemency.

Gen. CHAMBERLAIN. If what had not been the case?

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. If the sentence had not been approved by the approving authority there would have been no clemency to be recommended.

Gen. CHAMBERLAIN. Certainly not.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Here is what I am interested in. There was under the ruling of the Judge Advocate General no relief for these men. There was no relief for them, except that if the Judge Advocate General's Office looked over the record and found, as you actually found, that the order was improper, and he then recommended to the approving authority that the sentence be set aside, or whatever recommendation he saw fit to make; but he had not authority to do that himself.

Gen. CHAMBERLAIN. The Judge Advocate General?

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Yes.

Gen. CHAMBERLAIN. No, sir; certainly not.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. So that you see there was really no relief for these men.

Gen. CHAMBERLAIN. Yes there was, and the relief actually came. The President exercised clemency.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. What did he do?

Gen. CHAMBERLAIN. As I recall it, he remitted sentence and restored them to duty and relieved the officer from his command. That is my recollection.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. But the record of conviction still stood against them.

Gen. CHAMBERLAIN. It stood.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. It was simply a question of a person having exercised mercy toward men who were charged improperly.

Gen. CHAMBERLAIN. I did not say they were charged improperly. I do not think they were charged improperly. I think they should have been tried.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Well, that is where our difference is.

Gen. CHAMBERLAIN. That is where our difference is.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Which is perfectly proper.

Gen. CHAMBERLAIN. Yes.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Under my view of the law the Judge Advocate General had the power under section 1199 to have rejected and set aside the findings of the court.

Gen. CHAMBERLAIN. I could not pass upon that, as I say, because I am not a lawyer.

Senator WARREN. I can see right where the difference is. It is the difference between the practice in civil life and the regulations in the Army. That is where it comes in.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Probably.

Senator WARREN. In the Army the thing to do is to obey an officer. In civil life the proper thing is to stand a man off as long as possible.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. But the difficulty is that he gets carried before the military authorities and does not get justice, frequently.

Senator WARREN. I understand that this is the fact. See if I am right: Their record was wiped out and they were restored to duty?

Gen. CHAMBERLAIN. The record was not wiped out, but I understand they were restored to duty. Of that, however, I am not certain.

Senator WARREN. In other words, they stood in the position that men would stand in who are apprehended and who undergo, possibly, a temporary imprisonment, and are then found to be innocent, and that is the end of it. Now, is that a fair simile?

Gen. CHAMBERLAIN. I do not think so. I think that the fair simile would be that of a man who had been tried and convicted upon a charge, and there was no question of his being guilty of the charge as placed, but that the circumstances and conditions were such as to justify the pardoning power to at once issue a pardon.

Senator WARREN. You did not get at just what I meant. I was getting at results only, and skipping all the other, if the results were similar.

Gen. CHAMBERLAIN. The results would be similar, yes.

Senator WARREN. I am not expressing my opinion either way, but trying to get the different facts to see where the end is, practically.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. In practical effect, you state the rule; but the general states the rule more properly.

Senator WARREN. Oh, yes; I admit that.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Here is the case. I may be charged with murder and may be convicted of murder, and I may be sentenced to be hung or to be sent to the penitentiary. Now, I may be pardoned by the governor of a State, or by the President of the United States if it is a Federal charge. That is a question of mercy. The other question, that is more important to me, is, was I justly convicted? There ought to be some appellate tribunal to determine whether I was guilty in this instance, and the tribunal may have said that I was not guilty. Now then, I am a free man, without any shadow of guilt upon me. In the other case I am a pardoned man; mercy has been extended to me.

Senator WARREN. You state the case as it is in the books. I was jumping crosswise to get at what the condition of the man was afterwards.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Here is a case of a man who has been unjustly convicted, who has had mercy extended to him when he ought to have had justice shown him. That is unjust.

Your report is there in the Ansell case, in the investigation that was referred to you?

Gen. CHAMBERLAIN. Yes.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Your evidence is all there?

Gen. CHAMBERLAIN. Everything is here.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. And your findings and conclusions are there?

Gen. CHAMBERLAIN. Many of the papers examined are there, and all the evidence taken.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. So that that will show all that was done?

Gen. CHAMBERLAIN. Yes, sir.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Can you tell in concrete, and in a very few words, just what your conclusion was with reference to the controversy between Ansell and Crowder?

Gen. CHAMBERLAIN. The answer to that question covers many pages of the report. There were a good many different points at issue which were taken up individually.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. In other words, in your findings do you sustain Ansell in some and Crowder in some?

Gen. CHAMBERLAIN. I do. In some I find that Ansell's claims were correct, and sometimes the other; and sometimes neither.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. That would be very natural in findings on so many questions?

Gen. CHAMBERLAIN. Yes.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Is there a general recommendation that Gen. Ansell be brought to trial?

Gen. CHAMBERLAIN. No recommendation whatsoever as to disciplinary action.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Is it not usual for the Inspector General's department to recommend that a charge be preferred?

Gen. CHAMBERLAIN. Not necessarily, unless the Inspector General considers that a charge should be preferred or that disciplinary action should be taken.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Did you consider that disciplinary action should be taken?

Gen. CHAMBERLAIN. I made no such recommendation. I made no recommendation as to disciplinary action.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. You just left it to the Secretary of War to do what he thought proper?

Gen. CHAMBERLAIN. I simply stated the facts as I found them, and the conclusions based upon those facts.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Was any disciplinary action taken, so far as you know?

Gen. CHAMBERLAIN. None, so far as I know.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Was your report filed before Ansell's resignation, or after?

Gen. CHAMBERLAIN. This report was filed—the report is dated May 8, 1919.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. And he resigned afterwards?

Gen. CHAMBERLAIN. Yes; he resigned several months afterwards.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. I believe that is all I care to ask the general.

Senator WARREN. I believe that I have nothing more. You understand, Senator Chamberlain, I have not even opened or examined that report at all. I assumed, though, just what he has stated last, that he was not given a duty and did not perform any duty as to the controversy between the two men, but to get these cases that we have had up.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Yes.

Senator WARREN. I am right about that, am I not, General?

Gen. CHAMBERLAIN. Yes.

Senator WARREN. You were not instructed to entertain any charges against any members of the Judge Advocate General's corps?

Gen. CHAMBERLAIN. None at all; no charges were made against anyone.

Senator WARREN. Never have been, in fact?

Gen. CHAMBERLAIN. No charges were made at any time against anybody.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. May I ask you this question, General: Do you feel, with your vast experience, that no revision of any kind of the Articles of War, or the appellate procedure, is necessary?

Gen. CHAMBERLAIN. I do not feel that; no, sir. I think that there are a number of things in connection with the Articles of War which should be changed.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Have you ever made any recommendations upon the subject?

Gen. CHAMBERLAIN. Some time ago I submitted to The Adjutant General a brief memorandum on the subject.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Have you them accurately in your mind so that you could, without very much difficulty, suggest those amendments?

Gen. CHAMBERLAIN. I have some of them in my mind; the principal ones?

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. You know, General, this committee is only anxious to get at the truth of this situation, and any suggestions from you would be very helpful. If you have in mind any amendments that ought to be made to the Articles of War or any particular one of them, your recommendations upon the subject might have controlling weight upon this committee.

Senator WARREN. I should like to have anything of that kind submitted so that we might have it in this report of this hearing. You might submit it at a later date in written form.

Gen. CHAMBERLAIN. I would prefer, Mr. Chairman, to have time to think that matter over, because I have never thought of it with a view of presenting my views to this committee. I have very decided views upon certain points.

Senator WARREN. You must have.

Gen. CHAMBERLAIN. And I would like to present them, but I would like to have an opportunity to prepare a memorandum for the committee.

Senator WARREN. What time could you present them; so that they could be printed with this?

Gen. CHAMBERLAIN. Any time you desire.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Could you not embody them as an appendix to your testimony?

Gen. CHAMBERLAIN. I could do that, if you desire.

Senator WARREN. He could let them come in at the end of this testimony. You could get them to us early next week?

Gen. CHAMBERLAIN. Yes.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Put in anything you can at the end of this testimony.

Senator WARREN. Yes. How would it do to have printed his testimony of this morning and then his recommendations, and then have this report, which is very voluminous, printed as an appendix?

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Are you going to print that report?

Senator WARREN. I think so, if there is no objection?

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. I do not care.

Gen. CHAMBERLAIN. That report has never been given out, so far as I know.

Senator WARREN. I asked the Secretary of War to send it up here so that the committee might have the liberty of referring to it, and he made no objection and he has sent it.

(See report, printed as an appendix, following Gen. Chamberlain's testimony.)

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. One other question, General: The American Bar Association has held hearings, and has made some recommendations in regard to appellate procedure in regard to courts-martial, and has suggested changes in the present law.

The Kernan Board, appointed by the Secretary of War, have looked into the matter and they have made recommendations suggesting a change in the methods of appellate trials. I think Gen. Crowder himself feels that there ought to be some change in the appellate procedure, and Gen. Ansell recommends something of the same kind. All of these people, boards and committees and individuals, have recommended some change so that the appellate tribunal shall have more power than is now given to the Judge Advocate General, some insisting that this appellate tribunal should be partly civil and partly within the Military Establishment, and some insisting that it should be entirely within the Military Establishment. Have you any views upon that subject?

Gen. CHAMBERLAIN. Yes; I have very decided views.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. What are your views about it?

Gen. CHAMBERLAIN. There should be an appellate jurisdiction. I think that all parties agree as to the necessity for appellate jurisdiction, the only question being as to where it should rest.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Yes.

Gen. CHAMBERLAIN. My own belief is that it should rest with the President and his subordinate military commanders—and that the action of the legal branch should be advisory. It is my belief that the presence of civilians on such a tribunal would in no degree contribute to improvement in the administration of justice.

The Commander in Chief of the Army and his military subordinates are responsible to the country for the Army, they are responsible for discipline, and you can not take away from them the instrumentalities for maintaining discipline and put them into the hands of somebody who has no responsibility whatever for discipline or for results, who knows nothing about command, or who has never exercised command.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Take this sort of a case: Here is a man charged with a high crime, and he is tried and evidence is admitted in the trial which is wholly improper. He is convicted, however, on that testimony. For the purposes of the illustration we may say that all of the testimony is hearsay testimony. He is convicted by the court-martial, and the approving authority, though he may be ever so distinguished a military man, yet entirely ignorant of law, approves the findings. The man appeals to the Judge Advocate General for review. The Judge Advocate General has no power to reverse that for errors of law made on the trial. Do you not think there should be some appellate tribunal that could look at the record from the first inception of the case to its conclusion and say that the error there ought to reverse the case?

Gen. CHAMBERLAIN. I think there is such an agency. Final action should, in my opinion, not rest with the legal tribunal. As a matter of fact, Mr. Senator, as my report will show, in probably 97 cases out of 100 the commanding general, the reviewing authority acts upon the recommendation of his judge advocate, and the President or the Secretary of War acts upon the recommendation of the Judge Advocate General. In cases involving legal questions, I believe that they would so act in 99 out of 100 cases, and similarly the commanding general acts—upon the recommendation of his judge advocate. Questions may arise as to the amount of punishment a man should receive. The commanding general might think that his view as to the amount of punishment for a certain crime was better than that of his judge advocate. But when it comes to the regularity of proceedings and to legal questions involved, the commanding general will always follow his law officer.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. You do know of cases where a man has been found not guilty of a crime, and the commanding officer ordered a reconvening of the court, and practically instructed the court to render a verdict of guilty against the man?

Gen. CHAMBERLAIN. That is wrong, Mr. Senator, and I think that the Articles of War should be changed in such a way as to prohibit the return of proceedings in case of an acquittal, or the return of proceedings for a revision of the sentence upward.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Yes; they have now undertaken to cure that by regulation.

Gen. CHAMBERLAIN. That has been cured by regulation.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. What was that order, do you remember? Do you know, Col. Hull?

Col. HULL. No; I do not.

Gen. CHAMBERLAIN. I do not remember exactly, but it covers that point.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. The President, the Commander in Chief, issued that order?

Gen. CHAMBERLAIN. Yes. I do not know whether you care to bother about calling that young man, my stenographer. He is waiting outside. I am entirely satisfied either way.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. No; I do not think so.

Senator WARREN. We do not care to call him, and unless you have something more to offer, we shall excuse you, General.

Gen. CHAMBERLAIN. I have nothing further to offer. I will prepare the statement on Articles of War.

(The statement referred to was subsequently submitted by Gen. Chamberlain, and is here printed in full, as follows:)

CHANGES IN COURT-MARTIAL PROCEDURE AND THE ADMINISTRATION OF MILITARY JUSTICE.

1. Membership of courts-martial should be restricted to commissioned officers. These officers should be those best qualified for such duty by training and experience. The presence of civilians on the court would, by their lack of knowledge of military matters, hamper the administering of justice, and would seriously interfere with the maintaining of discipline. The presence of enlisted men on the court would serve no good purpose. They would have very little patience with slackers and unpopular men in the organization.

2. No change should be made in the present membership of general courts-martial with respect to the number of officers provided by law to be detailed on said courts.

Should the membership of a general court-martial be in excess of nine members for the trial of persons in capital cases, no conviction of an offense for which the death penalty is made mandatory by law and no sentence of death should stand unless concurred in by at least nine members of the court. Should the membership be nine members or less, no such conviction or sentence should stand unless unanimously concurred in by the members of the court.

3. Summary court officers should be selected from those best qualified by reason of rank, experience, and judicial temperament.

4. There should be detailed for each general and special court-martial a trial judge advocate, and a counsel for the defense. Neither of these officers should be, if same can be avoided, a member of the staff of the reviewing authority. Should it become necessary to select a member of the staff for either duty, the proceedings should be forwarded to a higher military authority for review.

It is not believed necessary to provide, for general and special courts-martial, officers of the Judge Advocate General's Department to rule upon questions of law or to perform other legal duties. With a judge advocate on the staff of the convening authority, and with an appellate review of all court-martial records, no error of law or procedure prejudicial to the accused will be permitted to stand.

Officers of experience should be assigned as counsel for the accused. The latter should be permitted to have civilian counsel at his own expense and, if practicable, of his own choosing. He should also be permitted to have military counsel of his own choosing if same is practicable, the question of practicability being one entirely within the judgment of the convening authority.

5. The jurisdiction and powers of special courts-martial should be materially broadened, so as to reduce the number of cases brought before general courts-martial.

6. Before charges are preferred the case should be thoroughly investigated by a disinterested officer of experience, who should recommend to the proper military authority whether or not the accused should be brought to trial. The staff judge advocate should indorse in writing on all charges whether or not an offense made punishable by the Articles of War is charged with legal sufficiency, and whether or not it has been made to appear to him that there is prima facie proof that the accused is guilty of the offense charged. The officer exercising court-martial jurisdiction should, however, be the sole judge as to whether or not an officer or soldier should be brought to trial.

7. The accused should not be given the right of peremptory challenge.

Care should be taken that each member of the court is free from bias and prejudice and that he has not formed an opinion in the case.

8. Procedure should be prescribed in cases of acquittal to forbid the appointing authority to return a record of acquittal to the court for reconsideration and to direct the immediate release of the accused from custody.

Procedure should also be prescribed in cases of conviction to forbid the convening authority to return record to the court for reconsideration, with a view to increasing a sentence originally imposed, except where a sentence of confinement of one year or more fails to carry a dishonorable discharge, in which event reconsideration should be limited to imposing a suspended dishonorable discharge.

9. Every court-martial record should be automatically and carefully reviewed in the office of the Judge Advocate General. For this purpose boards of review should be created and should be composed exclusively of officers of the Judge Advocate's Department. The presence of civilians on these boards would in no sense contribute to their efficiency, nor would they add in the slightest degree to insuring justice to the accused. These boards of review should determine and recommend in what cases the appellate power should be exercised by the Commander in Chief. Their action and that of the Judge Advocate General should be advisory only, the Commander in Chief being the sole judge as to whether appellate power should be exercised.

10. There should be provided an appellate power over court-martial sentences. This appellate jurisdiction should be very broad and comprehensive in its scope. It should be lodged in the Commander in Chief of the Army, who should have power to correct, change, reverse, or set aside any sentence of court-martial found by him to have been erroneously adjudged, whether by error of law or of fact. The Judge Advocate General should have no appellate jurisdiction, his duties being confined in this respect to legal adviser to the Commander in Chief.

11. Clemency and restoration boards should be composed of officers of the Judge Advocate General's Department exclusively. They should consider appeals by prisoners, their relatives, or friends, for clemency or restoration to the colors. They should make their recommendations to the Judge Advocate General, who, in turn, should advise the Commander in Chief what cases warrant the exercise of Executive clemency.

12. The President should have power, by Executive order, to prescribe limits of punishment in time of war, as well as in time of peace. //

13. An enlargement of the disciplinary powers now lodged in commanding officers under the provisions of the one hundred and fourth article of war would serve no good purpose.

Steps should be taken by Executive order to insure, so far as possible, prompt trial of accused persons. To this end it is believed that the commanding officers should be required on stated occasions to report to the next higher commander the names of all persons who have been in confinement or arrest for a greater period than 14 days, giving full information regarding the status of each. Such report on the 1st and 15th of each month would be effective.

REPORT OF INSPECTOR GENERAL TO SECRETARY OF WAR—INVESTIGATION OF CONTROVERSIES PERTAINING TO THE OFFICE OF THE JUDGE ADVOCATE GENERAL.

WAR DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE INSPECTOR GENERAL,
Washington, May 8, 1919.

From: The Inspector General of the Army.

To: The Secretary of War.

Subject: Investigation of controversies pertaining to the Office of the Judge Advocate General.

The basis of this investigation was a memorandum for the Inspector General from the Secretary of War, dated March 7, 1919 (exhibit 1) as follows:

"Certain controversies have arisen with regard to the presentation of facts growing out of the administration of military justice to the Secretary of War, and with regard to the administration of military justice itself in the Office of the Judge Advocate General during the war. It may be roughly said that these controversies began with the presentation of a brief in behalf of a certain construction of section 1199 of the Revised Statutes of the United States by Gen. Ansell, and reply brief thereto by Gen. Crowder. The legal question involved in that difference of opinion was definitely settled by the Secretary of War, and need be given no consideration in the inquiry which you are herein directed to make.

"It is conceded that the curative power of clemency existed in the President, and the Secretary of War, and that in the first instance the Secretary of War and the President rely upon the Judge Advocate General's Office for recommendations growing out of their examination of records of court-martial trials. I, therefore, desire to have you conduct a thorough investigation into the following questions:

"(1) What machinery was organized in the Office of the Judge Advocate General for the effective consideration of records with a view to making appropriate recommendations for clemency?

"(2) To what extent, if at all, has the making of such recommendations for clemency, or otherwise properly administering the business of military justice, been affected by the difference of opinion with regard to the interpretation of section 1199 of the Revised Statutes of the United States?

"(3) To what extent, if at all, has the presentation of facts with regard to the administration of military justice, either to the Secretary of War or to the public, been affected by failure of cooperation in the Office of the Judge Advocate General?

"(4) Any other defects of administration or conduct which appear on investigation proper to be called to my attention in order that effective reorganizations may be made of all the forces of the Judge Advocate General's Office for the performance of its duties.

"In making the foregoing inquiries you will proceed on the fact that I recognize fully the right of any officer in the Military Establishment to testify frankly and fully upon any matter as to which he may be interrogated by a committee of the Congress, and do not desire any adverse inference to be drawn from the fact of such testimony where it is frank and straightforward.

"Please proceed with the inquiry at your earliest convenience, and report the facts in full to me."

Upon receipt of this order, I made known to Maj. Gen. E. H. Crowder, Judge Advocate General, and to Brig. Gen. S. T. Ansell, Judge Advocate General's Department, senior assistant, the fact of the investigation and requested certain information. Gen. Crowder responded to this request and has rendered every possible assistance. In addition to a personal conversation with Gen. Ansell upon this subject, he was handed a memorandum, dated March 8, 1919 (Exhibit 2), setting forth the scope of the investigation and affording him an opportunity to submit such information, written or otherwise, as he might desire to submit, relating to the organization and functioning of the Judge Advocate General's Office during the present emergency. In reply Gen. Ansell submitted the following (Exhibit 3):

MARCH 10, 1919.

Memorandum for the Inspector General of the Army.

Responding to your memorandum of the 8th, I beg to say:

1. You state no specific controversy or issue which you are to investigate or to which I could intelligently address a statement if I deemed it advisable so to do.

2. If, as seems to be the case, the investigation has to do with my statement, before the Senate Committee on Military Affairs, that statement for which, of course, I am responsible speaks for itself.

3. Above all, however, it is my judgment that any adequate and helpful investigation of the existing system of military justice and the administration of it during this war falls beyond your province. That subject, my attitude toward it, and my connection with it, are not, when fairly considered, particular incidents to which your special capacity of inquiry can be properly applied; they are extra-departmental; they involve fundamental and general considerations of law and justice, the scope of which can not justly be confined to the War Department or any bureau of it, and which are entirely beyond your legal competency.

4. Besides, whatever of controversy has arisen upon these fundamental considerations, concerning which I have given expression to my views, directly involves the Secretary of War, whose subordinate you are. Even more; it directly involves you and your office as well. I beg to remind you what the record will show, that in my original endeavor made near the beginning of the war to subject courts-martial to departmental supervision and control, the Secretary of War, the Assistant Chief of Staff, the Judge Advocate General, and the Inspector General opposed. I had occasion then, in a brief filed with the Secretary of War and read into my recent statement before the committee, to comment upon the views of these military advisers of the Secretary of War and to pronounce them professional absolutists upon this question of military justice. They and you stood upon the one side of this so-called controversy and I upon the other. I can not, therefore, but regard you and your office as disqualified to make a full, fair, and impartial investigation.

5. Knowing nothing specific of the subject, scope, and purpose of your investigation, and excepting, as I do, and for the reasons given, to your jurisdictional competency, and likewise to your fair qualifications, to make such an investigation as that which you contemplate, affecting me, I am not inclined to have aught to do with it, voluntarily.

S. T. ANSELL.

Subsequently Gen. Ansell was summoned as a witness. To the first and only question propounded to him he replied as follows (Exhibit 27):

"General, I feel that as a matter of self-protection I have the right to decline, and I ought to decline, and I therefore do decline, to answer this question, or any other questions asked me by the Inspector General in this investigation, inasmuch as I believe the purpose of it is to lay the foundation for disciplinary action against me."

It is to be regretted that the Inspector General has been deprived of the cooperation and assistance which could have been rendered by Gen. Ansell in this investigation. However, Gen. Ansell's testimony before the Senate Military Affairs Committee and his signed statements have become public documents, and it must be assumed that he has made a full presentation of facts to the public, from his viewpoint, in so far as relates to this investigation. Fortunately, the files are so complete with respect to all matters of controversy as to make possible the rendition of a full report.

Before proceeding to a consideration of the case it is not only proper but imperative to here make clear a matter intimately connected with this investigation, although somewhat divorced from the subject matter thereof. In his memorandum above set forth, Gen. Ansell declares the Inspector General to be disqualified to make a "full, fair, and impartial investigation," citing certain reasons therefor. In charging bias against the Inspector General, Gen. Ansell stated: "In my original endeavor made near the beginning of the war to subject courts-martial to departmental supervision and control, the Secretary of War, the Assistant Chief of Staff, the Judge Advocate General, and the Inspector General opposed."

Early in November, 1917, certain noncommissioned officers were jointly tried for mutiny at Fort Bliss, Tex., and, when the record of trial reached the Judge Advocate General's Office, Gen. Ansell was of the opinion that the case was particularly flagrant with error and such that any court of appeals anywhere in the land could not have permitted the judgment and sentence to stand. As the result of his review of the proceedings of the case, he took action as expressed in the following language (Exhibit 5, p. 6):

"In the exercise of the power of revision conferred upon me by section 1199, Revised Statutes of the United States, I hereby set aside the judgment of conviction and the sentence in the case of each of these several defendants, and recommend that the necessary orders be issued restoring each of them to duty."

When the court-martial proceedings in the case of these noncommissioned officers were under consideration, the views of the Inspector General were called for. On November 15, 1917, he submitted the following memorandum (Exhibit 6):

Memorandum for the Chief of Staff:

1. The court, consisting of seven field officers and five captains, embraced what I believe to be a personnel well above the average of military courts.

The accused were represented by counsel, presumably of their own choice, and, so far as appears, this counsel has made no claim to the reviewing authority that the men did not receive a fair trial.

2. While the conduct of the case is, as stated by the Acting Judge Advocate General, open to grave censure, yet it can not be assumed that the members of this court were influenced thereby in their action.

It is also true that Capt. Harvey, the battery commander, is an officer of very short service and that his actions in this case were illadvised, unjustifiable, and clearly demonstrate his unfitness to command men.

3. Stripped of all technicalities, the evidence is believed to show conclusively that these men, in concert, deliberately refused and failed, and persisted in failing, to obey the orders of their commanding officer, and that they did this in the presence of the entire battery. There is, and can be, no doubt as to the fact that they fully understood that they were disobeying orders.

4. The action proposed by the Acting Judge Advocate General would, in my judgment, have a most demoralizing effect upon discipline. It is believed that these men are guilty of an offense which, under normal peace conditions, would be very serious and which, under war conditions, is even more so, but in view of the actions of the battery commander, and of the whole circumstances surrounding the case, the exercise of clemency by the Secretary of War appears to be demanded.

It is suggested, first, that the unexpired portion of their sentences be remitted and that they be restored to duty as privates if same can be done legally; second, that Capt. Harvey be severely reprimanded and that he be relieved from command of Battery A, 18th Field Artillery, if this has not already been done, and that he be assigned to duty elsewhere.

J. L. CHAMBERLAIN.

This memorandum pertained to the specific cases under consideration and contained no word of reference to the general question of departmental supervision and control of courts-martial. It is probable that the views of the Inspector General in these cases were called for, because of the fact that he had recently visited Fort Bliss and, upon his return, had invited the attention of the Chief of Staff to the unsatisfactory conditions in the Field Artillery at that place. It was not until January, 1919, when this matter became of public notoriety, that the Inspector General knew that a controversy existed, or ever had existed, relative to the interpretation of section 1199, Revised Statutes. Until then he had had no knowledge of the order assigning Gen. Ansell to duty as Acting Judge Advocate General or of the subsequent revocation of same. In fact, until January, 1919, the Inspector General had believed that perfect harmony existed in the office of the Judge Advocate General.

The files of the offices of the Judge Advocate General and The Adjutant General were freely consulted and, in addition, the following witnesses were examined:

Maj. Gen. E. H. Crowder, Judge Advocate General. (Exhibit 10.)

Col. J. Easby-Smith, J. A. G. D. (Exhibit 11.)

Brig. Gen. Lytle Brown, G. S. (Exhibit 12.)

Col. B. A. Read, J. A. G. D. (Exhibit 13.)
 Lieut. Col. E. R. Keedy, J. A. G. D. (Exhibit 14.)
 Lieut. Col. C. C. Tucker, J. A. G. D. (Exhibit 15.)
 Maj. W. H. Kirkpatrick, J. A. G. D. (Exhibit 16.)
 Maj. S. Moreland, J. A. G. D. (Exhibit 17.)
 Maj. J. S. Sanner, J. A. G. D. (Exhibit 18.)
 Col. L. W. Call, J. A. G. D. (Exhibit 19.)
 Col. E. G. Davis, J. A. G. D. (Exhibit 20.)
 Col. John H. Wigmore, J. A. G. D. (Exhibit 21.)
 Lieut. Col. R. W. Millar, J. A. G. D. (Exhibit 22.)
 Maj. W. H. Keith, G. S. (Exhibit 23.)
 Col. A. E. Clark, J. A. G. D. (Exhibit 24.)
 Maj. S. Heckscher, J. A. G. D. (Exhibit 25.)
 Col. W. S. Weeks, J. A. G. D. (Exhibit 26.)
 Lieut. Col. S. T. Ansell, J. A. G. D. (Exhibit 27.)
 Maj. A. J. Copp, jr., J. A. G. D. (Exhibit 28.)
 J. S. Lyon, civilian clerk, J. A. G. D. (Exhibit 29.)
 Col. J. J. Mayes, J. A. G. D. (Exhibit 30.)
 Mr. E. L. Brown, clerk, J. A. G. D. (Exhibit 31.)

In order that the facts may be presented in their logical sequence, they will be considered in the following order:

- I. Difference of opinion in the office of the Judge Advocate General.
- II. The administration of military justice and the machinery organized in the Judge Advocate General's office to further the same.
- III. Answers to the questions in the memorandum of the Secretary of War.

I. DIFFERENCE OF OPINION IN THE OFFICE OF THE JUDGE ADVOCATE GENERAL.

The principal difference of opinion in the Office of the Judge Advocate General has been between Maj. Gen. E. H. Crowder, Judge Advocate General, and Brig. Gen. S. T. Ansell, formerly senior assistant. This difference had its inception in the interpretation of section 1199, Revised Statutes. Subsequent disagreements relate back to that subject. The matters, therefore, which were examined into were:

1. Interpretation of section 1199, Revised Statutes.
2. Appointment of Gen. Ansell as Acting Judge Advocate General.
3. Issuance of General Orders, No. 169, War Department, 1917.
4. Issuance of General Orders, No. 7, War Department, 1918.
5. Establishment in France of branch of Judge Advocate General's Office.
6. Issuance of General Orders, No. 84, War Department, 1918.
7. Opposition of Gen. Pershing to General Orders, No. 84, War Department, 1918.
8. Alleged relief of Gen. Ansell from duty in connection with the administration of military justice.
9. Four cases arising in France wherein sentences of death were imposed.
10. Report of Gen. Ansell on his trip abroad.
11. Amendment to fiftieth article of war.
12. Establishment of Clemency Board.

They will be considered in the order indicated above:

1. Interpretation of section 1199, Revised Statutes.—Lieut. Col. S. T. Ansell, Judge Advocate General's Department, became senior assistant in the Office of the Judge Advocate General on August 29, 1917, and acted as Judge Advocate General during the absence of Gen. Crowder. He accepted his commission as brigadier general on October 6, 1917. So far as can be deduced from the records, the first difference of opinion between Gen. Crowder and Gen. Ansell arose in November, 1917. As stated above, Gen. Ansell was then, and for some time had been, acting as Judge Advocate General. Gen. Crowder, while nominally Judge Advocate General, had been almost completely absorbed, both as to time and energies, by his duties as Provost Marshal General. War conditions had led Gen. Ansell to the conclusion that, in order to prevent injustices, the Judge Advocate General must give to general court-martial records a closer legal supervision than theretofore had been the practice. He desired a complete and effectual appellate supervision of courts-martial, and professed to find such a grant of jurisdiction in section 1199, Revised Statutes. That statute, dating back to the year 1864, reads as follows:

"The Judge Advocate General shall receive, revise, and cause to be recorded the proceedings of all courts-martial, courts of inquiry, and military commissions, and perform such other duties as have been performed heretofore by the Judge Advocate General of the Army."

In a brief under date of November 10, 1917, Gen. Ansell presented his interpretation of the statute. (Exhibit 32.) This was concurred in by a number of officers serving in the department. The Secretary of War asked for the opinion of Gen. Crowder, which was submitted by a memorandum under date of November 27, 1917 (Exhibit 34), and disagreed with Gen. Ansell's interpretation. That the disagreement was as to the meaning of the law and not as to ultimate purpose is shown by a part of Gen. Crowder's concluding paragraph, wherein he said: "I shall continue my study of the general subject to see whether this power of appellate review can not be found in the President himself, as the constitutional Commander in Chief." The Secretary of War, on November 27, decided definitely and finally the question of law involved, in the following language: (Exhibit 34, p. 11.)

"As a convenient mode of doing justice exists in the instant cases, I shall be glad to act in reliance upon a usual power and leave this larger question for future consideration, informed by the further study which the Judge Advocate General is giving it. Ordinarily, however, the extraction of new and large grants of power by reinterpreting familiar statutes with settled practical construction is unwise. A frank appeal to the legislature for added power is wiser."

The cases referred to by the Secretary of War were those, among them that of the Texas mutineers, wherein Gen. Ansell attempted, without consulting the Secretary of War or the Judge Advocate General, to exercise a power which, according to his interpretation of the statute, was vested in the Judge Advocate General. (Exhibit 5, p. 6.)

Notwithstanding the final decision of the Secretary of War, Gen. Ansell, on December 11, in effect asked for a rehearing and submitted, through Gen. Crowder, a supplemental brief (Exhibit 38) further supporting his views and combating those of the Judge Advocate General. That Gen. Crowder gave Gen. Ansell's arguments full and sympathetic consideration is shown by a letter from him to the Secretary of War bearing date of December 17, 1917 (Exhibit 37), wherewith he transmitted Gen. Ansell's reply brief. That statement indicates very clearly what the issue was in Gen. Crowder's mind. His complete agreement with Gen. Ansell's ultimate purpose is further expressed in the same letter in the following language:

"He (Gen. Ansell) first addresses himself to the evils he would remedy. He shows that a great number of officers not familiar with court-martial procedure have lately been included in the Army, and that there is danger of grave error in court-martial proceedings. * * * He argues very strongly from these premises that it is both expedient and necessary that some corrective power should exist which shall have the effect of nullifying even the approved findings and sentences of courts-martial, and that we should not be remitted solely to the pardoning power to correct fatal errors of courts-martial and reviewing authorities. He cites again the mutiny case (from Texas) * * * and says, 'I think justly that there are other cases * * * which demand the exercise of such corrective power,' and down to this point I follow him with substantial concurrence, without, however, being able to concur with him that this power has been granted to the Judge Advocate General by section 1199, Revised Statutes."

Pending this argument, and under date of December 6, 1917, Gen. Crowder submitted to the Secretary of War a memorandum (Exhibit 35), which was the first result of the "further study" that he had given the matter. The study had actually been made by Col. E. G. Davis and Col. A. E. Clark, Col. Davis at that time being in charge of the military justice division of the Judge Advocate General's Office. Both of these officers had concurred in the original brief of Gen. Ansell with respect to section 1199, Revised Statutes. In this memorandum, the result of their further consideration of the subject, they dealt not only with section 1199, Revised Statutes, but, going to another statute, the thirty-eighth article of war, concluded that, by virtue of the power given the President to "prescribe the procedure" of courts-martial, rules could be formulated to effect the result which all agreed was desirable, i. e., an adequate revisory supervision of courts-martial. The views thus expressed were adopted by the War Department and resulted, first, in the issuance of General Orders, No. 169, December 29, 1917 (Exhibit 53) and, later, General Orders, No. 7, January 17, 1918 (Exhibit 54). The former was the forerunner of the latter, and both will be considered later in this report.

In order that Congress might put the whole matter of appellate power beyond question, the Secretary of War on January 19, 1918, transmitted to the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs of the Senate and House of Representatives a proposed amendment, prepared by Gen. Crowder, to section 1199, Revised Statutes, which was in the following form, new matter being indicated by italics, to wit:

"The Judge Advocate General shall receive, revise, and cause to be recorded the proceedings of all courts-martial, courts of inquiry, and military commissions and report thereon to the President, who shall have power to disapprove, vacate, or set aside any finding, in whole or in part, to modify, vacate, or set aside any sentence, in whole or in part, and to direct the execution of such part only of any sentence as has not been vacated or set aside. The President may suspend the execution of sentences in such classes of cases as may be designated by him until acted upon as herein provided and may return any record through the reviewing authority to the court for reconsideration or correction. In addition to the duties herein enumerated to be performed by the Judge Advocate General, he shall perform such other duties as have been heretofore performed by the Judge Advocate General of the Army."

There accompanied the draft of amendment in each instance a letter explaining fully the purpose of the proposed legislation. (Exhibits 48 to 51, inclusive.) This amendment failed to become a law.

2. Appointment of Gen. Ansell as Acting Judge Advocate General.—On November 8, 1917, an order was made, but not published in the War Department, appointing Gen. Ansell as Acting Judge Advocate General. When the Secretary of War learned of this order, he directed its revocation, and it was revoked on November 19. Concerning this order, both as to its original procurement and its revocation, there is a very distinct and bitter issue. The clear facts of record are as follows:

On November 3, 1917, Gen. Ansell wrote a letter (Exhibit 55) to Gen. Crowder, expressing his embarrassment, and the impediment of public business besides, by the fact that, although performing the duties of Judge Advocate General, he (Gen. Ansell) was not charged with full responsibility for its policies and general administration, and suggesting that Gen. Crowder join him in a memorandum to the Secretary of War recommending that Gen. Ansell be designated in orders as Acting Judge Advocate General. The following day Gen. Crowder replied in writing, as follows (Exhibit 56):

"It will be entirely agreeable to me to have you take up directly and in your own way with the Secretary of War the subject matter of your letter of yesterday. For your information, I would say that since taking charge of this office I do not recall that I have been consulted by outsiders in a single instance respecting any matter pertaining to the Judge Advocate General's Department, except in respect of appointment to the Reserve Corps, nor otherwise, except as you yourself have consulted me."

On November 6, 1917, Gen. Ansell, by memorandum (Exhibit 57) to the Chief of Staff, requested the publication of an order designating him Acting Judge Advocate General, and concluded the same with the following words:

"I am authorized to say that Gen. Crowder himself is entirely agreeable to my calling this matter to your attention."

The Acting Chief of Staff, in a Staff memorandum dated November 6, 1917, to The Adjutant General, directed that the order be published. (Exhibit 59.) Its publication was suspended. (Exhibit 62.) Gen. Crowder charges that the order was obtained by Gen. Ansell "surreptitiously," and states that the "coincidence" of his not attempting to exercise the appellate power which he claimed was to be found in section 1199, Revised Statutes, until after he had procured the order appointing him Acting Judge Advocate General, "is so remarkable that an inference of deliberate and ambitious planning for personal power, and only for personal power, is unavoidable." (Exhibit 72, p. 56.) Gen. Ansell by oft-repeated statements, both direct and indirect, charges that the revocation of his appointment as Acting Judge Advocate General was connected with, or attributable to, his attempted assertion of supreme appellate power under section 1199, Revised Statutes. The facts of the case are as follows:

The record in the case of the Texas mutineers was received in the Judge Advocate General's Office on October 23, 1917. On October 30 a memorandum (Exhibit 5) was prepared by Gen. Ansell, in which he attempted to exercise the appellate power of revision for the first time and set aside the judgment of conviction and the sentence in the case of each defendant. This memo-random bears the following office mark: "Received A. G. O., Nov. 8, 1917." Notwithstanding the fact that the memorandum was dated October 30, it was not received by The Adjutant General until the very day—i. e., November 8—that Gen. Ansell was appointed Acting Judge Advocate General. Gen. Ansell's memorandum on the interpretation of section 1199, Revised Statutes, bears the date of November 10. It reached the War Department not later than November 13 (Exhibit 7), but the exact date upon which it was first brought to the attention of the Secretary of War has not been definitely determined.

About November 17 Gen. Crowder was called to the office of the Secretary of War and saw for the first time a list of recommendations for appointment of officers to the Judge Advocate General's Department, submitted by Gen. Ansell. It appears, and Gen. Crowder was so informed by the Secretary of War, that when this list was submitted by Gen. Ansell he was asked whether it had been passed upon by Gen. Crowder. Gen. Ansell, by way of reply, exhibited to the Secretary of War the order designating him Acting Judge Advocate General. This was the first knowledge that the Secretary of War had of Gen. Ansell's appointment, and Gen. Crowder's first knowledge of the same was at the date of his interview with the Secretary of War; i. e., November 17. On this same date, by letter to Gen. Crowder (Exhibit 64), the Secretary of War inquired if he could not devote more time to the duties of Judge Advocate General, inasmuch as the great machine (the Provost Marshal General's Office) necessary for the mobilization of the selective army had been organized and the work so far advanced as to be more nearly automatic. Gen. Crowder replied, on November 18 (Exhibit 65), that he did not anticipate great administrative duty in connection with the future administration of the Provost Marshal General's Office and stated that he could at once give at least one-half of his time to the office of the Judge Advocate General. Thereupon Gen. Ansell's appointment, although the order announcing the same was still under suspension, was revoked by the Secretary of War, to wit, on November 19. Up to this time Gen. Crowder was ignorant of Gen. Ansell's attempted assertion of appellate power. His memorandum of November 10 appears not to have reached the attention of the Secretary of War until November 23, for on that date he called for Gen. Crowder and stated, in effect, that he had received from the Acting Judge Advocate General a very powerful brief in re appellate power in court-martial cases existing in section 1199, Revised Statutes.

From the foregoing it is obvious that Gen. Ansell's charge that he was relieved from duty as Acting Judge Advocate General by reason of the difference of opinion as to section 1199, Revised Statutes, is without foundation in fact. It is likewise obvious that Gen. Crowder's allegation that Gen. Ansell had obtained his order of appointment surreptitiously is erroneous. It appears and is probable that in his letter of November 4, 1917, Gen. Crowder gave his approval with certain mental reservations and with the intent that the matter was to be taken up personally with the Secretary of War. However, Gen. Ansell could not have known of such mental reservation, and, it is believed, was justified in presenting his case to the Chief of Staff, the recognized channel of communication with the Secretary of War. It is my opinion that responsibility for the issuance of this order, without reference to the Secretary of War and without his knowledge, rests with the then Acting Chief of Staff, and not with Gen. Ansell.

3. Issuance of General Orders, No. 169, War Department, 1917.—As early as October 18, 1917, Gen. Ansell was alarmed by the large number of court-martial cases resulting in dishonorable discharge and long terms of confinement. In a memorandum of that date (Exhibit 66) he called the attention of the Chief of Staff to the situation and suggested the policy of suspending all sentences of dishonorable discharge until the pleasure of the War Department was known. He also suggested the idea of divisional disciplinary battalions. Later specific recommendations of Gen. Ansell were approved, and the following instructions, an exact copy of those proposed by Gen. Ansell, were, on December 22, 1917, confidentially issued to all convening authorities (Exhibits 67 and 68):

"(a) No sentence of dishonorable discharge will be given where the offender has within him the capacity for military service and when any other appropriate form of punishment is sufficient to meet the requirements of the case.

"(b) Whenever a sentence of dishonorable discharge is given, it should be accompanied with a long term of confinement in the penitentiary or in the Disciplinary Barracks. Where the offense is not sufficiently grave to warrant a long term of confinement, it should be assumed that the offender has within him the elements of military service and he should be made to serve.

"(c) When a sentence of dishonorable discharge is given, unaccompanied with a long period of confinement, reviewing authorities should, in general, suspend or remit the dishonorable discharge and hold the offender to service and punishment with the organization to which he belongs."

Before proceeding further, it should be said that the Judge Advocate General has long followed the practice of recommending to the Secretary of War and the President that proceedings of courts-martial, even though finally approved by the reviewing authority, be set aside for want of jurisdiction. This practice was based, not upon any views of the War Department, but upon a series of rulings by Attorneys General, beginning with one by Mr. Cushing in 1854. Such a limitation of power was the real object of Gen. Ansell's criticism. He maintained that, if there was a power to set aside for want of jurisdiction, there should be a similar power to vacate for failure of evidence or errors substantially prejudicing the rights of the accused. Not only did no one dissent from Gen. Ansell's purpose in that respect, but, as it appears from the record, on the suggestion of Gen. Crowder as approved by the Secretary of War, further study was made in order to effectuate it, as far as possible, within the law. The first result of the further study given the subject by Gen. Crowder was the issuance of General Orders, No. 169, War Department, December 29, 1917, but there was another and more important contributing event. About the middle of December the public press announced the execution of 13 colored soldiers who were tried in Texas for mutiny and homicide. Their trial was conducted with the utmost care. They were ably defended and surrounded by all legal safeguards. The record was scrutinized day by day during the trial by an experienced staff judge advocate, who, upon the conclusion of the trial, was able to assure the reviewing authority that there was no possibility of a claim of injustice. The case was a particularly flagrant one. Eighteen persons, 11 of them civilians, had been killed. Proceeding under the forty-eighth article of war, authorizing in time of war confirmation by the commanding general of a territorial department or division of a sentence of death for mutiny, the reviewing authority confirmed the sentences and they were executed within 48 hours after confirmation. There was no review of the records by the Judge Advocate General. Notwithstanding the care with which the trials had been conducted, it was realized by the War Department that, in other like cases, similar freedom from prejudicial error could not be assured and that such sentences ought to be stayed until the trial records could be reviewed by the Judge Advocate General.

On December 22, 1917, Gen. Ansell submitted to Gen. Crowder a forceful memorandum (Exhibit 39) which may be considered as also contributing to General Orders, No. 169, for in that memorandum he said, in part:

"Regardless of your views or mine upon the question of the revisory power of this office, orderly administration as well as justice requires that sentences of death and sentences resulting, if executed, in immediate expulsion from the Army should not be executed until the proceedings may be reviewed for prejudicial error by an officer of and representing this bureau, and not of the administrative staff and representing the officer ordering the court and his power. In order that there might be no delay in such review of proceedings, reviewing authorities should be instructed to forward to the reviewing officer of this bureau all proceedings without a moment of delay."

Gen. Ansell's views, in so far as they related to staying the execution of sentences of death pending review, were adopted, and Paragraph I, General Orders, No. 169, as issued, reads in part as follows (Exhibit 53):

"I. Whenever, in time of war, the commanding general of a territorial department or a territorial division confirms a sentence of death, the execution of such sentence shall be deferred until the record of trial has been reviewed in the office of the Judge Advocate General and the reviewing authority has been informed by the Judge Advocate General that such review has been made and that there is no legal objection to carrying the sentence into execution * * *."

The order then provides for the procedure of suspending the execution of sentences until receipt of advice that there is no legal objection to carrying them into execution.

4. Issuance of General Orders No. 7, War Department, 1918—Immediately after the issuance of General Orders, No. 169, Gen. Ansell, to-wit, on January 9, 1918, submitted to Gen. Crowder a memorandum in which he stated in part (Exhibit 40):

"I have just been advised of the step taken by the Secretary of War to prevent the execution of possibly illegal death sentences in the United States by requiring that the record be transmitted to the department and reviewed here, that its legal correctness may be assured before execution. While a step in the right direction, I deem it my duty to say that in my judgment it falls short of the requisite degree of remediality in that it is not applicable generally, nor to all those sentences which, unless stayed, mean separation of a man from the Army and placing him, in a practical sense, beyond the reach of remedial power subsequently exerted.

"I see no reason why the same measure of relief should not be extended to dismissal and dishonorable discharge; nor do I see any reason why it should not be made applicable to our forces in France, as well as elsewhere; all of which could, with the establishment of a proper and practical system of revision, be done without evil administrative result and to the advantage of law and justice."

He then proceeds to recommend the establishment in France of an office representing the functions of the Judge Advocate General. This recommendation was adopted, as will later appear, without dissent from anybody.

Referring to his recommendation for a broader reviewing activity than was contemplated by General Orders, No. 169, which, as he indicated, suspended only the execution of death sentences in the United States, Gen. Ansell said in conclusion:

"I think no doubt need be entertained but that such a system of revision would be workable, nor is it of more than academic interest to determine whether the power finds its source in the inherent relation of the President to the Army, or in the statutory donation of article 38, or in the revisory functions of the Judge Advocate General established by section 1199, Revised Statutes, though, of course, I think it is clearly established in the latter section, and not otherwise."

In the meantime, Col. E. G. Davis, Chief of the Military Justice Division, by direction of Gen. Crowder, undertook the working out of a system of revision, the necessity for which was first suggested, as indicated above, by Gen. Ansell. In a memorandum dated January 10, 1918 (Exhibit 41), prepared by Col. Davis, but submitted to the Secretary of War over the signature of Gen. Crowder, certain changes were recommended in rules of procedure. It announced finally that, under the thirty-eighth article of war, giving the President power to regulate court-martial proceedings, a system had been devised which would adequately provide for all war-time necessities. It will be remembered that, in his memorandum of January 9, 1918 (Exhibit 40), relative to General Orders, No. 169, Gen. Ansell referred to the latter as a step in the right direction, but criticized it because it did not extend to dismissal and dishonorable discharge. In Gen. Crowder's memorandum of January 10, 1918, the same thought was set forth as follows:

"The question to be disposed of resolves itself, therefore, into one of preventing sentences of death, dismissal of an officer, or dishonorable discharge of an enlisted man from being executed before final review of the record of trial in this office. The scope of the difficulty is very much reduced by the fact that, in the great majority of cases where dishonorable discharge is suspended by the reviewing authority until the soldier is released from confinement, under the authority contained in the fifty-second article of war. Where this is done the correction of injustice is easy of accomplishment."

In a memorandum to Gen. Crowder dated January 12 (Exhibit 42), Gen. Ansell, referring to the former's memorandum of January 10, expresses his disapproval and concludes as follows:

"I have given this question of revisory power the best that is in me. I see no reasons whatever to hesitate at the adoption of that definition of revisory jurisdiction which is found in my recent memorandum and which was adopted after most thorough consideration upon the part of many of the assistants of the office as what the law requires. I do not believe as much as I should like to believe that what Maj. Davis proposes is sound in law and will prove safe in practice. I regret, therefore, that I can not advise you to adopt it."

Gen. Ansell's principal opposition to the plan was that it was "faulty as a definition of revisory power in that it regards that power as having application only to that very limited number of cases in which sentences should be stayed," and that it was "fundamentally wrong as a matter of law." His principal contention was that, in reviewing the cases for errors of law, the Judge Advocate General was denied the power of correction. He was of the opinion that the system, resting upon mere comity, was not likely to stand. How well practical justice was accomplished will hereinafter be set forth.

On January 15 the Secretary of War returned Gen. Crowder's memorandum of January 10, with the following remarks (Exhibit 41, p. 4):

"The entire plan has my approval. Please have letters written transmitting proposed legislation to appropriate committees. Put orders in course of promulgation."

It will be remembered, as heretofore stated, that effort was made to amend section 1199, Revised Statutes, by vesting in the President the power of revision. That was the "proposed legislation" referred to above by the Secretary of War. General Orders, No. 7, War Department, January 17, 1918, were promulgated, and necessary steps were taken to establish in France a branch office of the Judge Advocate General. (Exhibit 54.) General Orders, No. 7, provided that not only the execution of all sentences of death, as provided in General Orders, No. 169, 1917, but also all sentences of dismissal and dishonorable discharge be stayed until the records of trial could be reviewed in the office of the Judge Advocate General and their legality there determined. In the event that the record was not sufficient to sustain the findings and sentence of the court, provision was made to return the same to the reviewing authority with a clear statement of the error, omission, or defect which was found. If such error, omission, or defect admitted of correction, the reviewing authority was to be advised to reconvene the court for such correction, otherwise he was to be advised of the action proper for him to take by way of approval or disapproval of the findings or sentence of the court, remission of the sentence in whole or in part, retrial of the case, or such other action as might be appropriate in the premises. Provision was made that any delay in the execution of any sentence, by reason of the foregoing, should be credited upon the term of confinement or imprisonment imposed. A branch office of the Judge Advocate General was established in France to consider those cases arising in the American Expeditionary Forces.

Gen. Ansell has given public utterance to the following statements. In a letter, dated February 17, 1919 (Exhibit 69), to Representative John L. Burnett and published in the Congressional Record of February 19, 1919, he stated:

"In September I ordered the boards of review to break away from the office interpretation (which, however, was probably correct) of the administrative method heretofore referred to, which had been construed to forbid this office to make any recommendation or suggestion as to clemency. And I ordered that in a proper case, despite the order, clemency should be suggested to commanding generals."

The provisions of General Orders, No. 7, became effective on February 1, 1918. From that date until April 15, 1918, the Judge Advocate General not only recommended to reviewing authorities that corrective action be taken where illegality appeared in the proceedings but brought to their attention, with a view to mitigation, sentences which were unduly severe. During this period, all cases arising under General Orders, No. 7, before final action thereon, were handled either independently by Col. Davis, Chief of the Military Justice Division, or by Gen. Crowder upon recommendation from Col. Davis. This was partly because Col. Davis had drafted the orders and was in sympathy with them, and also because Gen. Ansell, after publication of the orders, was plainly antagonistic to them. Col. Davis in his testimony stated (Exhibit 20, p. 5):

"Whenever a case involving the application of General Orders No. 7 would be sent to his desk, Gen. Ansell * * * would contend that the action recommended was improper or ineffective or wrong in theory, or something of that kind, and would again go over * * * the old argument that his action under 1199 was the only correct one after all and that the office was simply compromising with principle by trying to make any other solution work * * *."

Col. Davis further stated (Exhibit 20, p. 5):

"After General Orders No. 7 went into effect there never arose any case in the Judge Advocate General's office, so far as I know, in which it could be fairly claimed that the department was without power to do full and exact justice to the defendant."

Gen. Ansell left for France in the middle of April, 1918, and Col. J. J. Mayes, Gen. Ansell's assistant, became the senior officer in the Judge Advocate General's office. He gave orders that all cases arising under General Orders No. 7, should pass over his desk, and directed that they be returned to reviewing authorities only where illegality was discovered. Upon Gen. Ansell's return from France, he overruled the practice established during his absence, and gave orders to suggest to commanding generals the exercise of clemency with respect to unduly severe sentences. (Exhibit 70.) He simply revived the practice based upon Gen. Crowder's and Col. Davis's interpretation of General Orders No. 7, which existed for two months and a half subsequent to the date when these orders first became effective, and his inference that the liberal views were entirely his own is misleading.

The following appears on page 32, "Hearings before the Committee on Military Affairs, United States Senate Sixty-fifth Congress, Third Session," relative to the operation of General Orders No. 7:

A SENATOR. Have those recommendations been generally followed since you have been making them?

Gen. ANSELL. "Generally, in the sense of indicating a majority, yes, sir."

The action of the Judge Advocate General under General Orders No. 7 is purely one of recommendation. There is no power to compel the reviewing authorities to follow his advice. Since February 1, 1918, the date when General Orders No. 7 became effective, 212 cases have been referred back to the reviewing authorities under its provisions. (Exhibit 71.)

The records indicate only seven instances where the recommendations of the Judge Advocate General were not entirely followed. In three of these his recommendations were partly followed, and in four disregarded. It will thus be seen that in 96½ per cent of the cases his recommendations have been adopted in their entirety.

That the Senate committee, by answer of Gen. Ansell, the substance of which is repeated elsewhere with similar lack of frankness, did not receive the complete information or that correct conception to which it was entitled is apparent from what appears on page 131 of the report. Without correction or protest from Gen. Ansell, a Senator stated:

"There have been a great many cases, as the general has testified here, in which they have * * * made a recommendation to the convening power, and those recommendations have been disregarded."

The answer of Gen. Ansell that the recommendations were followed generally in the extent of indicating the majority, while literally true, was wholly misleading and tended to create, in the mind of any uninformed auditor, a conclusion entirely contrary to the facts.

In Gen. Ansell's letter to Representative Burnett, he further stated (Exhibit 69, p. 6):

"The Judge Advocate General recommended and the department finally adopted an administrative method known as General Orders No. 7, which suspended certain sentences until the proceedings could be examined in this office and the commanding general advised with. This was an administrative palliative * * *."

In order to ascertain the results accomplished by General Orders No. 7, 500 consecutive records of trial received by the Judge Advocate General immediately prior to the publication of the same were examined. Five hundred cases were selected after the provisions of General Orders No. 7 became operative, and 500 additional cases which reached the Judge Advocate General's Office several months later. These cases represented 9 Departments, 38 divisions, and 15 other miscellaneous general court-martial jurisdictions. Certainly they were representative of the twenty thousand and odd cases tried during the war. A table, indicating the number of dishonorable discharges imposed by the courts, and those executed, suspended, remitted, or set aside by the reviewing authorities, is given below:

Dishonorable discharges.

	First period.	Second period.	Third period.
Imposed by the court.....	230	188	233
Executed.....	131	84	33
Suspended.....	47	50	140
Remitted.....	39	41	46
Set aside.....	13	4	14

The beneficial results derived from the operation of General Orders No. 7 are apparent. During the first period, viz, prior to the issuance of General Orders No. 7, 58 per cent of the dishonorable discharges imposed by the courts were ordered executed, 43 per cent during the second period, and only 14 per cent during the third period. On the other hand, 20 per cent of the dishonorable discharges imposed during the first period were suspended; 32 per cent during the second period, and 60 per cent during the third period.

It appears that the first suggestion that reviewing authorities stay the execution of sentences of death, dismissal, and dishonorable discharge until review of the records of trial in the Office of the Judge Advocate General originated with Gen. Ansell. His statement, repeatedly made, that General Orders No. 7, adopted to carry out the very views which he himself first advocated, were "an administrative palliative" is not in accord with the facts and is another instance where the public has been misled.

5. Establishment in France of branch of Judge Advocate General's office.—In his letter to Hon. John L. Burnett, House of Representatives, Gen. Ansell states (Exhibit 69, p. 6) :

"In September, upon my insistent recommendation, power was established in the Acting Judge Advocate General in France to make rulings upon matters of the administration of military justice, in our own forces in France, which would control all commanding generals until overruled by the Secretary of War. This is now being opposed by the commanding general American Expeditionary Forces, and my own action and propriety in procuring the issue of this order is being subject to question."

Gen. Ansell refers above to General Orders, No. 84, War Department, September 11, 1918, amending General Orders, No. 7, War Department, January 17, 1918 (Exhibit 91). Gen. Crowder charges that the issuance of General Orders, No. 84, which will presently be considered, was obtained surreptitiously by Gen. Ansell, and that its language embodies precisely the grant of mandatory appellate power in the Judge Advocate General for which Gen. Ansell had been contending in his brief of November 10, 1917, "a contention which was at that time explicitly repudiated" by both the Secretary of War and the Judge Advocate General. (Exhibit 72, p. 57.)

Paragraph II, General Orders, No. 7, provided for the establishment in Paris, France, of a branch of the office of the Judge Advocate General. The purposes of the branch office are fully set forth in the following language of the orders (Exhibit 54) :

"The records of all general courts-martial in which is imposed a sentence of death, dismissal, or dishonorable discharge and of all military commissions originating in the said expeditionary forces, will be forwarded to the said branch office for review, and it shall be the duty of the said Acting Judge Advocate General to examine and review such records, to return to the proper commanding officer for correction such as are incomplete, and to report to the proper officer any defect or irregularity which renders the findings or sentence invalid or void, in whole or in part, to the end that any such sentence or any part thereof so found to be invalid or void shall not be carried into effect. The said Acting Judge Advocate General will forward all records in which action is complete, together with his review thereof and all proceedings thereon, to the Judge Advocate General of the Army for permanent file."

Due to a misunderstanding caused by an error in the War Department's cablegram No. 663, of January 20, 1918, or in the decoding of same, a delay was caused in the opening of the branch office. (Exhibits 77 and 89.)

On March 24, 1918, Gen. Pershing's first and only objection to the provisions of General Orders, No. 7, was in the form of a cable, as follows (Exhibit 80) :

"With reference to a branch of the Judge Advocate General's Office in France to review certain court-martial proceedings after they have been acted upon by the judge advocate here, the reason for this is not clear. It submits to review cases within the jurisdiction of department commander in time of peace, and is in direct conflict with broad and liberal character of President's instructions at inauguration of command. Any authority outside of control of the commander in chief will cause delay in possibly more cases. Beyond doubt punishment for desertion or misconduct must be almost summary if it is to have deterrent effect. This is practiced in both British and French Armies. Any method that causes delay and possibly miscarriage of justice would be unfortunate for us and injurious to morale of our allies. The circumstances under which we are serving are in no sense comparable to our Civil War conditions, as here we are fighting a strong and virile foreign nation, and every possible means must be placed in the hands of the supreme commander to enable him to maintain the morale and integrity of the Army. Any thoughts in the minds of men that they can possibly escape punishment for such misconduct would be disastrous. I am very strongly of the opinion that final authority in these cases should rest with the supreme commander here."

In a joint memorandum to The Adjutant General, dated April 1, 1918, Gen. Ansell and his assistant, Col. Mayes, took exception to the views expressed in Gen. Pershing's cable. (Exhibit 88.) They stated that his objection was based upon a misconception of the law establishing the relation of the office of the Judge Advocate General to military authorities of whatever rank and power to convene general court-martial. They stated further that the action taken was the result of the most thorough consideration in the War Department, that it was organic in character and required by law, and that even if it were within the power of the administration to do so the revocation of such orders would constitute a serious reflection upon the administrative capacity of the department.

With respect to the length of time intervening between the War Department's original cable to Gen. Pershing and the latter's cabled reply, they remarked as follows:

"A conclusion so long delayed should weaken the confidence the department might otherwise have had in Gen. Pershing's judgment upon the matter."

Notwithstanding Gen. Ansell's previous opposition to General Orders, No. 7, in the United States, having declared them an administrative palliative only, we find him criticizing Gen. Pershing's opposition to these orders, stating that the action taken was the result of most thorough consideration by the War Department, was organic in character, and required by law.

In a memorandum, dated April 8, 1918, to the Chief of Staff (Exhibit 85), Gen. Crowder discussed the question, believing that if Gen. Pershing had fully understood the purpose and operation of General Orders, No. 7, his cablegram would not have been sent. Gen. Crowder concluded his memorandum with the recommendation that a cablegram, hereafter quoted, be sent to Gen. Pershing. This was done on April 10. The cable reads as follows (Exhibits 82 and 82A):

"The order which included the establishment of a branch of the office of the Judge Advocate General in France was promulgated after the most thorough consideration on the part of the War Department. The existence of this order has already justified itself in preventing the execution of one illegal death sentence, not coming, however, from your command. The operation of the order has not delayed the administration of military justice in this country, and the establishment of the branch office in France will prevent delay in the administration of military justice in cases arising within your forces. It is believed that when its purposes and operation are thoroughly understood it will no longer be objectionable to you. Your suggestion that it may result in miscarriages of justice is not concurred in, since it is believed that it will operate to prevent miscarriages of justice by assuring that legality without which no serious sentence should ever be carried into execution. It is desired that conference be held with Gen. Kreger."

In a letter to Gen. Crowder, dated April 15, Gen. Kreger stated that he had explained to Gen. Pershing his views regarding General Orders, No. 7. (Exhibit 87.) On May 1, Gen. Kreger was appointed Acting Judge Advocate General, American Expeditionary Forces, relieving Gen. Bethel from further duty in the branch office.

6. Issuance of General Orders, No. 8, War Department, 1918.—No further objection to the operation of General Orders, No. 7, was interposed by Gen. Pershing, but another matter arose which gave the War Department no little concern. On July 11, 1918, the Acting Judge Advocate General in France forwarded to the Judge Advocate General case No. 118312, in which the convening authority refused to accept the opinion of the Acting Judge Advocate General that the record was not legally sufficient to support a conviction of desertion, and declined to follow his recommendation that appropriate action be taken in view of the illegality. (Exhibit 93.) The convening authority, on the contrary, stated to his staff judge advocate in writing: "I have read the entire proceedings and the several memoranda herewith analyzing the case, and I am satisfied that the original action was sound. Let it stand." The Acting Judge Advocate General stated that he was unable to see how the purposes of General Orders, No. 7, were to be fully accomplished if reviewing authorities were to be free to disregard the advice of his office with respect to the legality of findings and sentences. If the opinions of his office were to control, he recommended that reviewing authorities be advised to that effect. General Orders, No. 7, required that only those records of general courts-martial carrying sentences of death, dismissal, or dishonorable discharge be forwarded in the American Expeditionary Forces to the branch office for review. On July 14, 1918, Gen. Kreger, Acting Judge Advocate General, American Expeditionary Forces, wrote a letter to Gen. Crowder in which he recommended that orders be issued requiring that the records of all cases tried in the American Expeditionary Forces be transmitted to his office for review. He stated as follows (Exhibit 94.):

"Before I left Washington I understood that you expected after this branch had been established for some little time to consider the advisability of requiring it to review the records of all cases tried by general courts-martial in the American Expeditionary Forces. I have considered the matter and have discussed it with Gen. Bethel. We are agreed that it would be advisable to have all such records examined here: First, in order that illegal sentences may either not be carried into effect at all or their execution arrested at the earliest possible moment; and second, because the examination of a portion only of the cases arising in the command does not give the branch the general view of the administration of military justice that would put it in a position most effectively to aid in carrying into effect the views and policies of your office and of the War Department. It is accordingly recommended that in the near future orders be issued requiring this branch to review, before transmission to your office, the records of all cases tried here by general courts-martial. This recommendation is not to be understood as suggesting that the execution of sentences be held in abeyance pending review by this branch in any cases other than those in which General Orders No. 7 now requires such action."

Gen. Crowder had written Gen. Kreger on June 21, 1918, requesting from him an opinion on this very subject. (Exhibit 95.) Gen. Bethel, in concurring in Gen. Kreger's views, stated as follows (Exhibit 96.):

"The European branch reviews for the Judge Advocate General's Office the records in cases of the three sentences named above. (That is, death sentence, dismissal of officers, and dishonorable discharge not suspended); but all other records, sentences involving forfeiture, ordinary confinement, and dishonorable discharge, where suspended, go to the Judge Advocate General's Office in Washington for review, resulting, of course, in much delay. If such a sentence is held to be invalid, the action setting it aside for invalidity can only take effect after considerable part of it has been served, or if it is desired to reconvene the court for correction of an error it is generally impracticable to do so after so long a period. It would, therefore, in my opinion, be much better administration for the European branch to make the review of all court-martial cases."

Gen. Ansell concurred in the recommendations of Gens. Bethel and Kreger and, on August 20, 1918, made them the basis for a memorandum to the Chief of Staff, recommending an amendment of General Orders No. 7, so as to require all records of trial in the American Expeditionary Forces to be sent to the branch office for review (Exhibit 98). He went further than that in his draft of amendment submitted to the Chief of Staff. He made provision for the exercise in the American Expeditionary Forces of the selfsame appellate power which he urged so strongly in his memorandum of November 10, 1917, and which the Secretary of War, after careful consideration, disapproved. The only difference was this: Instead of the Acting Judge Advocate General exercising the power himself, the War Department directed that the convening authorities set aside all sentences, or any part thereof, found by the Acting Judge Advocate General to be invalid or void. There was no choice left to the convening authority, so that exactly the same purpose was accomplished as though the power had been exercised by the Acting Judge Advocate General. The actual draft of the amendment was as follows (Exhibit 99.):

"The records of all general courts-martial and of all military commissions originating in the said expeditionary forces will be forwarded to the said branch office for review, and it shall be the duty of the said Acting Judge Advocate General to examine and review such records, to return to the proper commanding officer for correction such as are incomplete, and to report to the proper officer any defect or irregularity which renders the finding or sentence invalid or void in whole or in part. Any sentence or any part thereof so found to be invalid or void shall be set aside, and the execution of all sentences of death, dismissal, or dishonorable discharge shall be stayed pending said review. The said Acting Judge Advocate General will forward all records in which action is complete, together with his review thereof and all proceedings thereon, to the Judge Advocate General for permanent file."

Gen. Ansell's memorandum and draft were sent to the War College, and, on September 8, 1918, were returned to the Chief of Staff by the Director, War Plans Division, General Staff, recommending approval and issuance of the order as drafted by Gen. Ansell. (Exhibit 100.) A staff memorandum, dated September 11, signed by the Chief of Staff, directed the issuance of the order as drafted. (Exhibit 101.) On September 13 a carbon copy of the original order prepared for the Public Printer was furnished the Acting Judge Advocate General. On September 17 The Adjutant General sent a requisition to the Public Printer, and on September 21 a page proof of the order was received from the Government Printing Office. (Exhibit 102.) On the draft of the general order in the files of the Judge Advocate General's Office appears the following notation: (Exhibit 99.)

"Mr Smith instructed us to substitute third indorsement, attached to 321.4 (8/29/18), instead of this draft of amendment.

"L. G. H."

The original records show a revised draft of this amendment (Exhibit 103), approved by order of the Secretary of War, signed by the executive assistant to the Chief of Staff. The date of this approval is not of record, but this draft is identical with the amendment as published in General Orders, No. 84, and differs radically from the draft originally submitted by Gen. Ansell and approved by the War Plans Division, General Staff, and by the Chief of Staff. The order as published reads as follows, new matter being underscored and rejected matter appearing in brackets (Exhibit 91):

"The records of all general courts-martial and of all military commissions originating in the said expeditionary forces will be forwarded to the said branch office for review, and it shall be the duty of the said Acting Judge Advocate General to examine and review such records, to return to the proper commanding officer for correction such as are incomplete, and to report to the proper officer any defect or irregularity which renders the finding or sentence [invalid] illegal or void in whole or in part. The execution of all sentences [of] involving death, dismissal, or dishonorable discharge shall be stayed pending [said] such review. Any sentence, or any part thereof, so found to be illegal, defective [invalid], or void, in whole or in part, shall be disapproved, modified, or set aside, in accordance with the recommendation of the Acting Judge Advocate General. The said Acting Judge Advocate General will forward all records in which action is complete, together with his review thereof and all proceedings thereon, to the Judge Advocate General of the Army for permanent file."

Paragraph IV, General Orders, No. 84, as published is radical in its provisions and gives to the Acting Judge Advocate General in France powers not possessed by the Judge Advocate General of the Army. General Orders, No. 84, came to the attention of Gen. Crowder for the first time in January, 1919.

Notwithstanding the radical changes made in the amended draft, the latter was duly approved by the executive secretary to the Chief of Staff. If, therefore, Paragraph IV, General Orders, No. 84, was issued without its provisions being fully understood and concurred in by the Chief of Staff and the Secretary of War, responsibility rests not with Gen. Ansell but with the office of the Chief of Staff.

During August, 1918, Gen. Crowder's time was fully occupied by his duties as Provost Marshal General, and he gave little or no time to his duties as Judge Advocate General. The fact remains that, at the time the order was issued, Gen. Crowder was Judge Advocate General of the Army and should have been consulted by his assistant, Gen. Ansell, in regard to a change of policy so radical as that effected by General Orders, No. 84, and known by Gen. Ansell to be contrary to the declared policy of the Judge Advocate General and the Secretary of War.

(7) Opposition of Gen. Pershing to General Orders, No. 84, War Department, 1918.—With respect to the statement of Gen. Ansell that General Orders, No. 84 are now "being opposed by the commanding general American Expeditionary Forces," the facts are as follows (Exhibit 69, p. 6):

In a letter under date of November 14, 1918, to Gen. Pershing (Exhibit 104), which was forwarded through The Adjutant General to the Judge Advocate General, it appears that Gen. Bethel opposed the principle of General Orders, No. 84, in that it took from the reviewing authority the finality of decision reposed in him by the thirty-seventh article of war. Gen. Bethel did not believe that the Acting Judge Advocate General had any authority to decide as a matter of law what shall be the effect of competent testimony, or what weight is to be given it, or to determine what competent evidence shall, and what shall not, be deemed sufficiently convincing to support a conviction. Quoting from the thirty-seventh article of war as follows:

"The proceedings of a court-martial shall not be held invalid, nor the findings or sentence disapproved, in any case on the ground of improper admission or rejection of evidence or for any error as to any matter of pleading or procedure unless in the opinion of the reviewing or confirming authority, after an examination of the entire proceedings it shall appear that the error complained of has injuriously affected the substantial rights of an accused."

Gen. Bethel stated that the above provision of law was so clear as to require no comment; that the reviewing or confirming authority is the officer authorized to approve or confirm the sentence; and that decision as to the effect of the improper admission of evidence rests with him, and can not be made by any other person.

Gen. Bethel's letter was forwarded by the Chief of Staff, American Expeditionary Forces (acting for the commander in chief), to the War Department, by indorsement, as follows:

"The remarks of the Judge Advocate, American Expeditionary Forces, in this letter are concurred in and decision is requested."

A copy of Gen. Bethel's letter was, at the same time, transmitted to Gen. Kreger, Acting Judge Advocate General, American Expeditionary Forces, so that he might submit to the Judge Advocate General his views, which he did in a letter dated November 16, the concluding paragraph of which was as follows (Exhibit 105):

"Gen. Bethel's communication, in effect, calls into question the legal validity of General Orders, 7, War Department, 1918, as amended by Section IV, General Orders, 84, War Department, 1918. In my opinion that order is well founded upon section 1199, Revised Statutes, and upon the power of the President, acting through the Secretary of War, to order a sentence to be executed only in mitigated form, or to forbid its execution entirely. However, it seems entirely unnecessary for me to discuss the validity of the order in question. That, no doubt, was fully considered by your office and by the Secretary of War before the order was issued."

There was no further opposition from either Gen. Pershing or Gen. Bethel. They acquiesced in the action of the War Department. In this connection it should be stated, however, that on March 25, 1919, Paragraph IV, General Orders, No. 84, was amended by Paragraph I, General Orders, No. 41 (Exhibit 106), so as to bring it within the law as interpreted by the Secretary of War.

8. Alleged relief of Gen. Ansell from duty in connection with the administration of military justice.—In his letter of February 17, 1919, to the Hon. John L. Burnett, House of Representatives, Gen. Ansell stated, referring to his memorandum of November 10, 1917, to the Secretary of War (Exhibit 69, p. 3):

"Thereupon I was relieved of my duties in connection with the administration of military justice, and these were taken over by the Judge Advocate General in person. Consequently, from the middle of November, 1917, to the middle of July, 1918, I was not charged with any duty or responsibility in connection with the administration of military justice, nor was I consulted either by the Secretary of War or the Judge Advocate General upon matters affecting the administration of military justice."

It will be recalled that, in his letter of November 18, 1917 (Exhibit 65), to the Secretary of War, Gen. Crowder stated that he would be able to assume his duties as active head of the Judge Advocate General's Department, and that he could devote to those duties one-half of his time. Gen. Crowder found, however, that, due to the increased demand for men under the draft, his duties as Provost Marshal General were such as to occupy the greater part of his time, and that he was not able to devote any considerable portion thereof to the Office of the Judge Advocate General. In his testimony Gen. Crowder further states that his recollection was that Gen. Ansell continued with undiminished authority in handling all matters arising in the section of military justice, and determined himself what cases would be passed up to the Judge Advocate General as needing the latter's personal attention. He recalled no instruction, either from himself or the Secretary of War, curtailing the authority or initiation which Gen. Ansell had previously exercised as senior officer in the office.

Col. E. G. Davis, Chief of the Military Justice Division, testified before the Senate Committee on Military Affairs (p. 204, Hearings before the Committee on Military Affairs) that Gen. Ansell's statement that he was relieved from responsibility in connection with the administration of military justice was not correct, for the reason that all cases connected therewith continued to pass through Gen. Ansell's hands. The latter signed many of them himself as Acting Judge Advocate General and actually exercised the discretion of deciding what, if any, cases were to go to Gen. Crowder for his action. Col. Davis further stated that Gen. Ansell exercised final authority in all such cases from November to April, except where he did not wish to take the responsibility of determining a particular case himself. He had the discretion in every instance to determine whether a case was to be disposed of finally by himself or whether it should go to Gen. Crowder. Col. Davis, testifying before the Inspector General, said:

"As I said before, every court-martial case that left my desk for higher action went to Gen. Ansell. * * * The only exception that could possibly exist to the statements I have made is this: That during the period when we were working in the office over the establishment of General Orders No. 7 and formulating the rules for carrying it into effect I frequently consulted directly with Gen. Crowder, and frequently placed the result of investigations I had made on Gen. Crowder's desk. These did not go through Gen. Ansell's hands, for the reason that he was entirely out of sympathy with what we were trying to do and Gen. Crowder had directed us to make the investigation, and we felt this had nothing to do with Gen. Ansell's position in the office and we did not consult Gen. Ansell about anything we did in connection with that order, in getting it established or the rules for getting it into effect. But as to actual action on cases, no case went to Gen. Crowder that did not first pass through Gen. Ansell. There were certain cases in which I assumed the right to act; for instance, when I found that a court-martial record was incomplete; that the record did not show that the judge advocate had been sworn, etc., I exercised the authority of sending it to the reviewing authority for correction; but all matters where correction action was taken or where clemency was recommended, or where anything of that larger nature was involved, those matters passed through Gen. Ansell to Gen. Crowder, according to office memorandum." (Exhibit 20, p. 11.)

Col. Davis further states (Exhibit 20, p. 4), referring to Gen. Ansell's statement that, from some time in November until the time he left for France, about the middle of April, he had nothing to do in connection with the administration of military justice and that the proceedings did not come over his desk, "that statement is not correct * * * As a matter of fact, Gen. Ansell was the senior assistant in the office of the Judge Advocate General but, in this capacity, he signed possibly 50 to 75 per cent of all papers signed in the office, and signed as Acting Judge Advocate General, even though Gen. Crowder was present and at the head of the office."

Col. A. E. Clark, Judge Advocate General's Department, on duty at that time as assistant to Col. Davis, and for a portion of the time during the absence of Col. Davis, Acting Chief of Military Justice Division, states (Exhibit 24, p. 8):

"When I was acting head of the section for a short time in March, I followed the practice of signing these opinions, returning the records in accordance with the practice that Col. Davis had established. Everything was routed over Gen. Ansell's desk except the opinion returning records under General Orders, No. 7. Everything that went up to higher authority, to The Adjutant General, the Chief of Staff, the President, or the Secretary of War, was routed through him and over his desk."

Maj. William H. Keith, chief clerk in the Judge Advocate General's Office until September, 1918, in his testimony to the Inspector General confirms the statement that, during the period November, 1917, to April, 1918 papers intended for the action of higher authority passed over Gen. Ansell's desk. (Exhibit 23.)

On April 10, 1918, a memorandum, subject "Office Organization," was issued by the Judge Advocate General's Office. After prescribing the duties of the various divisions, there appears the following (Exhibit 107):

"Upon receipt of papers in the Chief Clerk's office they are stamped, numbered, precedents attached and charged to the officer handling them. When completed they are returned to the chief clerk, where the charge against the officer is removed, thus showing the time the officer had them; then they are passed to Col. Mayes, to Gen. Ansell, and to Gen. Crowder. After approval they are sent out either by mail or in jackets by messenger."

In the testimony of Maj. Keith, former chief clerk, and Mr. J. S. Lyon, clerk in charge of the court-martial section of the Judge Advocate General's Office, it appears that this memorandum represented not new rules of procedure for the office but rather a confirmation of the established rules. (Exhibits 23 and 29.)

Col. J. J. Mayes, who was Gen. Ansell's assistant up to the time the latter departed for France in April, 1918, and who succeeded Gen. Ansell as senior assistant in the office, testified (Exhibit 30) that all cases arising under General Orders No. 7, with some exceptions, there being some that were sent through Gen. Ansell's and Col. Mayes's desks, were acted upon by the Disciplinary Division. He stated that all cases requiring the action of the President were passed over their desks, although there may have been some exceptions to that rule. When Col. Mayes became senior assistant he gave instructions that all matters (including those arising under General Orders No. 7) pertaining to the Disciplinary Division should pass over his desk. When asked if there was any reason to believe that the same result could not have been accomplished if Gen. Ansell had so desired, he replied, "No, I don't know of any reason. In fact, I don't know how the other system grew up. I felt that if I would be charged with the responsibility of the office I should know what went out of it, therefore, I permitted nothing to go out expressing the opinion of the office except over my signature, or in important cases Gen. Crowder's signature." He stated that Gen. Crowder had made no objection to the instructions that he had issued, and, moreover, Gen. Crowder was at the time occupied at the Provost Marshal General's Office so that he did not have very much time to be at the Judge Advocate General's Office.

The Judge Advocate General furnished the Inspector General a list of memoranda prepared in that office, containing reviews of court-martial cases during the period November 17, 1917, to April 10, 1918, giving in each instance the name of the officer preparing the memorandum and that of the officer approving the same. (Exhibit 108.) Many signed by Gen. Ansell as Acting Judge Advocate General contain recommendations to the Secretary of War or to The Adjutant General relative to mitigation, remission, approval and disapproval of sentences and declaring null and void proceedings. Fifty-three memoranda contain the signature of Gen. Crowder during the period stated as against 130 bearing the signature of Gen. Ansell. In addition to the papers above referred to, voluminous correspondence from the files of the Judge Advocate General's Office was furnished this office. These papers include memoranda on court-martial cases, letters and indorsements, all relating to the administration of military justice. Forty per cent show the signature of Gen. Crowder, 35 per cent that of Gen. Ansell, and 25 per cent of various other officers in the department.

When, in July, 1918, Gen. Ansell returned from his trip abroad, he automatically reverted to his former duties as senior assistant, and without orders of any kind proceeded to reorganize the office, created boards of review (Exhibit 109) and ordered them "to break away from the office interpretation" of General Orders, No. 7. He proceeded to perform those very duties from which, during the period November to April, according to his statement he was relieved. (Exhibit 70.)

From the records and from all obtainable evidence, it appears that Gen. Ansell's statement that, from November, 1917, to April, 1918, he had nothing to do with the administration of military justice and that the proceedings did not come over his desk, is not in accord with the facts. On the contrary, it appears that his initiative and authority as senior assistant remained undisturbed and that he was in no degree hampered in any changes which, within the law, he desired to make.

9. Four cases arising in France wherein sentences of death were imposed.—In his letter to Representative Burnett, dated February 17, 1919, Gen. Ansell, in conclusion and more particularly by way of reply to Representative Burnett's statement, "Why did he (Gen. Ansell) not appeal to Gen. Crowder? Why did he not appeal to the President to vindicate him? Why did he go on here until he was called before a committee of the Senate to do it?" stated (Exhibit 69, p. 6):

"You seem to think that under these circumstances I should have gone directly to the President. Upon a little reflection you will appreciate, I am sure, the impossibility of such course. I think, however, that, resting under the charge which you have made against me, I am justified in saying this, that on one occasion I well remember—and doubtless there are others—when four sentences of death were pending in the department for confirmation, and when this office had recommended execution, I went to the head of the office and orally presented to him my views in opposition. I then filed with him a memorandum in which I did my best to show what seemed to me to be obvious, that these men had been most unfairly tried, had not been tried at all, and ought not to die or suffer any other punishment upon such records. Discovering that these memoranda had not been presented to the Secretary of War, and feeling justified by the fact that I had no other forum in this department, I gave a copy of the memorandum to a distinguished member of the Judiciary Committee of the House, and was told by him that he could present the cases to the President himself.

"I was compelled to do this—an act inconsistent with strict military propriety—by the dictates of my own conscience, by my desire to serve justice, and by my sense of duty to my God and those unprotected men that their lives might be spared."

These cases have been frequently referred to in the public press. The facts as shown by the official records and the testimony follow:

On or about February 27, 1918, records were received in the office of the Judge Advocate General in cases Nos. 110751-2-3-4, tried in France, in which the death penalty was imposed. Two men were tried for sleeping on post, and two for disobedience of orders. Upon receipt of these records, they were reviewed by Maj. Rand, of the Division of Military Justice. He wrote a review on each case, stating that the proceedings were regular, the verdict sustained by the evidence, and recommending that the sentences be carried into effect. The records, with the reviews, then went to the desk of Col. Davis, chief of the Division of Military Justice, and from his desk to the office of Gen. Ansell and his assistant, Col. Mayes. The exact date the reviews reached Gen. Ansell's office is not known. In forwarding the records of trial, Gen. Pershing, in a letter to the Judge Advocate General, urged the execution of the sentences as absolutely necessary for the safety and success of the Army in France. (Exhibit 114.) Maj. Rand incorporated in but one of the reviews the text of Gen. Pershing's letter. In the other three this letter was simply referred to. The reviews were returned from the office of Gen. Ansell, through Col. Davis, to Maj. Rand, with the suggestion that Gen. Pershing's recommendation be incorporated in all four. They were accordingly rewritten and returned, through Col. Davis, to Gen. Ansell's office. Col. Mayes approved the reviews, concurring in the recommendation that the death penalty be executed in each case, and the papers for the first time reached the Judge Advocate General without either oral or written dissent from anyone. The usual rule of the office, as testified to by Col. Davis, was that any paper that passed Gen. Ansell and reached Gen. Crowder's desk had met with Gen. Ansell's approval, unless the opposing view was indicated in a memorandum or verbally communicated. Whether, up to this time, Gen. Ansell had seen the papers is not known.

Gen. Crowder, not being satisfied with the review by Maj. Rand, called upon Col. Clark for an independent examination of all four cases and the preparation of a review of each of them, indicating also the necessity for a study of other similar cases from the American Expeditionary Forces.

On March 29 there was prepared in the Office of the Judge Advocate General a four-page memorandum summarizing for the Secretary of War the very numerous letters and petitions which had been received urging clemency. (Exhibit 115.)

The next step was the submission by Col. Clark of his reviews. Two bear date of March 29 (Exhibits 116 and 117) and two of April 4 (Exhibits 118 and 119). Gen. Ansell was not in Washington when these reviews were submitted to Gen. Crowder. He was absent from the office from on or about April 1 until on or about April 6. (Exhibit 133.) Col. Clark's reviews stated the facts of each case much more in detail than anything that had been submitted before. They were without formal recommendation, and on April 5 were submitted by Gen. Crowder to the Chief of Staff, accompanied by a memorandum of that date, which reads in part as follows:

"You will notice that I have not finished the reviews by embodying definite recommendation.

"It would be unfortunate, indeed, if the War Department did not have one mind about these cases. There is no question that the records are legally sufficient to sustain the findings and sentence. There is a very large question in my mind as to whether clemency should be extended."

The memorandum concluded with the request for an interview. Gen. Crowder, immediately upon his return to the office of the Judge Advocate General, asked Col. Clarke to "search the records of The Adjutant General's Office and ascertain some facts outside the records which might weigh in the final disposition of the case." As the result of the work so undertaken, Col. Clark, on April 10, submitted another memorandum (Exhibit 121), which was the first formal and definite statement of reasoned and forceful opposition to the imposition of a death penalty made by any of Gen. Crowder's subordinates. The circumstances of the four cases were again referred to. The youth of all the accused was emphasized, and several other cases, more or less parallel both as to time and nature, were cited to show that not only other courts but the same court had either acquitted or, upon conviction, had imposed much lighter sentences. For example, it was stated that the same court acquitted two other soldiers of the same regiment who were tried within a few days of those under consideration, and for the same offense, viz, sleeping on post. In these acquittals the evidence came in part from the same witnesses whose testimony convicted two of the men condemned to death.

On or about April 10, the date of Col. Clarke's memorandum, Gen. Crowder expressed to Gen. Ansell his anxiety with respect to these four cases and requested that he, after a thorough study, submit his views. The evidence is conclusive that prior to this date no word in opposition to the execution of the sentences of death in these cases, either verbal or written, was voiced by Gen. Ansell.

Gen. Ansell's views were evidently first expressed orally to Gen. Crowder shortly before April 15. Of this there can be no doubt, for on that date Gen. Ansell submitted a written memorandum based on "reading these records," referring to an oral statement of his reasons "the other day" and stating that those reasons were produced in writing "at the request of Gen. Crowder." (Exhibit 122.) He then proceeded to consider the cases briefly and strongly opposed confirmation. On April 16, the day after the receipt of Gen. Ansell's memorandum, for which apparently he was waiting, Gen. Crowder submitted another and final memorandum to the Chief of Staff. (Exhibit 123.) He set forth therein the data gathered by Col. Clark concerning the four cases in hand and the other similar cases already referred to, and restated the substance of the arguments advanced by Col. Clark and Gen. Ansell against the execution of the sentences. He called attention to the fact that not one of the accused made any fight for his life, and said: "I regret exceedingly that in each case the accused was allowed to make a plea of guilty. As counsel I should have strongly advised that they plead not guilty and required the Government to maintain its case at every point." He closed this memorandum by referring to Gen. Pershing's urgent request for a confirmation of the sentences and called attention to the propriety of bearing in mind "the fact that Gen. Pershing was not functioning as a reviewing officer with any official relation to the prosecution but as commanding general, anxious to maintain the discipline of his command."

On the next day, April 17, the Chief of Staff submitted the record thus made to the Secretary of War, recommending the confirmation and execution of the sentences. (Exhibit 124.) On May 1 the Secretary of War submitted the whole matter to the President, with a lengthy letter (Exhibit 125) strongly recommending the pardon of the two soldiers convicted of sleeping on post and the remission to confinement for three years of the sentences of the two convicted of disobeying orders. The relationship of this final act of the Secretary of War to the preceding action in the office of the Judge Advocate General, and as an effect thereof, is clear from the documents themselves. The Secretary of War pointed out that the Judge Advocate General had limited his concurrence "to the technical correctness of the proceedings," and that, in a subsequent memorandum, he had called the attention of the Chief of Staff to the other cases already referred to. The final memorandum of the Judge Advocate General of April 16 (Exhibit 123) is quoted and repeatedly referred to, and what was suggested by that officer is by the Secretary of War argued to the President as conclusive against both the justice and expediency of confirming the sentences.

On May 4 the President expressed in writing (Exhibit 126) his entire agreement with the Secretary of War, and made mention of the latter's "very full and convincing letter," and pardoned, unconditionally, the two soldiers convicted of sleeping on post (Exhibits 127 and 128) and commuted the sentences of the two convicted of disobedience of orders to confinement for three years. (Exhibits 129 and 130.)

In Col. Davis's testimony before the Inspector General he made the following positive and unequivocal statement (Exhibit 20, p. 16):

"The next time I had any conversation with either of them about this matter was along about the 10th of April, 1918. I was in Gen. Ansell's room for some other purpose and he came out of Gen. Crowder's room and sat down at his desk and said to me, in words about as follows: 'What in the hell is the matter with Gen. Crowder about those death cases?' I explained to him that he had Col. Clark at work reviewing these cases, and he seemed very anxious to be sure of his ground before making definite recommendations, and that Col. Clark had come to the conclusion that the sentences ought not to be executed. To this Gen. Ansell replied that he did not agree with Col. Clark; that he thought the sentences ought to be executed, and he further stated that Gen. Crowder had directed him to make a review of the cases himself. Those two events stand very clear in my mind, and there is no possible confusion between them."

Col. Clark, the officer who first stated the conviction that the death sentences should not be carried into effect, and who, by direction of Gen. Crowder, expressed his views in the form of a memorandum, testified in part as follows (Exhibit 24, pp. 7 and 8):

"I had talked with Col. Mayes and Gen. Ansell and had taken occasion, although the cases were not then in my hands for review, to express the settled conviction that it would be a great mistake and an injustice to carry these sentences into effect. At that time these officers did not agree with me but were of the opinion that the views of Gen. Pershing with respect to the propriety and the expediency of carrying these sentences into effect should be followed. While these cases were under consideration in the office, and before the records came to me from Gen. Crowder for review, as I have just stated, I discussed them with Gen. Ansell and other officers on more than one occasion, and Gen. Ansell had stated to me, during those discussions, that he thought the sentences should be carried into effect. * * *

"Some time after the records in the death cases from France came to me from Gen. Crowder for further study, Col. Davis informed me of a conversation which he had just had; I mean by that a conversation he had shortly before he spoke to me about it. Col. Davis stated in substance that Gen. Ansell had used some profanely forcible language in connection with these cases. I would not undertake to give the language of the conversation but my recollection of its effect or substance is that he objected to or resented the fact that the sentences were not being promptly carried into effect in accordance with the recommendations contained in Maj. Rand's reviews, instead of which they had been returned to me for further study and report by Gen. Crowder."

In this connection Col. Mayes states (Exhibit 30, p. 5):

"Gen. Ansell was not there when those reviews came in and I passed those records to Gen. Crowder concurring in the reviews. The reviews, I think, recommended the execution of the death penalty. I concurred in that view. Then, when Gen. Ansell came back, Gen. Crowder asked him to review it. Gen. Ansell read the reviews and did not concur. * * * Gen. Ansell and I were in the same office and when these cases were turned over to him to read, he immediately took the view that he afterwards maintained. I do not believe that there was any change in his views. That idea may have grown up from the fact that they were sent to Gen. Crowder by me, concurring in the imposition of those death sentences. Ansell and I differed on those cases and I am sure that Ansell was not here when they were passed to Gen. Crowder. * * * I have held to the view that where a soldier was found sleeping on sentry duty in the front line he should receive the most severe penalty authorized for that offense, which is death unless there was some very mitigating explanation of his conduct. I have held to this view because a sentinel in such position holds the lives of his comrades in his hands. Having stated my opinions I will say that I do not remember of Gen. Ansell ever disagreeing from that view. His disagreement on the four cases from France was upon the sufficiency of those cases and not upon the principle. I can not say that Gen. Ansell ever said anything to me about this, but it is very probable, in fact extremely probable, that we have discussed the abstract proposition as I have outlined above."

"Q. Was Gen. Ansell in the habit of expressing his views on subjects generally, freely, and forcibly?—A. He was."

Mr. Earle L. Brown, Gen. Ansell's stenographer, testified as follows (Exhibit 31):

"You ask me if I can recall any discussion on the four death cases in France. I can't recall any definite discussion. I do think, though, that when those cases were first discussed that Gen. Ansell, before reviewing the cases at all, had really expressed himself that the conviction ought to be sustained, but I know that after he reviewed the cases and found the circumstances of them, or rather when the circumstances showed those men had, as I recall it, been exposed to so much fatigue and long duty, that on that ground his opinion was altered. I can't say anything definite, but that is my impression."

The question as to whether or not, prior to April 10, 1918, Gen. Ansell entertained, and on that date affirmatively expressed, the views that the death penalty in these specific cases should be executed is not definitely determined by the evidence.

The question of veracity raised by the conflicting testimony is, in my belief, apparent rather than real. Considering the length of time which has elapsed, the fallibility of memory, and considering the circumstances as a whole, it appears reasonable and is believed that, prior to April 10, no special attention had been given to these cases by Gen. Ansell. On general principles he entertained the views that any man found asleep on sentry duty in the presence of an active enemy should be executed. He doubtless expressed those views, and they were interpreted as referring to these specific cases.

So far as revealed by the evidence, Gen. Ansell made no attempt to interview the Chief of Staff or the Secretary of War or the President in regard to these cases. Careful search and inquiry have failed to discover evidence that his memorandum was brought to the attention of the President or the Secretary of War by a Member of Congress. The above facts, stripped of all elements of uncertainty, lead to the conviction that Gen. Ansell's statements, as to his attitude and activities in connection with the cases above considered, are misleading and widely variant from the facts.

10. Report of Gen. Ansell on his trip abroad.—In his letter of February 17, 1919, to Representative Burnett, Gen. Ansell says (Exhibit 69, p. 5):

"Returning from Europe in the middle of July, whither I had gone the April before for the purpose of studying the military administration of our allies, I filed with the Judge Advocate General a report which among other things, treated especially of the administration of military justice in France, Italy, and England, and which indicated those elements of their systems which I believed to be better than our own, and suggested our own weaknesses. This report never reached the Secretary of War."

On April 17, 1918, Gen. Ansell was directed to proceed not later than April 20 to France and such other countries in Europe as might be necessary for the purpose of observing the principles and practices of the war laws and administration of the allied countries, in accordance with directions previously given the Judge Advocate General. He was directed to report his observations in writing to the Judge Advocate General of the Army. (Exhibits 134 and 134A.)

Gen. Ansell proceeded to Europe, in compliance with said orders, and his report, prepared at sea, bears date of July 8, 1918. (Exhibit 135.) He visited the armies in the field and the capitals of France, Italy, and England. That his studies were assiduous and thorough-going is apparent from his report. He obtained his data first hand. To a large extent they were drawn direct from the war offices of the Allies. The report is without recommendations as such. It covers war administration generally, with particular attention to military justice. The French systems are gone into in considerable detail. Those of the British are dealt with to a lesser degree. The consideration of the Italian methods is limited to those of the "Bureau of Military Justice."

In dealing with our problems in France, Gen. Ansell points out the difficulty of maintaining on French soil and amid French people an army of upward of a million Americans under American Government. He deals at length with the application to them, in many of their activities, of the French civil law. By way of illustration, he cites the levying of a tax by certain municipalities upon the food taken into them for the use of American soldiers.

The most important feature of his report, so far as it concerns France, is its explanation of the very broad theory there applied of the legal liability of the Government to its citizens. The French theory is much more liberal than ours. In France, according to Gen. Ansell, there is practically no limit to the extent to which the Government must answer to a citizen for loss sustained by him from Government activities.

He then raises the query as to whether the liability of the United States to French citizens, growing out of the presence of our Army, is to be determined under French or American law, and urges that steps be taken to gather and record the facts (contemporaneously with their occurrence), with a view to forehanded preparation against unjust claims, and excessive damages for just ones.

The foregoing indicates, sufficiently for present purposes, the nature and comprehensive character of the report. Notwithstanding that it is the result of three months' effort of a general officer, it has, thus far, served no useful purpose. At least, it does not appear that it has ever received the studious attention, or any particular attention, of higher authority.

So far as the records indicate, the history of the report is as follows:

It was submitted to Gen. Crowder, according to Gen. Ansell, in July, 1918. Gen. Crowder's testimony concerning it is as follows (Exhibit 10, p. 11):

"Q. Gen. Ansell states, referring to the report which he made upon his return from Europe, 'This report never reached the Secretary of War.'—A. That statement, as I recollect, first came to my knowledge reading the Congressional Record of recent date, and I think in a letter addressed by Gen. Ansell to Mr. Burnett. I came to the office and asked for the report, as I did not remember to have ever seen it. It is true that, upon his return, Gen. Ansell came to my office and submitted a document which contained a number of observations which he had made, explaining that it was more or less a personal document which he thought I would be interested in. I read it over and it is the one that has been used a lot in public addresses, but he never brought in his official report and I did not see any official report until I instituted this search after noticing the Congressional Record. I called upon the executive officer to get me the report. He brought a carbon copy. I asked him where was the original. He said he did not find it on file. Later he came to me with the original and said it was on Gen. Ansell's desk. It was addressed to me, as I remember not to the Secretary of War. I do not remember to have ever seen that report and know he never personally submitted it as he did the informal report. It is true that up to that time it had never been forwarded to the Secretary of War."

The original report bears no date of receipt to indicate that it ever reached the files of the Judge Advocate General's Office. The carbon copy has the following notation: "J. A. G. O. Jan. 8, 1919, 319.1 Personal Reports." That there was a supplemental report is established by the testimony of Mr. Brown, Gen. Ansell's stenographer. (Exhibit 31, p. 2.) It appears that this supplemental report is not of record in the Judge Advocate General's Office or elsewhere.

In the absence of any specific statement from Gen. Ansell, it is difficult to fix, definitely, the responsibility for the nonpresentation of his report to the Secretary of War. It seems safe to say that he himself took no affirmative steps to insure its transmittal to higher authority. It is also clear that Gen. Crowder was remiss. He was Judge Advocate General, to whom the Secretary of War directed that Gen. Ansell's report be submitted. If, as Gen. Crowder suggests, no formal report was ever submitted to him by Gen. Ansell, that officer should have been ordered to prepare and submit a proper report. If the report was prepared and submitted to Gen. Crowder, it was his duty to forward it to the Secretary of War, with his own appropriate comment thereon. In whatever light the matter is viewed, responsibility rests with both Gen. Crowder and Gen. Ansell.

11. Amendment to 50th Article of War.—Another matter having a direct bearing on the administration of military justice, rather a difference of opinion between the War Department and the Judge Advocate General's Office than between Gen. Crowder and Gen. Ansell (the former having had, so far as the records indicate, no connection with the subject matter), was the amendment to the 50th Article of War. On July 27, 1918, Gen. Pershing cabled the War Department as follows (Exhibit 142):

"It is highly desirable, in the interests of justice and the speedy administration of the same, that I be authorized to commute both the sentences which I am authorized to confirm and those which must be forwarded to the President for confirmation. I recommend proper legislation to that end."

The thought originated with Gen. Bethel, for, in writing to Gen. Crowder under date of June 24, 1918 (Exhibit 143), he concluded by saying that there have been a number of death sentences recently requiring the confirmation of the President, but the cases were not of such a character as to justify execution of the sentences. In view of the time necessary for the cases to reach Washington they were sent back to the courts for imposition of a milder sentence. Gen. Bethel stated that it would greatly facilitate the administration of military justice if Gen. Pershing had the power to commute death sentences, not only in the cases where he had authority to confirm them, but also in those cases requiring the President's confirmation. He stated that Army commanders in the field should also have the power to commute sentences of dismissal of an officer.

A copy of Gen. Pershing's cablegram was referred to the Acting Judge Advocate General for recommendation. Gen. Ansell expressed his views in a memorandum bearing date of September 5, 1918. (Exhibit 144.) He opposed the suggested amendment, saying in part:

"Commutation, unlike mitigation and remission, * * * is a pardon granted on a condition subsequent that the offender undergo a punishment of a different nature. As such it involves the pardoning power of the President. * * *

"The existing statute * * * deals with fundamental principles which do not undergo modification with every change of circumstances; it is old, has stood for a long time substantially unmodified, and in the absence of a considerable showing of its lack of wisdom or workability, is entitled to deference * * *. It should be changed * * * only upon thorough consideration and in the light of conclusive experience. * * *

"The power here sought concededly involves and derogates from the power established solely in the Commander in Chief of the Army. * * * Inasmuch as I have no evidence of the necessity or advisability for such enlargement of the powers of the commanding general in question, and because of the other considerations heretofore mentioned, for the present at least, I can not concur in the request."

He concluded the memorandum by remarking that, while he was not called upon to draft the proposed legislation, he would take the liberty to suggest the advisability of so drafting it as to confer this power upon such commanding generals in the field as the President might himself designate.

The papers were forwarded to the War College, and, on September 19, 1918, Col. E. G. Davis, formerly Chief of the Military Justice Division of the Judge Advocate General's Office, prepared a memorandum (Exhibit 145) expressing the opinion that no sound reason could be advanced why an officer, who was given power to approve and carry into effect a sentence of death or of dismissal of an officer without reference to higher authority, should not be given the lesser power of commuting such a sentence to one of lower degree, nor could any good reason be assigned why he should not directly exercise the power of mitigation without reference to the President, in those cases requiring the latter's confirmation. He invited attention to the fact that the fiftieth article of war speaks of the "mitigation" or "remission" of sentences of death or of dismissal of officers, and stated that, as mitigation of either of these sentences requires a substitution of some other and distinct form of punishment, mitigation in such a case becomes the "commutation" discussed in the opinion of the Judge Advocate General.

The Director, War Plans Division, in forwarding the papers to the War Department (Exhibit 145), stated that his division was of the opinion that the recommendations of Gen. Pershing could be complied with and that the inconsistencies in the present Articles of War could be remedied by amending the fiftieth article. The proposed change in the fiftieth article of war was set forth, the substance of which is found in the following paragraph of the amended article:

"When empowered by the President so to do, the commanding general of the Army in the field or the commanding general of the territorial department or division, may mitigate or remit, and order executed as mitigated or remitted, any sentence which, under these articles, requires the confirmation of the President, before the same may be executed."

It will be observed that, although Gen. Ansell opposed the amendment, his suggestion that, if it were to become a law, the conferring of power not only upon the commanding general American Expeditionary Forces, but upon such other generals in the field as the President might himself designate, was adopted. On September 19 (Exhibit 146) the Acting Secretary of War transmitted the draft of the bill to Congress and the same became a law on February 28, 1919. (Exhibit 147.)

12. Establishment of clemency board.—In his letter of March 8, 1919, to the Secretary of War, Gen. Crowder states (Exhibit 136, p. 6):

"As you were aware, shortly after my resumption of full charge of the office of the Judge Advocate General, I recommended the convening of a board of clemency to undertake with the greatest expedition the adjustment of war-time punishments to peace-time standards."

The facts are these:

On January 11, 1919, by a memorandum (Exhibit 138) to the Secretary of War, Gen. Ansell invited his attention to eight cases, seven from Camp Dix and one from Camp Grant, wherein grossly excessive penalties had been imposed. No additional machinery was suggested for the reviewing and correction of excessive sentences. The memorandum is without recommendation. The introductory paragraph concluded, however, with the statement that, while he was inviting the attention of convening authorities to the great severity of the punishment in those cases in which the punishment appeared to be so disproportionate to the offense as to shock the conscience, yet he did not regard that such an administrative course taken in specific instances was sufficient to achieve and establish military justice. He concluded his memorandum as follows:

"Again I have to advise you that these are not, in my judgment, isolated examples but are evidence of more general deficiencies in the administration of military justice which I have observed; at least, I believe I have observed, during this war."

Gen. Ansell's memorandum of January 11, 1919, was, by the Secretary of War, transmitted to Gen. Crowder on January 13, accompanied by a letter wherein it was stated (Exhibit 139):

"It would seem entirely clear that there ought to be some general plan for reviewing and modifying sentences of the kind illustrated by him (Gen. Ansell) which have been imposed during the war, and are characterized by severity which would not be the case in time of peace."

This suggestion of the Secretary of War was the first one looking toward action concerning cases already finally passed upon, and must, therefore, be accepted as having initiated the Clemency Board as it is now functioning.

Acting upon the suggestion of the Secretary of War, Gen. Crowder, on January 28, published an office memorandum (Exhibit 141). He referred first to the instructions which had been proposed by him and which were published on January 22 (Exhibit 140), the effect of which was to put into operation the Executive order of December 15, 1915, establishing maxima for sentences of courts-martial. He then proceeded with the language establishing the Board of Clemency. That action was expressly stated to be in compliance "with the directions of the Secretary of War for a review of sentences imposed for offenses committed during the war period, with a view not only to equalizing punishment, but to adjust that punishment to present disciplinary requirements." The purpose of the board was thus expressed:

"To undertake the work outlined by the Secretary of War and the submission of recommendations for clemency in order to accomplish the equalization of punishments and the adjustment of penalties to the present disciplinary requirements desired by him."

Gen. Ansell does not claim that he originated the idea, but that the basis for the plan was his memorandum, dated January 11, 1919. That is true. The Secretary of War, however, himself made the initial suggestion, and the order creating the board followed the lines laid down by him.

II. THE ADMINISTRATION OF MILITARY JUSTICE AND THE MACHINERY ORGANIZED IN THE JUDGE ADVOCATE GENERAL'S OFFICE TO FURTHER THE SAME.

A study has been made of the functioning of the Judge Advocate General's Department during the present war. The machinery provided in the office of the Judge Advocate General in Washington for the review of general court-martial cases forwarded there by law was examined. Fifteen hundred records of trial were scrutinized, not with an idea of reviewing the evidence—a function not pertaining to this office—but for the purpose of regarding the composition of the court, the kind of counsel provided the accused, the exercise of the right of challenge, the pleas, findings, and sentences, the action of the various reviewing authorities, and, finally, the action of the Judge Advocate General and the Secretary of War. The time required for the records of trial after final action by the reviewing authority to reach the office of the Judge Advocate General was recorded in each case. Three different periods were chosen and 500 successive cases were selected from each period. These cases represented nine departments, including Panama, Hawaii, and the Philippine Islands; 38 divisions, some in the United States and others in France; and also 2 disciplinary barracks and 15 other miscellaneous general court-martial jurisdictions. It is believed that these are representative of the twenty thousand-odd cases tried during the war.

An effort has been made to ascertain the cause of recent criticism, some of it unquestionably just, as will hereinafter be indicated, of the system of military jurisprudence, which has existed for more than a century. Our military code enacted by Congress in the early Revolutionary days came to us almost intact from the British articles of war, and although restated in the Revised Statutes of 1874, when certain amendments and additions enacted during the Seminole War, the War of 1812, and the Civil War were incorporated, underwent no substantial change until 1916, when, after the unsuccessful attempts of the present Judge Advocate General, covering a period of five years, to bring about a recodification, Congress finally reenacted the American articles into their present form. Before the war an Executive order prescribed the peace-time limits of punishment which could be imposed by court-martial, and, in addition, an intimate knowledge of military law was a prerequisite to graduation from the Military Academy and to advancement through the lower commissioned grades in the Army. With these two safeguards, the legal rights of the accused were protected, and he received substantial justice. If fault was found with the present system, certainly no criticism was offered. With the raising over night of an army of several million men, the drawing of officers from every walk of life, their training undertaken in three months, their knowledge of military law based upon a hasty perusal of the Manual for Courts-Martial, with all Regular officers promoted to the field grades, and the courts composed entirely or preponderantly of captains or lieutenants, with these same officers acting as judge advocates and counsel for the defense, and especially with the Presidential check on limits of punishment removed, it is not surprising that if the system was subject to abuses the latter should at this time become apparent. To what extent these abuses existed and to what extent higher authority failed to check or eradicate them has been made the subject of special inquiry. The trial of the accused, from the preferring of charges until final action on his case, will therefore be considered in light of the facts developed by this investigation.

The accused can be tried only on charges preferred by a commissioned officer. These charges are referred to the officer exercising summary court-martial jurisdiction, usually the regimental or, in a small command, the post or camp commander, who is required by paragraph 76, Manual for Courts-Martial, either to investigate them himself or refer them to a disinterested officer for that purpose. This officer is usually one of experience, who, after an examination of the witnesses, including the accused, if the latter waives his constitutional right to refuse to testify, states whether in his opinion there is sufficient evidence to warrant the reference of the case for trial. The commanding officer, in forwarding a case to the reviewing authority, must forward the statement of testimony and report as follows: (a) The name of the officer who investigated the charges; (b) the opinion of both such officer and himself as to whether the several charges can be sustained; (c) the substance of such material statement, if any, as the accused may have voluntarily made in connection with the case during the investigation thereof; (d) a summary of the extenuating circumstances, if any, connected with the case; (e) his recommendation of action to be taken.

Criticism has been offered that charges are not thoroughly investigated prior to their being forwarded to the convening authority. The critics certainly can have no direct knowledge of this fact, except such as may be gained from an examination of the results of courts-martial. The records of the 1,500 cases examined, of which 82 were those of officers and 1,418 were those of enlisted men, indicate 164 acquittals. Of the 82 officers tried, 14 (17+ per cent) were acquitted. Of the 1,418 cases of enlisted men tried, 151 (10+ per cent) were acquitted. These percentages are not so large as to form a basis for general criticism. As hereinafter shown, abuse has existed in isolated cases, due to failure on the part of the responsible officers to carry out the plain provisions of the Manual for Courts-Martial.

The charges, upon reaching the convening authority, are referred to the staff judge advocate, whose duty it is to determine if the facts presented warrant reference of the case for trial. It is safe to say that it very rarely happens, if ever, that the convening authority sees or examines the charges before their reference for trial. The staff judge advocate is a lawyer, of not less than the rank of major, carefully selected by the Judge Advocate General of the Army for the very duty of impartially examining the evidence to determine if a prima-facie case has been presented. Many of these officers have had years of experience at the bar in civil practice. The charges, if warranting trial by general court-martial, are forwarded directly to the trial judge advocate. This is usually an officer of the line not above the grade of captain. He is supposed to be the legal adviser to the court and to safeguard the rights of the accused. Before the war, there were but few officers who were not competent, as a result of their education in military law, to perform this important duty. Since the war, unless the trial judge advocate was a lawyer in civil practice, he was manifestly unfit to undertake this duty. It was practically impossible for any captain or lieutenant to acquire, in the short time at his disposal, sufficient knowledge of military law to act in any legal capacity.

The 1,500 cases examined indicate that the following officers acted as trial judge advocate:

	Officers' trials.	Trials of enlisted men.
Colonels.....		1
Majors.....	18	71
Captains.....	36	515
First lieutenants.....	18	522
Second lieutenants.....	10	245

The following acted as assistant trial judge advocate:

	Officers' trials.	Trials of enlisted men.
Captains.....	9	24
First lieutenants.....	13	17
Second lieutenants.....	11	312

The accused is very rarely without a commissioned officer as counsel. He is supplied one, unless he states to the court that he does not desire counsel. The record must affirmatively show that he was offered counsel and declined. Counsel for the accused is not a detail sought by officers, is not a pleasant duty, and is usually performed by roster. It is believed that, as a rule, the officers detailed serve the accused to the best of their ability, but their incapacity, since the outbreak of the war, judging by their rank, has been apparent, except in those cases where the counsel assigned was a lawyer in civil practice prior to his entrance into the Army. The cases examined by this office reveal the fact that the following officers have served as counsel:

	Officers' trials.	Trials of enlisted men.
Majors.....	22	43
Captains.....	20	232
First lieutenants.....	17	245
Second lieutenants.....	10	433
Lieutenants (grade not stated).....	6	214
Chaplains.....	1	33
Enlisted men.....		8
Civilians.....	2	11
None.....	4	99

In addition to the foregoing there were 29 assistant counsel, of whom 8 were civilians.

What has been said of judge advocate and counsel applies equally to members of the court, except that it is an exceptional case where at least one member of the court is not of field rank. Four important cases, Nos. 110751-2-3-4, arising in France, have been the subject of considerable comment in the halls of Congress and in the press. Two soldiers found guilty of disobedience of orders and two of sleeping on post were sentenced to be shot. The sentences of the first two were commuted by the President and the latter two were pardoned. The two soldiers tried for disobedience of orders were permitted to plead guilty. The composition of the court in the first two cases, with the qualifications of the officers to act as members of the court and judge advocate, was as follows (Exhibit 132):

Members of the court.—Colonel, 21 years' commissioned service, Regular Army; first lieutenant, appointed from ranks, Regular Army, graduate of Maryland Agricultural School, civil engineer; first lieutenant, appointed from ranks, Regular Army, high-school education, shipping clerk, salesman, farmer; first lieutenant, graduate of University of Vermont; first lieutenant, record not obtainable.

Judge advocate.—First lieutenant, attorney at law, graduate of law school.

Assistant judge advocate.—Second lieutenant, newspaper reporter, no legal education.

In the other two cases in addition to the foregoing the following officers also sat: Lieutenant colonel, graduate of West Point, 12 years' commissioned service; major, formerly quartermaster sergeant, high-school education; first lieutenant, graduate of Harvard University and Massachusetts Institute of Technology.

The counsel were, in grade and ability, as follows: Case No. 1, second lieutenant, no professional, legal, or business training; case No. 2, second lieutenant, no professional, legal, or business training; case No. 3, second lieutenant, chemist, high-school education; case No. 4, second lieutenant, graduate of University of Maine, no legal education.

The cases were summed up by counsel as follows: Case No. 1, no summing up; case No. 2, no summing up, soldier's statement two lines; case No. 3, counsel's address six lines; case No. 4, counsel's address eight lines.

Had the same careful review, which was submitted for the consideration of the President, been presented to the court, it is safe to assume that the findings and sentences would have been other than as given. It is hard to believe that the soldiers had a fighting chance for their lives. These cases, however, were exceptional.

The actual composition of the courts-martial, after the right of challenge had been exercised, was, for the trial of the 1,500 cases under consideration, as follows:

	Officers' trials.		Trials of enlisted men.
	Number.	Per cent.	Number.	Per cent.
Brigadier generals.....	14	1.8	18	0.1
Colonels.....	105	13.5	201	1.6
Lieutenant colonels.....	113	14.6	472	3.8
Majors.....	232	29.9	1,637	13.0
Captains.....	262	33.8	4,465	35.6
First lieutenants.....	42	5.4	3,731	29.7
Second lieutenants.....	8	1.0	2,027	16.2

For the trial of enlisted men, 81.5 per cent of the officers composing the courts consisted of captains and lieutenants, and, inasmuch as only 73 officers of the grade of major or above served as trial judge advocates in the 1,500 cases under examination, it is apparent that the trials of enlisted men were largely in the hands of junior officers and, in a great majority of cases, those with little knowledge of military law. On numerous occasions, the court was composed exclusively of lieutenants. In many instances, however, the original detail contained officers of higher rank, but they did not sit as members of the court by reason of absence or challenge. On the other hand, there were times when the court was made up of field officers in its entirety. One court contained two colonels, five lieutenant colonels and six majors. The unavailability for detail for courts-martial duty of more officers of experience has been advanced in many instances where the court has been composed almost entirely of lieutenants. While it would be impossible, even were it thought advisable to do so, to detail a court such as the one last mentioned, except in a large command, nevertheless the right of an accused certainly should not be prejudiced by failure to provide a competent tribunal for the consideration of his case. For the trial of officers, only 40.2 per cent of the composition of the court was below field rank. This is accounted for by the fact that, where the accused is an officer, the court is invariably composed of officers senior to him in rank.

The right of challenge was exercised 257 times, and in only 26 instances did the court fail to sustain the objections. Frequently officers arose in court and stated their own disqualifications to sit, although this fact was unknown to the accused. The Judge Advocate also from time to time challenged for cause in behalf of the accused, the latter being unaware of the disqualifications.

The following table will indicate the pleas and findings in the 1,500 cases referred for trial:

	Officers' trials.		Trials of enlisted men.
	Pleas.	Findings.	Pleas.	Findings.
Guilty.....	26	117	784	1,769
Not guilty.....	165	69	1,579	488
Guilty minor included offenses.....		5	220	326

It is interesting to note that the court returned a finding of guilty to 1,769 specifications, and that the accused pleaded guilty in 784 of them, which is nearly half. In serious cases the court called for the evidence in spite of the accused's plea of guilty. In 15 instances the court returned a finding of not guilty, although the accused pleaded guilty to the offense charged. The accused was found not guilty to 488 specifications, and in 326 instances the court returned a finding of guilty of an offense of a similar nature to, but less serious than, the one charged. Certainly the charge can not be made that the courts do not give careful consideration to questions of fact, even though they are subject to the criticism as above stated, that they are in many instances incompetent to pass upon questions of law.

Two officers and 480 enlisted men were charged with desertion. Of these 201 enlisted men were found guilty, 15 enlisted men not guilty, and two officers and 264 enlisted men guilty of absence without leave.

The periods of confinement awarded by courts and approved by reviewing authorities were as follows:

	Awarded by courts.	Approved by reviewing authority
No confinement.....	69	.....
0-3 months.....	202	210
3 months to 6 months.....	285	343
6 months to 1 year.....	158	132
1 year to 2 years.....	144	100
2 years to 3 years.....	108	88
3 years to 5 years.....	166	120
5 years to 10 years.....	108	75
10 years to 15 years.....	19	11
15 years to 20 years.....	18	7
20 years to 25 years.....	10	7
Over 25 years.....	14	8
Number of cases wherein total confinement was remitted.....		50
Number of cases wherein total confinement was suspended.....		16
Number of cases wherein total confinement was set aside.....		53

It will be observed from the above table that, in some instances, the figures in column two exceed those in column one. This is especially true with reference to the lighter sentences, and is explained by the fact that many heavy sentences were reduced by the reviewing authorities to less severe ones. In practically all cases where confinement was of long duration, dishonorable discharge was imposed. The holding of a soldier to a long period of confinement with an organization without separating him from the service is not in the best interests of discipline and has seldom been resorted to in the Army. An examination of the 1,500 cases indicates that dishonorable discharge was imposed, executed, suspended, remitted, or set aside by the reviewing authorities as follows:

Imposed by court.....	651
Executed.....	248
Suspended.....	246
Remitted.....	126
Set aside.....	31

The establishment of disciplinary barracks, to which soldiers found guilty of military offenses, as distinct from common-law felonies, are sent, has made it possible for many young men with elements of military service to win their way back to the colors with an ultimate honorable discharge. To accomplish this, the original dishonorable discharge is suspended until the expiration of the soldier's confinement. Many soldiers, with sentences carrying long periods of confinement, are thus enabled to be restored to duty after serving but a few months at the disciplinary barracks. (Exhibits 148 and 149.)

In 105 cases the reviewing authority returned the records to the court for reconsideration because of failure to return findings of guilty, for the imposition of a heavier sentence than that awarded, or for addition to the sentence of a dishonorable discharge or forfeitures. Of these cases the court in 27 instances adhered to its original findings. In 7 cases it changed the finding of not guilty to guilty, and in 71 cases returned a heavier sentence. In case No. 108614 the reviewing authority, after the court had imposed a sentence of four months' confinement with forfeitures, returned the case for reconsideration, suggesting a specific sentence of dishonorable discharge and two years' confinement. The court declined to change its sentence. In case No. 111094 the court imposed a sentence of three months' confinement and forfeiture of two-thirds pay for one month. The record was returned by the reviewing authority for reconsideration of this sentence, but the court adhered to the one originally imposed. Again the case was returned, and the court, this time stating that it considered the opinion of the reviewing authority controlling, reconsidered its sentence and awarded confinement for two years, with forfeiture of one-half pay for like period. The court was reconvened a third time, and the court informed that it had failed to impose a dishonorable discharge. Upon its third meeting, in revision proceedings, a dishonorable discharge was awarded, including total forfeitures and confinement for two years. The convening authority, upon the unanimous recommendation of the court for clemency, mitigated the sentence to six months' confinement at hard labor and forfeiture of two-thirds pay per month for a like period. More pernicious practices than these can not be imagined. Such instances have brought the court martial system into disrepute.

Although in 668 cases of the 1,371 cases resulting in conviction, the reviewing authorities reduced the sentences imposed by the court, a striking example wherein the exercise of this power by the reviewing authority would have failed to do full justice to the accused was case No. 108540. The court imposed a sentence of dishonorable discharge and five years' confinement. The record was returned with the statement that, while the department commander did not wish it to be understood that he was enjoining particular action or desiring the court to substitute his opinion for its judgment, nevertheless he was convinced that there was insufficient evidence of record to warrant conviction and he was affording an opportunity to the court to reconsider its former findings and sentence before final action was taken. The court acquitted the accused. While the department commander could have disapproved the findings and sentence, nevertheless the stigma of conviction would have attached to the soldier. By the action of the reviewing authority and the subsequent action of the court the soldier was honorably acquitted. While cases of the latter class were less frequent than those of the former, they all indicate the extremes to which the practice of returning records for reconsideration has been exercised.

Criticism has been offered that the department or division judge advocate, after recommending reference of the charges for trial, acts as trial judge advocate, then returns to headquarters and prepares a review of the case for the department or division commander. Such instances were exceedingly rare in the cases under examination. This practice, however, has existed. Case No. 114492, wherein the assistant division judge advocate acted as trial judge advocate, resulted in acquittal. A review of the proceedings was prepared for the division commander by this same judge advocate, wherein it was set forth that four of the specifications had been proven. Thereupon the case was referred back by the division commander to this self-same officer by indorsement, in practically the same language as was found in the review, with instructions that the court be reconvened for reconsideration of its findings. The court met in revision and adhered to its former finding of acquittal. A subsequent review was prepared by the assistant judge advocate (trial judge advocate), wherein he stated in writing to the division commander that the court erred in adhering to its original findings, and recommended that they be disapproved, which was done by the division commander in his final action on the case, adding that the findings of not guilty by the court on the four specifications in question were without justification.

An other instance in this same division, case No. 114485, resulted in precisely the same action, except that in this case the division commander approved the acquittal after the court had declined upon proceedings in revision to change its original findings.

This unfortunate procedure can not be defended from any standpoint and certainly calls for the adoption of such measures as will prevent the possibility of its recurrence.

If failure to do justice has occurred in the trial court or at the hands of the reviewing authority, it is to appellate power that the soldier must look for relief. What relief on appeal exists and the measure in which it has been exercised has been especially examined into. Appellate review is especially necessary during war, when great latitude is granted courts-martial and reviewing authorities in adjudging sentences by the automatic removal of the presidential order prescribing limits of punishment, and, moreover, the power of execution of death sentences, lodged by law exclusively in the President in time of peace, is extended by the 48th Article of War, in cases of persons convicted in time of war of murder, rape, mutiny, desertion, or as spies, to the commanding general of the army in the field or to the commanding general of the territorial department or division, who confirms the sentence. Prior to the war, all cases of general court-martial arriving in the office of the Judge Advocate General (and every case must be sent there after final action by the reviewing authority) were carefully examined by a commissioned Judge Advocate for jurisdictional errors (which, if existent at the time, caused the proceedings to be set aside by the Secretary of War), and for errors of law prejudicial to the rights of the accused. In cases of excessive sentences, or where mitigating circumstances appeared within or outside of the record, recommendation was made to the Secretary of War to exercise the power of clemency by remission or mitigation of the sentences. After entrance into the war, and coincident with the raising of the large Army under the draft, errors of law in court-martial proceedings became more frequent, due to the causes heretofore related. The correction of the same by the pardoning or clemency power naturally fails to remove the stigma of conviction. The Acting Judge Advocate General, believing that the power to reverse, modify, and set aside was lodged in the Judge Advocate General by section 1199, Revised Statutes, exercised the same on October 30, 1917, by setting aside the judgments of conviction and the sentences in the cases of the Texas mutineers, on account of prejudicial error due to failure to substantiate, by the evidence of record, the offenses charged. This same power was exercised in several other contemporaneous cases. The Secretary of War held that such power was not to be found in section 1199, Revised Statutes, and prepared a draft of amendment to that section providing for the lodging of the power in the President, and sent a copy of the drafted amendment, on January 19, 1918, to the Military Affairs Committees of the House and Senate, recommending its enactment into legislation. It failed to become a law.

An examination of numerous memoranda bearing the signature of the Acting Judge Advocate General reveals the fact that recommendation was frequently made to the War Department to declare findings null and void. In case No.

107250 the accused challenged one member of the court and the record failed to indicate if he objected to being tried by any other member. The Acting Judge Advocate General recommended "that the findings and sentence in this case be declared void and of no force or effect and that the accused be released from confinement and restored to duty." In case No. 107490 the same recommendation was made, where the court erroneously found a soldier guilty of a lesser included offense, one for which he was not tried, it being held that such irregularity was fatal to the validity of the proceedings of the court. In case No. 107828 the Acting Judge Advocate General recommended that the findings and sentence of the court be declared null and void, where the accused pleaded guilty and was so found to a specification which did not state a military offense. In case No. 107814 the Acting Judge Advocate General recommended that the sentence be set aside and the accused restored to duty, where in its findings the court eliminated certain words in a specification to such an extent that no offense, civil or military, was stated. In case No. 107800 the president of the court made no explanation to the accused as to the effect of his plea of guilty nor advised him of the maximum punishment imposable by the court as required by paragraph 154, Manual for Courts-Martial. The Acting Judge Advocate General held that the requirements of this paragraph can not be ignored without prejudice to the fundamental rights of the accused. It was recommended accordingly that the findings and sentence in the case be declared invalid and the accused released from confinement and restored to duty. To cite other cases would only encumber the record. It should be stated, however, that all of the above recommendations were approved by the Secretary of War.

Another serious matter arose which caused anxiety in the War Department. About the middle of December, 1917, the public press announced the execution of 13 negro soldiers in the Southern Department for murder and mutiny. Their execution occurred within 48 hours after the approval and confirmation by the department commander of their sentences. There was no opportunity for appeal in these cases. This action was denied the accused by their summary execution. The entire action was regular and lawful. No error was later found in the records of trial. The possibilities of injustice, incapable of future correction, were, however, so exemplified in these cases that G. O. No. 160, War Department, 1917, were issued on December 29, 1917, providing that, after the commanding general of a territorial department or division confirms a sentence of death, the execution of such sentence shall be deferred until the record of trial has been received and reviewed in the office of the Judge Advocate General and the reviewing authority informed by the Judge Advocate General that such review has been made and that there is no legal objection to carrying the sentence into execution. Thus the principle of automatic appeal was established, and henceforth all death sentences were stayed until careful review could be had of the records of trial in the office of the Judge Advocate General. About this same time hundreds of cases were reaching the War Department wherein sentences of dishonorable discharge were being imposed with short periods of confinement for comparatively trivial offenses, indicating that a large percentage of the men could be sufficiently disciplined and punished within their organizations during training for active military service without branding the soldier with the stigma of dishonorable discharge and imprisonment and without denying the Government the use of the man power which was so obviously necessary. Therefore, on December 22, 1917, confidential instructions were issued to all general court-martial jurisdictions providing that close scrutiny in all cases be exercised in order that no sentence of dishonorable discharge should be approved where the offender had capacity for military service and where other appropriate form of punishment was sufficient to meet the requirements of the case; and, further, that dishonorable discharge should be imposed only in those cases where the nature of the offenses demanded a long term of confinement in the penitentiary or in the disciplinary barracks and that where dishonorable discharge was not accompanied by a long period of confinement it should be suspended or remitted. (Exhibit 68.)

At the same time, additional measures were being considered in the Office of the Judge Advocate General for safeguarding the rights of the accused, and on January 17, 1918, General Orders, No. 7, were issued, directing that not only the execution of all sentences of death, as provided in General Orders, No. 160, 1917, but also all sentences of dismissal and dishonorable discharge be stayed until the records of trial could be reviewed in the office of the Judge Advocate General and their legality there determined. In the event that the record was not sufficient to sustain the findings and sentence of the court, provision was made to return the same to the reviewing authority with a clear statement of the error, omission, or defect which was found. If such error, omission, or defect admitted of correction, the reviewing authority was to be advised to reconvene the court for such correction, otherwise he was to be advised of the action proper for him to take by way of approval or disapproval of the findings or sentence of the court, remission of the sentence in whole or in part, retrial of the case, or such other action as might be appropriate in the premises. Provision was made that any delay in the execution of any sentence, by reason of the foregoing, should be credited upon the term of confinement or imprisonment imposed. A branch office of the Judge Advocate General was established in France to consider those cases arising in the American Expeditionary Forces. The order became effective on February 1. The action of the Judge Advocate General was purely one of recommendation. There was no power to compel the reviewing authorities to follow his advice. Since February 1, 1918, the date when General Orders, No. 7, became effective, 212 cases have been referred back to the reviewing authorities under the provisions of those orders. The records indicate that there were only seven instances where the recommendations of the Judge Advocate General were not entirely followed (Exhibit 71). In two of three cases tried in the United States his recommendations were followed in part. In the third case they were disregarded in their entirety. In one of four cases tried in France the recommendations of the Acting Judge Advocate General were followed in part and in the other three absolutely disregarded. One case in the American Expeditionary Forces, No. 118312, where the reviewing authority flatly refused to take the action recommended by the Acting Judge Advocate General of the American Expeditionary Forces was made the basis of a letter from that official on July 11, 1918, stating that if the reviewing authorities are to be free to disregard the advice of his office with respect to the legality of findings and sentences, he was unable to see how the provisions and purposes of General Orders, No. 7, were to be accomplished. Accordingly, on September 11, 1918, the War Department amended General Orders, No. 7, by providing that in the American Expeditionary Forces all sentences of courts-martial or any parts thereof found by the Acting Judge Advocate General to be illegal, defective, or void shall be disapproved, modified, or set aside in accordance with the recommendations of that officer. This order has recently been revoked as being contrary to the decision of the Secretary of War, that the power to reverse, modify, or set aside sentences does not rest with the Judge Advocate General.

During the period February 1 to April 15, 1918, the Judge Advocate General not only recommended to reviewing authorities that corrective action should be taken where illegality appeared in the proceedings, but brought to their attention, with a view to mitigation, sentences which were unduly severe.

From April until July it appears that cases were returned only for illegality, but that subsequently the matter of unduly severe sentences again was made the basis for recommendation to the reviewing authorities that the power of mitigation and remission be exercised.

The 1,500 cases selected for examination were chosen as follows: Five hundred immediately prior to the publication of General Orders, No. 7, 500 after the provisions of General Orders, No. 7, were in full operation, and 500 several months later.

The table on page 755 of this report indicates the cases wherein dishonorable discharge was imposed, executed, remitted, or set aside. The following table shows the assignment of these cases to their respective periods:

Dishonorable discharge.

	First period.	Second period.	Third period.
Imposed by the court.....	230	188	233
Executed.....	131	84	33
Suspended.....	47	59	140
Remitted.....	39	41	46
Set aside.....	13	4	14

The beneficial results derived from the operation of General Orders, No. 7, are apparent. During the first period, viz, prior to the issuance of General Orders, No. 7, 58 per cent of the dishonorable discharges imposed by the courts were ordered executed—43 per cent during the second period and only 14 per cent during the third period. On the other hand, 20 per cent of the dishonorable discharges imposed during the first period were suspended, 32 per cent during the second period, and 60 per cent during the third period.

Dishonorable discharge was executed in the following cases :

	First period.	Second period.	Third period.
Murder, attempted murder, manslaughter, or assault.....	11	1	.....
Burglary, robbery, larceny, forgery, embezzlement, or fraud.....	52	46	18
Introducing drugs, immorality, or moral degeneracy.....	2	3	6
Drunk and disorderly conduct.....	.....	4	1
Mutiny or sedition.....	12	2	2
Derision, absent without leave, escape, or attempted to escape.....	40	25	5
Sleeping on or quitting post.....	8	.....	.....
Disobedience of orders or disrespect.....	6	3	1
	131	84	33

An examination of the above table will indicate that dishonorable discharge, especially in the third period, could not have been suspended with due regard for the best interests of the service.

In addition to the remission and mitigation of sentences by the convening authorities upon the recommendations of the Judge Advocate General, numerous recommendations were made from that office to the Secretary of War to exercise the presidential power of clemency, and to set aside and declare null and void the proceedings in those cases where illegalities were discovered. Of the 1,500 cases examined, 50 during the first period carrying 162 years of confinement were sent to the War Department with the recommendation by the Judge Advocate General to remit the sentences in whole or in part, with the result that 84 per cent of the years of confinement were remitted. During the second period, 33 cases with 133 years of confinement were forwarded by the Judge Advocate General for presidential action, and, as a result of his recommendations, 91 per cent of the years of confinement were remitted. In the third period, 39 cases with 228 years of confinement were returned to the Judge Advocate General, approving his recommendation and directing that 95 per cent of the years of confinement be remitted. It will be recalled that, during the first period the provisions of General Order No. 7 were not in force, and in the second and third periods that they were in operation. Neither were the boards of review nor the clemency board at this time in existence. Of all cases tried during the war, and forwarded to the War Department with specific recommendations by the Judge Advocate General, either to set aside, modify, or carry into execution the sentences imposed, in only 13 were his recommendations not followed. In three cases the Secretary of War differed from the Judge Advocate General with regard to the points of law involved therein. In four cases there was a difference of opinion as to the propriety of a commutation of sentence. In one case, where the sentence of dismissal was recommended for confirmation, the President, on the recommendation of the Secretary of War, exercised the power of remission. In five cases tried in France, the Judge Advocate General recommended confinement in the United States Disciplinary Barracks, and the Secretary of War directed that the sentence be served at military posts in France. (Exhibit 71.)

On February 13, 1918, the Judge Advocate General, by circular letter to all department and division judge advocates, urged upon them the necessity of thorough investigation of charges before reference for trial, in order that none might be laid which could not be substantiated by sufficient legal evidence; that endeavor should be made to limit the number of trials by general court-martial, and that no case should be tried where the offense could be adequately punished by a minor court or by the administrative punishments authorized by law. They were further urged to guard against ordering offenders to trial who were lacking in mental responsibility. In all cases wherein it appeared that the accused was lacking in physical, mental, or moral equipment as an efficient fighting man, it was suggested that the psychiatrist assigned to duty with their commands be called into consultation for advice. Department and division judge advocates were informed that it was their duty to thoroughly study the records of trial, and, where it was found that the accused had within him the elements of service, the following principles should govern in deciding upon the punishment to be awarded in time of war (Exhibit 74):

I. Guardhouses are breeding places for crime. They are not designed to foster self-respect. Men should be kept out of them in all cases except where restraint is necessary.

II. Time spent in confinement is time lost from training. Our task is to turn out in the shortest possible time the greatest possible number of trained men.

III. Whenever and wherever possible, men sentenced to undergo confinement or hard labor should be drilled with their organizations and required to serve punishment when other men are resting or off duty.

Department and division judge advocates were cautioned to make every possible effort to bring those offenders whom it was deemed necessary to try to trial at the earliest practicable date, to the end that the period between arrest or confinement and the date of trial might be held down to the lowest possible limit, and they were enjoined to expedite, in every possible way, the preparation of the records of trial, their review of the same, the action of the reviewing authority, and the forwarding of the records to the office of the Judge Advocate General. So thorough were the instructions given by the Judge Advocate General that responsibility for failure to carry them out certainly can not be charged against the central office. That failure, in some instances, to follow the plain instructions given, existed is indicated by the fact that, on March 22, 1918, the chief of the military justice division, Lieut. Col. E. G. Davis, informed the Judge Advocate General that many judge advocates, officers of the Judge Advocate General's Department, in the field were failing to properly scrutinize charges referred for trial, with the result that many trials were being held on irregular or insufficient specifications. Too many men were being tried by general court-martial whose cases could be properly disposed of by minor courts or by administrative punishments authorized by the one hundred and fourth article of war. The actual trial of cases was in many respects poorly planned; joint offenders were being separately charged and separately tried by the same court, and important cases were frequently referred to incompetent trial judge advocates. Col. Davis further reported as follows (Exhibit 150):

"More important, however, is the evident failure on the part of judge advocates to understand the policy of the department with reference to the conservation of man power. Men are still being tried and dishonorably discharged the service for trivial offenses, which could be otherwise adequately punished. In many divisions there seems to be an unsympathetic use of the power to suspend sentences of dishonorable discharge. It is my view that, during this war at least, in every case where confinement is to be in a disciplinary barracks the dishonorable discharge should be suspended and the officers of the disciplinary barracks made responsible for saying that the man should not ultimately be sent back to serve with the colors."

It was recommended that the closest possible cooperation and understanding exist between the office of the Judge Advocate General and its representatives in the field. Col. Davis explained the necessity for unity of purpose and understanding between the Judge Advocate General's Office and the commanding officers of the disciplinary barracks on the question of restoration to duty, in order that as many men as possible could be given an opportunity to redeem themselves through actual service. He strongly advised that a representative of the Judge Advocate General's Office be sent on a tour of inspection and instruction to the various division and department headquarters, and the headquarters of the several disciplinary barracks. He recommended that no judge advocate be sent thereafter to a division or department until he had received a course of training in the office of the Judge Advocate General. The Judge Advocate General approved the recommendations of Col. Davis, and this latter officer himself was sent on April 18, 1918, to accomplish the purposes above set forth.

On May 5, 1918, the commanding general American Expeditionary Forces cabled the War Department recommending that in order that exemplary action might be taken in said forces, the forty-eighth article of war be amended in such a manner as to authorize him to confirm all death sentences and order their execution, citing the fact that full authority as to death sentences in the French and British Armies was vested in the military authorities. It will be recalled that, under the forty-eighth article of war, the President alone has power to confirm death sentences, except in cases of murder, rape, mutiny, desertion, and spying, committed in time of war, and in these cases sentences of death may be carried into execution by the commanding general of the army in the field and by the commanding general of a territorial department or division. The Judge Advocate General advised against this action, and, on May 16, 1918, recommended that the commanding general American Expeditionary Forces be informed that the President had decided not to urge upon Congress any extension of the present authority of the commanding general of an army in the field as to such sentences. (Exhibit 151.)

On July 9, 1918, Congress amended the fifty-second and fifty-third articles of war, and thereby authorized the convening authority to suspend the execution, in whole or in part, of any sentence not extending to death, and to restore the offender to duty during such suspension. Authority was granted to remit, in whole or in part, a sentence, or any part thereof, which had been so suspended, except in cases of persons confined in the disciplinary barracks. Authority was granted to vacate such order of suspension at any time, and order the execution of the sentence or the suspended part thereof, in so far as the same had not been previously remitted. The same power, with respect to prisoners in the United States Disciplinary Barracks, was lodged in the President. The War Department thereby authorized the convening authority to exercise a broader policy of suspending sentences and then finally remitting them, and means were thus provided to avoid, as far as possible, the sending of enlisted men to penal institutions with the consequent branding of them with obloquy.

Subsequently, on July 27, 1918, the commanding general American Expeditionary Forces cabled the War Department for authority to commute those sentences which he was authorized to confirm, and also those which it was necessary to forward to the President for confirmation. Theretofore the power of commutation rested solely with the President. The commanding general was of the opinion that the administration of justice would be facilitated by the exercise by him of said power. A number of death sentences requiring confirmation by the President were being imposed in the American Expeditionary Forces, where the offense was not of such character as to justify so severe a penalty, but required a lesser measure of punishment. Great delay would of necessity be caused by transmitting the cases to Washington for presidential review and action. Accordingly, the Secretary of War transmitted, on September 26, 1918, to Congress a draft of amendment to the fiftieth article of war, empowering the President to delegate, whenever he deemed it advisable to do so, the power to mitigate or remit sentences which, under the Articles of War, required his confirmation before execution, to the commanding general of the Army in the field or to the commanding general of a territorial department or division. (Exhibits 142 to 147, inclusive.)

In the early part of August, 1913, there was established in the military justice division of the Judge Advocate General's office a board of review for appellate consideration of the most serious cases. Prior to this time if the case, by reason of error or the seriousness of the offense, required a written review, the same was prepared and submitted to the chief of the military justice division. The function of the board of review, consisting of three specially selected officers, was to consider the case after the first review and before it reached the chief of the military justice division. Due to the rapid increase in the number of cases received in the office, a second board of review was created, and an idea of the thoroughness of appellate examination of records can be had from the following brief outline of the functioning of the office (Exhibits 109 and 154):

The military justice division is divided into eight main sections. Four of these sections have to do with the review of court-martial proceedings in the first instance. As each case arrives in the office of the Judge Advocate General it is assigned, according to its nature, to an officer in the appropriate section, who makes a careful examination of every step in the proceedings. If the case does not fall in the group of those serious ones which require a written review, and if the record is free from error and nothing else is discovered requiring appellate relief, it is initialed by the officer who examines it, and then passes through the chief of section to the files. If the case is one requiring it, a written review is prepared and submitted to the chief of section, who, if he concurs, forwards it to the proper board of review. These two boards are sections of the military justice division. The board of review may adopt the preliminary review as its own, may modify or rewrite it, or may direct that it be modified or rewritten so as to express its views. Each member of the board must concur

In the approval of the opinion, or note his dissent before the review is transmitted to the chief of the division of military justice. Any dissenting member may indicate the reasons for his dissent, either orally or in writing, to the chief of the division, and, when he so desires, to the Judge Advocate General. The approved opinion must be passed upon by the chief of the military justice division before it reaches the Judge Advocate General. In cases of death, or of dismissal of officers, the record is frequently examined and reviewed independently by two sectional officers before being passed through the chief of section to the appropriate board of review. A more thorough system of appellate review would be difficult to find. Every court-martial case receives appellate review automatically, and through no initiative or act of the accused.

How carefully the interests of the accused are guarded by the review of the records of trial, and how thorough is the examination of the cases in the office of the Judge Advocate General, is indicated in No. 107387. In this case it was discovered that, in relieving and adding members of a general court-martial in a certain department, due to transfer from that department of officers destined for service abroad, one general court-martial had in its composition at the date of trial 14 members, 1 in excess of the number allowed by law, although but 10 officers were actually present for duty in the department at the time. The defect was not discovered by the court, the trial judge advocate, the counsel for the defense, or the department judge advocate. Although the accused was guilty of a serious offense and sentenced to dishonorable discharge with three years' confinement, the Judge Advocate General recommended to the Secretary of War that the findings and sentence be declared null and void and that the accused be released from confinement and restored to duty. The recommendations of the Judge Advocate General were approved.

The average time required after final action by the reviewing authorities for the cases to reach the office of the Judge Advocate General was 18.1 days. Cases tried in the Philippine Islands, Panama, China, and France entered into the computation of this average. During the first period the average time was 16.5 days. As the number of troops in France increased, the average time required for all records to reach the Judge Advocate General's office became greater. In the third period the average time was 22.9 days. It will be recalled, however, that, in aid of the revisory power, a branch of the Judge Advocate General's office was established in France by General Orders No. 7, January 17, 1918, and that the cases arising in France received their first review in that office. From the foregoing it appears that no great amount of time intervenes before automatic review of trials takes place, and the accused is not compelled to remain long in confinement pending action on his case by the Judge Advocate General.

The clemency and restoration section considers all appeals by prisoners, their relatives or friends, for clemency or restoration to the colors, and prepares in writing for the head of the division its recommendations upon such appeals. Every soldier in the disciplinary barracks is entitled to apply for clemency once every six months. His relatives and friends can apply for the same at any time. This is in addition to the automatic appellate review above referred to. The clemency and restoration section also considers recommendations for clemency referred to it by officers of other sections of the military justice division, who, in reviewing a case as to its legality, believe it to be a proper one for the exercise of clemency.

That many cases of excessive punishments were permitted to stand, even after review, in the office of the Judge Advocate General, no recommendation for the exercise of the power of clemency having been made, is true. The clemency board, composed of three officers best suited to carry out its purposes, is actively engaged in reviewing sentences imposed for offenses committed during the war period, with a view not only to equalizing punishments but to adjust said punishments to present disciplinary requirements.

An examination of the sentences imposed during the periods from which the cases were selected indicates some instances wherein heavy punishments were awarded. Some of these sentences were mitigated by the reviewing authorities. Others were permitted to stand. Some were completely set aside. In case No. 108973, where the accused was found guilty of desertion, advising another to desert, attempt to kill, and for carrying a concealed weapon, a sentence of 20 years' confinement was imposed. The reviewing authority, after stating that the judge advocate had erroneously introduced in evidence in a capital case testimony taken before another court-martial in a former and uncompleted trial of the case, and that this action resulted in a complete miscarriage of justice, disapproved the sentence and restored the accused to duty. Instances have been frequent where sentences of long duration have been materially reduced by the reviewing authorities. In many instances sentences of 10 years were reduced to as low as six months. In cases Nos. 114221 and 114398, sentences of 15 years, and in case No. 114364, one of 20 years, were reduced to six months. On the other hand, cases have been cited in the public press—and there are unquestionably others which have not been published—wherein the sentences imposed and approved have been severe beyond all reason. Sentences of undue length have been imposed and permitted to stand when it was known that the offender would never serve more than a small fraction of this imprisonment. The sentences were undoubtedly given for their deterrent effect. The offenses towering above all others wherein unusually heavy sentences were imposed were those of desertion and absence without leave. It is interesting to note in this connection that various expediences were resorted to in order to prevent these serious offenses, committed, many of them, upon the eve of departure of organizations for France. In one division, in the month of January alone, the number of desertions was 234. The division commander was unusually successful in reducing the number of desertions in the succeeding months. In his report he stated as follows:

"I always approve severe sentences for desertion but reduce the severity when it is shown that the man voluntarily returned. These cases are published to the command. I also make an effort to have all of these cases published in the newspapers, so that the soldiers' relatives and friends can be made to realize the seriousness of desertion in time of war."

The following table indicates the number of cases of desertion in the period January 1 to August 18, 1918, the date of the division commander's report:

January	234
February	82
March	80
April	91

As a result of an investigation made by an officer of this department and from his report, dated January 18, 1919, it appears that, from the establishment of the stockade at the Port of Embarkation, Hoboken, N. J., in April, 1918, to November 13, 1918, two days after the signing of the armistice, 9,280 enlisted men were confined therein. The stockade was constructed on account of the alarming increase in the number of absences without leave. One regiment alone departed for overseas service leaving 400 men behind absent without authority. One company had 25 absentees at the date of departure. Before the establishment of the stockade, one soldier absented himself six successive times from as many different casual organizations bound for overseas service. This will give an idea of the difficulties under which the War Department was laboring, due to the frequency of soldiers deserting their commands or absenting themselves therefrom on the eve of departure overseas.

In case No. 120910 the accused was tried (at Camp Gordon, Ga.) for twice absenting himself without leave, for breaking arrest before he was set at liberty by proper authority, all this in spite of the fact that his organization had been instructed to hold itself in a constant state of readiness for overseas service. He pleaded guilty to these offenses, and the only defense offered by him was in the following words:

"I just want to make a statement without being sworn. I went home for the purpose of seeing my father, mother, and sister. I was likely to never see them any more. That is all, I reckon."

He was found guilty and sentenced to dishonorable discharge, and, in addition, to 10 years' confinement. The convening authority approved the sentence of confinement but suspended the dishonorable discharge, and the soldier was sent to the United States Disciplinary Barracks, Fort Leavenworth, Kans. The accused was 30 years of age. After serving five months of his confinement the commandant of the United States Disciplinary Barracks recommended a remission of eight and one-half years of his sentence. The clemency board in the office of the Judge Advocate General recommended restoration to duty.

The Adjutant General concurred in the recommendation of the commandant and recommended that eight and one-half years of the sentence be remitted and that the matter of restoration be allowed to take its normal course. A member of the clemency board stated, in writing, as follows:

"The man ought to be restored at once, first, because apparently he ought never to have been tried at all, and, secondly, because according to every conception of natural justice he has long since expiated his offense. His offense was not serious at the worst. He was absent without leave less than three days, and the memorandum sheet shows that he broke arrest and went absent without leave for the purpose of telling his parents and sisters good-by. He pleaded guilty to these offenses. He had been in the Army but one month when he committed this delinquency. Justice requires that he be restored, and it is only an adherence to routine and mere formalism that suggests that he should be retained longer for the purpose of determining whether he should be restored or not. The whole truth of the matter is the military authorities should never have put him in a position where he would have to be restored. He should have been with the colors all the time. Administration that balks at immediate restoration is the kind that brings military justice into disrepute."

There is nothing in the record, except the unsworn statement of the soldier, to indicate that he went home to say good-by to his father, mother, and sister. On March 4, 1919, six months after the soldier's trial, his father made affidavit in connection with an application for restoration of his son to duty. He stated as follows:

"Just prior to his desertion from Camp Gordon he came home, and deponent undertook to quiet him and explain to him the situation with reference to his duties and the reasons why he should remain with his company, and that his said son resolved firmly that he would stay with them, but in the opinion of deponent as the time approached and he heard the boys talking his fear became uncontrollable. He further says that the practice on the rifle range completely unnerved him, and his son told deponent that he just could not stand it, and his mental condition was very bad."

The Secretary of War concurred in the recommendation of the clemency board, and the soldier, on April 11, 1919, was restored to duty.

The treatment of military offenders at the Disciplinary Barracks is so closely associated with the system of military justice that a brief outline of the functioning of the Atlantic branch, based upon a report from the commandant of that institution, dated April 15, 1919, will be set forth. (Exhibit 148.)

Every military prisoner, upon admission to the Disciplinary Barracks, is given a thorough mental and physical examination. Every possible source of information is made use of to obtain a complete history of the offender, so that, at the end of a month or six weeks, a reasonably accurate estimate of the soldier, his ability and requirements, can be arrived at. Some offenders are mentally deficient, such as the insane, the epileptic, the feeble-minded, and those addicted to drugs and alcoholics. Others show character defects, or inability to adjust themselves to any environment, as shown by truancy in school life and lack of persistence in employment.

The treatment of the military offender in the Disciplinary Barracks has a twofold object, first to return him to the colors a better soldier, and secondly, if unfitted for military service, to return him to civil life, if possible, a better citizen.

Any prisoner, regardless of his offense or length of his sentence, is eligible to the disciplinary battalion, if, after a thorough study of his case, he appears capable of being reclaimed to the military service. The battalion is removed from the general barracks population, and is quartered in a cantonment building. This building has neither bolts nor bars. The battalion cooks and serves its own rations and does its own guard duty. It is under the supervision of one commissioned and several noncommissioned officers. The discipline in the battalion is very strict, yet the members are given considerable liberty. If, after three months' intensive military training, a member of the battalion is certified as capable of taking his place in a regular military organization, he is recommended for restoration to the service.

The numbered men consist of those whose examinations show that they are not desirable for the disciplinary battalion, although some, after further observation, may prove to be so. The treatment of these men is along educational and vocational lines. Classes are conducted by experienced Y. M. C. A. teachers.

In connection with the educational system, an honor system has been instituted among the prisoners. A recognized organization with the better element of the prisoners in control, subject to the supervision of the officers, was created. The lawless and antagonistic element is placed at a disadvantage. The association has its rules and regulations and its tribunals for trial. Privileges are the reward for good conduct and punishments are the penalty for misbehavior. Every new arrival is met by a member of the Honor Association. Previously, the disgruntled and antagonistic element was the first to approach the newcomer. Recently the honor committee notified the commandant that the organization was having some difficulty with its offending members, who preferred trial by the prison court instead of by the honor court. Recommendation was made that the punishment prescribed by the former be made equal in severity to that of the latter. The commandant reported as follows:

“It is possible, and has happened, that prisoners sentenced to serve upward of 20 years have been restored to the colors in fewer months. In fact, it is possible for a prisoner with a life sentence to be restored to a regular organization in five months. In the case of numbered men, recommendations for their release have been made for various reasons—on account of youth, mental inferiority, inadequate personality, nervous instability, and the financial condition of their dependents—so that in the case of these prisoners, as well as the battalion men, the sentence really cuts but little figure. This practice of recommending prisoners for release, as outlined above, was the general policy of this institution months before the present clemency board was appointed.

“As a matter of fact, we are confronted by a much greater administrative problem by the short sentences now imposed than by the longer ones. Men with short sentences are generally apathetic as to restoration. Six months' sentence, with good-conduct time deducted, releases a man by expiration of his sentence in five months, too short a time for the corrective and disciplinary measures applied to him to become sufficiently effective to warrant restoration. A shorter sentence than six months, and some are shorter, practically precludes the possibility of extending restoration. * * *

“No man shall be sent to the disciplinary barracks for a shorter period than one year. Men with longer sentences have something definite to work for, which is not the case with shorter-term men. The longer sentence awakens the prisoner to a healthy, laudable endeavor, while the shorter sentence stifles ambition. The short-term prisoner sits back and waits for the end of his term, appeals to work for restoration fall on deaf ears, and the morale of the institution is, in consequence, lowered.”

The Honor Association of prisoners concluded a recent review of the objects and results of their association in the following language:

“We owe a debt of gratitude to the officials of this institution for the assistance they have rendered us in accomplishing our ideal, and we sincerely hope that the facts and conditions as described in this article will serve as an inspiration and incentive to the inmates and officials of institutions of similar character throughout our beloved United States.”

The location of the United States Disciplinary Barracks is at Fort Leavenworth, Kans., to which in far the greater number of prisoners is sent. One branch, the Atlantic, is situated at Governors Island, N. Y.; another, the Pacific, is established at Alcatraz, Calif. The number of men restored to duty during the 12 months ending April 17, 1919, at each place was as follows (Exhibit 149):

Original length of sentence and number of men restored and average time actually served to restoration.

Year.	Fort Leavenworth Barracks.		Atlantic Branch.		Pacific Branch.
	Number restored.	Average time.	Number restored.	Average time.	Number restored.	Average time.

For the fiscal year ending June 30, 1918, the number of men restored from Fort Leavenworth was 374, of whom only 24 were reported as failures.

The following table prepared by The Adjutant General indicates the extent to which the power of executive clemency has been exercised as a result of the operation of the clemency board in the office of the Judge Advocate General. It covers a period of seven weeks immediately prior to April 26, 1919. (Exhibit 152.)

It is believed that the Judge Advocate General's Department has functioned during the war with the interests and rights of the enlisted men constantly in mind, and that the various steps taken and the measures adopted have been for the single purpose of safeguarding those interests and rights. It has been successful, except in a few isolated instances, in accomplishing that purpose. That these instances have occurred is partly due to the failure of the Articles of War, and the machinery provided by law for the administration of military justice, to completely function in the rapid assembling of an army, undisciplined and uninstructed, of several million men. Whatever injustice has been done is now being remedied in so far as it is possible to do so in the absence of legislative action. That such legislation is necessary to prevent like injustice in the future can not be denied. This matter is now receiving the attention of able jurists within and without the army, and it is believed that, in the light of the experiences of the recent war, the military code can, without a great deal of legislation, be made proof against those practices which have been shown to be unjust.

III. ANSWERS TO THE QUESTIONS IN THE MEMORANDUM OF THE SECRETARY OF WAR

"(1) What machinery was organized in the Office of the Judge Advocate General for the effective consideration of records with a view to making appropriate recommendations for clemency?" (Exhibit 1.)

This question is fully answered on pages 51 to 53, inclusive, of this report. An early review of court-martial records has always been provided in the office of the Judge Advocate General, with a view to detection of error in the proceedings, and to discovering such facts as call for the exercise of executive clemency. Formerly, the review was made by an officer of the Judge Advocate General's Department, who made his recommendations to the divisional chief or directly to the Judge Advocate General. Later boards of review were created, thereby insuring a greater thoroughness of the examination of records of trial. No act of the accused is necessary to insure review of his trial record. The review is, and always has been, entirely automatic. The Judge Advocate General is not limited to the evidence of record in the appellate review.

The establishment of the clemency board provides means for the consideration of records of trial subsequent to their original review in the office of the Judge Advocate General, and also, and in connection therewith, those facts existing prior or subsequent to trial, which called for the exercise of executive clemency. The conduct of the accused at the Disciplinary Barracks or penitentiary has great weight in arriving at the recommendations to be made to the Secretary of War. This review is in part automatic in the sense that many cases are considered without initiation on the part of the accused. The latter has always had the privilege of submitting an application for clemency every six months, and at any time he had new matter to present which warranted consideration. The machinery in the office of the Judge Advocate General has functioned effectively in accomplishing its purpose.

In a memorandum, dated February 19, 1918, for Capt. K. S. Wallace, War College, dictated by Gen. Ansell and signed by Lieut. Col. R. P. Spiller, Gen. Ansell, referring to the functions of the Judge Advocate General's Department in connection with the present war, states:

"Fundamental rights are involved. Military jurisdiction is to be exercised with care and caution, yet with cautious regard which must be exercised with certainty and assurance. This office has called to its aid some of the most distinguished lawyers of the country. * * *

"But it is as a bureau of military justice that the functions of the department touch personally and individually each officer and enlisted man of the establishment. The rights, duties, and obligations of all military persons are established and regulated by a military code consisting of both written and unwritten law. A member of the establishment is required to conform not only to this special code, but also the general law of the land, and such conformity may in a general way be designated as discipline. Discipline is maintained in the last analysis by the exertion of military power through regularly established military tribunals which function in accordance with a penal code, technically known as the Articles of War. This code is enacted by Congress under its power to make rules and regulations for the government of the Army. An offender against it is charged, arrested, tried, sentenced, and punished in strict accord with the articles. The code is a complete code of penal law, both substantive and adjective. Discipline must be maintained in strict accordance with the code, and with justice.

"The proceedings of every case tried by court-martial must be accurately and completely recorded and forwarded to the office of the Judge Advocate General for review, and that authority makes necessary revision in order that justice may be done every accused man. All human tribunals are imperfect, and especially imperfect will be the military tribunals of our newly created Army. The officers constituting the court have not been experienced in the school of war and in military law, but have only recently come from civil life. Besides, this is the first democratic Army that America has ever raised. Its members come from the fields and the factories, from every class of society, and from every walk of life. Both officers and men alike are uninured to military methods and requirements. The spirit of such an Army is bound to be of the highest quality, notwithstanding there will be abundant opportunity for the exercise of authority upon the part of those who have it, and for numerous infractions of discipline upon the part of men who have had no opportunity to acquire the necessary appreciation of discipline. Courts-martial may be expected to be rather frequent and errors in procedure numerous. The review enjoined by law to be carried out in the office of the Judge Advocate General must be made with all the more cautious regard for the rights of individuals so strangely circumstanced in a new institution. This the people will demand; this, in justice to the Army and the individuals thereof, this office must do; and this this office is equipped to do."

Gen. Ansell, in his report of July 8, 1918, relative to his trip abroad, stated:

"In passing I should like to say, and, considering the nature of this report I think that with entire propriety I may say, that as a result of my observations and study here I have been surprisingly struck with the prevision with which the office of the Judge Advocate General of our Army has been administered for the past several years, including the period of this war. Without particular opportunities for so doing, and without the advantage of actual war experiences had here, it has anticipated necessities of administration which as a rule only experience develops; and, more remarkable still, there is a surprising consonance between the principles of administration which our office had recommended to be adopted and which doubtless in the end will be adopted in the department and those principles which are found to be an approved basic part of the military administration of the allied nations."

It would appear from these statements that at the time they were written, viz. February and July, 1918, Gen. Ansell had full confidence in the military code and in the ability of the Judge Advocate General's Office to protect the interests of the Army.

It is pertinent to here state that the present military code enacted in 1916 is substantially the same as that which on February 6, 1914, was reported to the Senate by the Senate Committee on Military Affairs. In that report the Senate Military Affairs Committee adopted the unanimous report of its subcommittee which, in conclusion, stated as follows:

"Convinced that the revision embodies many essential reforms in our military law, and that it presents an adequate and modern military code, your subcommittee earnestly recommends that the project, as set forth in the amended draft, be recommended for enactment."

"(2) To what extent, if at all, has the making of such recommendations for clemency, or otherwise properly administering the business of military justice, been affected by the difference of opinion with regard to the interpretation of section 1199 of the Revised Statutes of the United States?" (Exhibit 1.)

The difference of opinion concerned only a question of statutory construction. There has never been a controversy in the office of the Judge Advocate General over the necessity for exercising as complete a revisory or appellate jurisdiction over courts-martial as was possible without interfering with the necessary disciplinary powers of officers commanding, and therefore responsible for the discipline of, troops.

For a long time after, and in spite of, the adverse ruling by the Secretary of War in November, 1918, Gen. Ansell persisted in his view, under his "reinterpretation" of an old statute, that the Judge Advocate General was the only lawful court of last resort in all court-martial cases, and as such supreme—not subordinate even to the Secretary of War or the President. That view he pressed upon his subordinates while they were acting under General Orders, No. 7. These orders he insisted were wrong in legal principle. This persistence in opposing the announced and final decision of the Secretary of War was marked, and continued with gradually decreasing obtrusiveness until Gen. Ansell departed for Europe in April, 1918. Gen. Ansell's assertion that, during this period, he was relieved from duty in connection with the administration of military justice is not based upon fact. He never was so relieved, nor were his duties in the Judge Advocate General's Office ever curtailed in the slightest degree by the Secretary of War, the Chief of Staff, or the Judge Advocate General. While it is true that, in November, 1917, the Secretary of War was desirous, and expressed the hope, that Gen. Crowder might give more of his time to the office of the Judge Advocate General, it has been seen that the duties of the Provost Marshal General's office prevented. From February until April, 1918, Gen. Ansell's duties and authority remained undiminished, except in so far as he voluntarily failed to have anything whatever to do with the operation of General Orders, No. 7.

Upon his return from Europe in July, Gen. Ansell gave the provisions of General Orders, No. 7, the same liberal interpretation that prevailed when the orders first became effective. While the provisions of General Orders, No. 84, were contrary to the interpretation of section 1199, Revised Statutes, as approved by the Secretary of War, the administration of military justice did not suffer during the period that those orders remained in force.

Until recently, what was first a mere difference of opinion went no further. The opposing views were urged with force, but with dignity. Such opposition as existed was an opposition of opinion, of judgment, and not of personality. There was no diffusion of energies nor conflict of loyalties. The work was carried on with marked diligence and unanimity of purpose by all concerned.

The disagreement did not at any time affect the functioning of the machinery to which it related. It is clear that all the recommendations of Gen. Ansell received most careful consideration by the War Department and there has not been a single instance, except with respect to section 1199, Revised Statutes, and the fiftieth article of war, where his recommendations on matters of policy relating to the administration of military justice have not been adopted in whole or in part.

Recently, there has developed, among the officers now in the Judge Advocate General's Office, a feeling of resentment over the one-sided and unfair discussion of the whole matter in the public press. The testimony to that effect comes in part from officers who concur, or at least concurred originally, in Gen. Ansell's construction of the statute. Most of those officers are lawyers who left positions of prominence at the bar, on the bench, or the faculties of colleges of law to accept their commissions. They have labored with unceasing diligence. They have reviewed all of the thousands of general court-martial cases. Needless to say, not being military men, their intellectual medium of examination, their standard of justice (if there is more than one such standard), has been that of the civilian rather than the soldier.

Feeling as they do that they have accomplished their mission, which has been to prevent injustice, they do not take kindly to an attack from any source, especially from the man who, more than anyone else, has directed their energies. They frankly point out certain errors and weaknesses of the system. What they resent is the fact that, so far, those errors and weaknesses, the existence of which has been demonstrated by the war, have been the only aspect of the situation which has been presented to the public by their own chief; by that one of their number who, more than any other, was qualified to speak of the good points of the system as well as the bad. But this feeling of resentment, now existing, is restrained and repressed. Its effect, if any, on the work of the office is negligible.

Gen. Crowder did not let the difference of opinion interfere with his sense of duty and justice to Gen. Ansell, as is indicated in his letter of January 2, 1919, to The Adjutant General, recommending Gen. Ansell for a distinguished-service medal as follows (Exhibit 153):

"I recommend that Brig. Gen. Samuel T. Ansell, Judge Advocate General's Department, United States Army, be presented the distinguished-service medal for exceptionally meritorious service to the Government as acting head of the Judge Advocate General's Department during this war.

"Gen. Ansell's services have been, in my judgment, preeminently of the kind that the statute contemplates thus to be awarded. His duties have been of fundamental importance and great responsibility, and he has shown himself exceptionally qualified in the performance of them. His legal ability, his general qualifications and attainments, his personality, energy, and capacity for scientific organization and vigorous administration, his judgment and prevision, enabled him at the outset to appreciate and encompass the legal duties involved in the raising, maintenance, and administration of a vast military establishment, and to organize the department for the proper performance of those duties. Those same qualities have enabled him at all times to perform them in a way that has appreciably contributed to victory.

"His hundreds, even thousands, of thoughtful opinions on the records of the department show that he has been a powerful instrument in aiding in the organization of the new establishment within the law, in keeping it within its proper relation to civil instructions and the law of the land, in conforming military administration to the requirements of law, and in maintaining law and justice within the Army. This he has done without placing impediments in the way of rightful administration, but instead, such administration has been given legal direction and effectual impulse."

He then related in detail those accomplishments of Gen. Ansell which were the basis for the above remarks.

"(3) To what extent, if at all, has the presentation of facts with regard to the administration of military justice, either to the Secretary of War or to the public, been affected by failure of cooperation in the Office of The Judge Advocate General?" (Exhibit 1.)

The disagreement has had no effect upon the presentation of facts to the Secretary of War. It has, however, created in the minds of the public incorrect ideas as to the administration of military justice. During the entire controversy, until the occasion of the appearance of Gen. Ansell before the Senate Military Committee, the records are free from intemperate language or apparent disposition to question honesty of purpose. In giving to the Senate Military Committee, and thereby to the public, full and complete information, and expressing his views fully and freely, Gen. Ansell performed his full duty and rendered a real service to the Army and to the country. In his testimony before the Senate committee and in his letter to Representative Burnett, Gen. Ansell made statements, some of which were exaggerated and misleading, and without apparent cause or provocation referred to the Judge Advocate General, the Chief of Staff, and the Secretary of War in terms which were intemperate, disrespectful, and insubordinate. His letter to Representative Burnett was admittedly called forth by criticisms of Gen. Ansell made by Mr. Burnett on the floor of Congress. With respect to the exchange of these personal recriminations between Gen. Crowder and Ansell, unfortunate as they are, the public is not concerned. They are not covered in this report. The public has been misled by Gen. Ansell's magnifying certain admitted defects in isolated cases, as a result of which the administration of military justice has been brought under severe criticism, some of which is, but most of which is not, deserved.

"(4) Any other defects of administration or conduct which appear on investigation proper to be called to my attention in order that effective organization may be made of all the forces of the Judge Advocate General's Office for the performance of its duties." (Exhibit 1.)

There have been no defects of administration or conduct which should be called to the attention of the Secretary of War, requiring any change in the organization of the Judge Advocate General's Office for the performance of its duties.

WAR DEPARTMENT,
Washington, May 12, 1919.

From: The Secretary of War.

To: The Inspector General of the Army.

Subject: Investigation of controversies pertaining to the office of the Judge Advocate General.

I return herewith the report of the Inspector General of the Army, dated May 8, covering the investigation of controversies pertaining to the office of the Judge Advocate General, directed by my memorandum of March 7, 1919.

This report is thoroughgoing and complete and deals in the most satisfactory way with all the questions submitted. It should be filed in the office of the Inspector General to be available for use in connection with the various studies now being made by agencies created by the War Department and by outside bodies with a view to suggesting betterments in the substance and administration of military law. Pending the completion of those studies and the presentation of the matter in full to the Congress, no present action will be taken upon the report.

EXHIBIT 1.

WAR DEPARTMENT,
Washington, March 7, 1919.

Memorandum for the Inspector General.

Certain controversies have arisen with regard to the presentation of facts growing out of the administration of military justice to the Secretary of War and with regard to the administration of military justice itself in the office of the Judge Advocate General during the war. It may be roughly said that these controversies began with the presentation of a brief in behalf of a certain construction of section 1199 of the Revised Statutes of the United States by Gen. Ansell and reply brief thereto by Gen. Crowder. The legal question involved in that difference of opinion was definitely settled by the Secretary of War and need be given no consideration in the inquiry which you are herein directed to make.

It is conceded that the curative power of clemency existed in the President and the Secretary of War, and that in the first instance the Secretary of War and the President rely upon the Judge Advocate General's office for recommendations growing out of their examination of records of court-martial trials. I therefore desire to have you conduct a thorough investigation into the following questions:

(1) What machinery was organized in the office of the Judge Advocate General for the effective consideration of records with a view to making appropriate recommendations for clemency?

(2) To what extent, if at all, has the making of such recommendations for clemency, or otherwise properly administering the business of military justice, been affected by the difference of opinion with regard to the interpretation of section 1199 of the Revised Statutes of the United States?

(3) To what extent, if at all, has the presentation of facts with regard to the administration of military justice, either to the Secretary of War or to the public, been affected by failure of cooperation in the office of the Judge Advocate General?

(4) Any other defects of administration or conduct which appear on investigation proper to be called to my attention in order that effective reorganizations may be made of all the forces of the Judge Advocate General's office for the performance of its duties.

In making the foregoing inquiries you will proceed on the fact that I recognize fully the right of any officer in the Military Establishment to testify frankly and fully upon any matter as to which he may be interrogated by a committee of the Congress, and do not desire any adverse inference to be drawn from the fact of such testimony where it is frank and straightforward.

Please proceed with the inquiry at your earliest convenience and report the facts in full to me.

MARCH 8, 1919.

Memorandum for Brig. Gen. S. T. Ansell.

I have been directed by the Secretary of War to investigate certain controversies which have arisen in the Office of the Judge Advocate General with regard to the administration of military justice during the war.

In making this investigation I shall proceed on the fact of full recognition of the right of any officer in the Military Establishment to testify frankly and fully upon any matter as to which he may be interrogated by a committee of the Congress, and no adverse inference will be drawn from the fact of such testimony when same has been given in good faith.

At the time that your testimony was given before the Military Committee of the Senate I was absent from Washington—ill in Florida. I therefore have almost no information as to the controversy as it appeared in the public press, but from comments which have appeared I judge that there have arisen certain questions as to facts. All such questions will be fully considered in this investigation. The investigation will also embrace generally the administration of the Judge Advocate General's department in so far as same pertains to matters of military justice.

Conceding that the curative power of clemency exists in the President and the Secretary of War, and that in the first instance the Secretary of War and the President rely upon the Judge Advocate General's office for recommendations growing out of their examination of records of court-martial trials, information is requested as follows:

1. What machinery has been organized during the present emergency in the Office of the Judge Advocate General for the consideration of records with a view to making appropriate recommendations for clemency?

2. Has such machinery functioned satisfactorily and effectively? If not, wherein has it failed, and reasons for same?

After examining the records in the case I will take the matter up with you with a view to clearing up any disputed points. In the meantime, if you desire to submit any statement, I should be glad to have it. I should also be glad to have any information, written or otherwise, which may bear upon this controversy, as well as the names of any witnesses who may have information of value.

Inspector General.

WAR DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE JUDGE ADVOCATE GENERAL,
Washington, March 10, 1919.

Memorandum for the Inspector General of the Army.

Responding to your memorandum of the 8th, I beg to say:

1. You state no specific controversy or issue which you are to investigate or to which I could intelligently address a statement if I deemed it advisable so to do.

2. If, as seems to be the case, the investigation has to do with my statement before the Senate Committee on Military Affairs, that statement for which, of course, I am responsible, speaks for itself.

3. Above all, however, it is my judgment that any adequate and helpful investigation of the existing system of military justice and the administration of it during this war falls beyond your province. That subject, my attitude toward it, and my connection with it are not when fairly considered particular incidents to which your special capacity of inquiry can be properly applied; they are extradepartmental; they involve fundamental and general considerations of law and justice, the scope of which can not justly be confined to the War Department or any bureau of it, and which are entirely beyond your legal competency.

4. Besides whatever of controversy has arisen upon these fundamental considerations, concerning which I have given expression to my views, directly involves the Secretary of War, whose subordinate you are. Even more, it directly involves you and your office as well. I beg to remind you what the record will show, that in my original endeavor made near the beginning of the war to subject courts-martial to departmental supervision and control, the Secretary of War, the Assistant Chief of Staff, the Judge Advocate General, and the Inspector General opposed. I had occasion then, in a brief filed with the Secretary of War and read into my recent statement before the committee, to comment upon the views of these military advisers of the Secretary of War and to pronounce them professional absolutists upon this question of military justice. They and you stood upon the one side of this so-called controversy and I upon the other. I can not, therefore, but regard you and your office as disqualified to make a full, fair, and impartial investigation.

5. Knowing nothing specific of the subject, scope, and purpose of your investigation, and excepting, as I do and for the reasons given, to your jurisdictional competency, and likewise to your fair qualifications, to make such an investigation as that which you contemplate, affecting me, I am not inclined to have aught to do with it voluntarily.

Record of a general court-martial convened at Fort Bliss, Tex., pursuant to paragraph 13, Special Orders, No. 240, Headquarters, Southern Department, August 31, 1917, in the cases of various noncommissioned officers and privates charged with mutiny. Trial was held September 17, 1917, at Fort Bliss, Tex. Sentences approved October 16, 1917, by Maj. Gen. John W. Ruckman, National Army, commanding:

General Court-Martial Order No. 1174.

HEADQUARTERS SOUTHERN DEPARTMENT,
Fort Sam Houston, Tex., October 16, 1917.

Before a general court-martial which convened at Fort Bliss, Tex., pursuant to paragraph 13 Special Orders, No. 240, Headquarters, Southern Department, August 31, 1917, were arraigned and tried:

Pvts. Clarence Mahen, Calvin Kunselman, Ralph K. Green, Wilfred Kight, John J. Poryanda, Frank J. Adamik, John Van De Vooren, Orel Perrier, Andrew J. Brown, Wilburn L. Monson, Henry C. Park, William F. Hess, Roger Graves, and Rupert P. Orndorff, all of Battery A, 18th Field Artillery.

Charge: Violation of the sixty-sixth article of war.

Specification: In that Sergts. Clarence Mahen, Calvin Kunselman, Ralph K. Green, Wilfred Kight, John J. Poryanda, Frank J. Adamik, John Van De Vooren, Orel Perrier, Corpls. Andrew J. Brown, Wilburn L. Monson, Henry C. Park, William F. Hess, Roger Graves, and Rupert P. Orndorff, all of Battery A, 18th Field Artillery, acting jointly, and in the pursuance of a common intent, did, at Camp Fort Bliss, El Paso, Tex., on or about the 22d day of August, 1917, voluntarily join in a mutiny which had been begun in Battery A, 18th Field Artillery, against the authority of First Lieut. Harry A. Harvey, the commanding officer thereof, and did refuse to assemble for drill.

PLEAS.

Each: To the specification and charge. "Not guilty."

FINDINGS.

Pvt. Clarence Mahen, Battery A, Eighteenth Field Artillery: Of the specification and charge, "Guilty."

Pvt. Calvin Kunselman, Battery A, Eighteenth Field Artillery: Of the specification and charge, "Guilty."

Pvt. Ralph K. Green, Battery A, Eighteenth Field Artillery: Of the specification and charge, "Guilty."

Pvt. Wilfred Kight, Battery A, Eighteenth Field Artillery: Of the specification and charge, "Guilty."

Pvt. John J. Poryanda, Battery A, Eighteenth Field Artillery: Of the specification and charge, "Guilty."

Pvt. Frank J. Adamik, Battery A, Eighteenth Field Artillery: Of the specification and charge, "Guilty."

Pvt. John Van De Vooren, Battery A, Eighteenth Field Artillery: Of the specification and charge, "Guilty."

Pvt. Orel Perrier, Battery A, Eighteenth Field Artillery: Of the specification and charge, "Not guilty."

Pvt. William F. Hess, Battery A, Eighteenth Field Artillery: Of the specification and charge: "Not guilty."

Pvt. Roger Graves, Battery A, Eighteenth Field Artillery: Of the specification and charge: "Guilty."

Pvt. Rupert P. Orndorff, Battery A, Eighteenth Field Artillery: Of the specification and charge: "Guilty."

SENTENCE.

Pvts. Clarence Maheu, Wilfred Kight, and Frank J. Adamik, Battery A, Eighteenth Field Artillery, each to be dishonorably discharged the service, to forfeit all pay and allowances due or to become due while in confinement under this sentence, and to be confined at hard labor at such place as the reviewing authority may direct, for seven years.

Pvts. Calvin Kunselman, Ralph K. Green, John Van De Vooren, Andrew J. Brown, and Rupert P. Orndorff, Battery A, Eighteenth Field Artillery, each to be dishonorably discharged the service, to forfeit all pay and allowances due or to become due while in confinement under this sentence, and to be confined at hard labor at such place as the reviewing authority may direct for four years.

Pvt. Roger Graves, Battery A, Eighteenth Field Artillery, to be dishonorably discharged the service, to forfeit all pay and allowances due or to become due while in confinement under this sentence, and to be confined at hard labor at such place as the reviewing authority may direct for three years.

Pvt. John J. Poryanda, Battery A, Eighteenth Field Artillery, to be dishonorably discharged the service, to forfeit all pay and allowances due or to become due while in confinement under this sentence, and to be confined at hard labor at such place as the reviewing authority may direct for five years. (Three previous convictions considered.)

And the court therefore acquits the accused Pvts. Orel Perrier, Wilburn L. Monson, Henry C. Park, and William F. Hess, all of Battery A, Eighteenth Field Artillery.

In the foregoing case of Pvts. Clarence Maheu, Calvin Kunselman, Ralph K. Green, Wilfred Kight, John J. Poryanda, Frank J. Adamik, John Van De Vooren, Andrew J. Brown, Roger Graves, and Rupert P. Orndorff, all of Battery A, Eighteenth Field Artillery, the sentence of each is approved and will be duly executed. The United States Disciplinary Barracks, Fort Leavenworth, Kans., is designated as the place of confinement. The acquittal in the case of Pvts. Orel Perrier, Wilburn L. Monson, Henry C. Park, and William F. Hess, all of Battery A, Eighteenth Field Artillery, is approved (201, J. A., S. D.).

EXHIBIT 5.

WAR DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE JUDGE ADVOCATE GENERAL,
Washington, October 30, 1917.

Memorandum for The Adjutant General.

Subject: Trial of Pvts. Clarence Maheu, Calvin Kunselman, Ralph K. Green, Wilfred Kight, John J. Poryanda, Frank J. Adamik, John Van De Vooren, Orel Perrier, Andrew J. Brown, Wilburn L. Monson, Henry C. Park, William F. Hess, Roger Graves, and Rupert P. Orndorff, all of Battery A, Eighteenth Field Artillery.

1. The men named above were tried by a general court-martial at Fort Bliss, Tex., September 17, 1917, for violation of the sixty-sixth article of war. There was but one specification under the charge, in which it is alleged that these men "acting jointly and in pursuance of a common intent did, at Camp First Bliss, El Paso, Tex., on or about the 22d day of August, 1917, voluntarily join in a mutiny which had been begun in Battery A, Eighteenth Field Artillery, against the authority of First Lieut. Harry A. Harvey, the commanding officer thereof, and did refuse to assemble for drill."

The first eight of the accused were sergeants at the time of the commission of the alleged offense and the remainder were corporals, but between the date of the charges and the date of trial a regimental order had been issued reducing all of them to the grade of private. A copy of this order was introduced in evidence and made a part of the record, and they were found and sentenced as privates. The court found Pvts. Maheu, Kunselman, Green, Kight, Poryanda, Adamik, Van De Voren, Brown, Graves, and Orndorff guilty as charged, and found Pvts. Perrier, Monson, Park, and Hess not guilty. The court pronounced sentence as follows:

Pvts. Maheu, Kight, and Adamik "each to be dishonorably discharged the service, to forfeit all pay and allowances due or to become due while in confinement under this sentence, and to be confined at hard labor at such place as the reviewing authority may direct for seven years."

Pvt. Poryanda to be dishonorably discharged, to forfeit pay and allowances as above, and to be confined at hard labor for five years.

Pvts. Kunselman, Green, Van De Vooren, Brown, and Orndorff to be dishonorably discharged, to forfeit pay and allowances as above, and to be confined at hard labor for four years.

Pvt. Graves to be dishonorably discharged, to forfeit pay and allowances as above, and to be confined at hard labor for three years.

Pvts. Perrier, Monson, Park, and Hess were acquitted.

The reviewing authority approved the finding, sentences and acquittal, and designated the United States Disciplinary Barracks, Fort Leavenworth, Kans., as the place of confinement (G. C. M. O. No. 1174, Headquarters Southern Department, Fort Sam Houston, Tex., Oct. 16, 1917).

2. A simple narrative, gleaned from the record, of the events leading up to and constituting the alleged mutiny may be stated as follows: On the evening of August 21, 1917, Capt. Harry A. Harvey was the commanding officer of Battery A, Eighteenth Field Artillery, the organization to which these men belonged. About 7.15 or 7.30 of that evening Capt. Harvey in passing through the streets of his battery noticed, as he states, that practically all of the men present in the battery at that hour were congregated around a "crap game" in the battery street. The number of those actually playing does not appear; neither does it appear that there was any disturbance or disorder as a result of the game. He stopped this game and ordered all the men then present in the battery to go to bed and put out their lights. He further placed, not only these men, but all other men of his battery in arrest, whether present or not, and appears to have directed that as fast as the men returned to camp they should be directed to report to their tents in arrest. The only justification found in the record for this extraordinary action on the part of Capt. Harvey is contained in this statement, made by him while testifying as a witness:

"The reason was—I would like to change that last. There were two reasons: First, that I might get the battery together and have all the men present the next day, and, second, to prevent a recurrence of a rather general disorder and fight which had occurred two nights previous to this between mine and the adjoining battery, which had required the personal attendance of the officer of the day and the commanding officer of Battery B, which kept the latter up until about 3 a. m. of that morning, and finally necessitated his putting a guard on with night sticks."

There is no allegation and nothing in the record upon which to found a belief that the noncommissioned officers who were tried and convicted, as above set out, were engaged in this disturbance that Capt. Harvey referred to, or that they were participants in the "crap game," which seems to have been the immediate cause of the general arrest ordered by him. It clearly appears from the record that he intended to include in this general order of arrest the entire personnel of his battery from the first sergeant down, although the first sergeant was at the time absent from the post with a provost guard in the city of El Paso. (See p. —.) The next morning at reveille some of the noncommissioned officers of the battery did not leave their tents, but others did, and, of the latter, some, at least, had not then learned of the status of arrest in which the battery had been placed. Similarly, at the formation of the battery for stables, some of the noncommissioned officers formed with the battery for this duty and others did not. Between stables and the formation of the battery for morning drill, the first sergeant seems to have been made aware that the noncommissioned officers of the battery, other than himself, were laboring under a belief that while in the status of arrest it was not proper for them to perform duty, and he sent a message to this effect to the battery commander, who directed the first sergeant to report to him in person. Just what report the first sergeant made to the battery commander does not appear, but the record shows that the battery commander told the first sergeant to release the noncommissioned officers from arrest "until after drill." The first sergeant then returned to the battery and summoned all the noncommissioned officers to report at the battery office, which they did. He told them that Capt. Harvey had directed that they be released from arrest until after drill. Here again the record does not afford a clear indication of just what happened, but it may be inferred, from what is shown, that these noncommissioned officers protested against the performance of duty until their status of arrest had been definitely terminated. Practically all of the noncommissioned officers who testified as witnesses and who were present at the battery office at this time agree in stating that the first sergeant told them, as they were leaving the office, that he was sending for the battery commander and that they were to "stick around until the battery commander comes." The first sergeant states that he did not make this remark, but claims to have said, "all right, I'll send for the battery commander." At any rate, he appears to have sounded the call for drill, which consisted of two long blasts on a whistle, immediately after this gathering which he had ordered. While the privates of the battery formed for drill, the noncommissioned officers remained near the battery office in a group, where, as they state, the first sergeant had told them to "stick." Capt. Harvey then appeared upon the scene. He states that he went immediately "to the orderly room of the battery and met the first sergeant and asked him what the trouble was." The first sergeant told him that the men were not going to drill, and immediately thereafter stepped toward these noncommissioned officers, who were still standing near the battery office, and said: "Are you men going to drill?" The testimony indicates that there were some replies of "No" from the assembled noncommissioned officers. They explain this by stating that they did not intend to refuse to go to drill, but only to indicate that they did not believe it was proper to require them to attend drill in their official capacities until their status of arrest had been properly terminated. The captain testified that at this point he told the first sergeant "not to ask the men if they were going to drill, to order them to go to drill," and that the first sergeant then began to order them individually to go to drill. The exact form of the order which was given at this time does not appear from the record, but the captain states that after he had ordered about half of them personally and individually to go to drill, "I told him that that would be sufficient, and then I talked to the men for several minutes, I should say probably four or five minutes about the situation." The testimony of other witnesses here is that the first sergeant ordered from two to five or six of the men to go to drill. Capt. Harvey states that in this talk he explained to the men "that they were committing a grave offense, that their conduct was mutinous, and that the crime of mutiny was next to treason, the most serious in the category. I told them that in my opinion they would probably receive as much as 10 years' punishment if they were convicted."

After finishing this talk Capt. Harvey does not appear to have given any further order to any of these men, either collectively or individually, to join their battery for drill, but states that he walked away from the men and went a short distance, where, after remaining in thought "a moment or two," he called the first sergeant and asked him "if he was sure that he told these men that they were released from arrest," and that, having received a reply in the affirmative, he waited "about a minute longer" and then "told them to fall in a column of file," and marched them personally to the guard tent and turned them over to the officer of the day. There appears to have been no disturbance of any kind when this order was given or refusal, in any form, to obey the same.

3. The situation thus presented is deplorable in the extreme. Capt. Harvey is a young officer, having graduated from the Military Academy in 1915. The accused men were all serving in their first enlistment. Maneu enlisted September 19, 1913; Kunselman, December 27, 1913; Green, November 20, 1916; Kight, January 14, 1916; Poryanda, July 20, 1915; Adamik, February 10, 1916; Van De Vooren, February 7, 1916; Brown, November 23, 1914; Graves, December 12, 1916; and Orndorff, December 22, 1913. The general character of these men is shown by the fact that only one of them (Poryanda), was there any evidence of previous convictions. The only fair inference that can be drawn from the record is that these men were of a desirable type and constituted excellent soldiers in the making. Simple justice demands that their careers should not be blighted and a most heinous military crime fastened upon them unless the proof of its commission is clear and unmistakable.

It is not clear upon just what authority they acted in believing, as they seem to have done, that noncommissioned officers in arrest are not required to attend drill, but this seems to be the clear intent of the regulations. Paragraph 929, Army Regulations, provides as follows: "* * * When placed in arrest they (noncommissioned officers) will not be required to perform any duty in which they may be called upon to exercise authority or control over others, and when placed in confinement they will not be sent out to work."

Winthrop, in discussing the arrest of noncommissioned officers, states that "the phrase, 'placed in arrest' evidently imparts a mode of arrest similar to that prescribed for officers," and in discussing the status of an officer in arrest, he remarks: "An arrest once duly imposed detaches the officer from the functions of his office. He may not assume to command or to perform any military duty." Whatever the exact status of these noncommissioned officers may have been as a result of the order placing them in arrest, it is clear that the regulations do not contemplate that a noncommissioned officer, once placed in arrest, shall be required, while this status continues, to perform the functions which pertain to his office. To release a noncommissioned officer from arrest for a period of drill or other duty to enable him to perform duty which he could not properly perform while in arrest is but to trifle with the law.

4. These men have been charged with and convicted of a very serious military offense. Mutiny is a thing not lightly to be considered in the military service, and when it occurs must be punished severely. There is little to indicate in this case, however, that anything approaching mutiny was really intended by these noncommissioned officers. Winthrop defines mutiny: "* * * as consisting in an unlawful opposition or resistance to, or defiance of superior military authority, with a deliberate purpose to usurp, subvert, or override the same." (Vol. II, p. 892.)

The thing which distinguishes a mutiny from other offenses of a military character is the intent "to usurp, subvert, or override" superior military authority. Conduct may well be mutinous, "such as defiant behavior or threatening language toward superiors, muttering or murmuring against the restraints of military discipline, * * * or declining to perform service in the honest belief that the term of enlistment has expired" (Id. p. 893) without actually amounting to mutiny. In commenting upon offenses of this character, Winthrop further says: "Such disorders, stopping short of overt acts of resistance, or not characterized by a deliberate intent to overthrow superior authority, do not constitute in general the legal offense of mutiny, but are commonly to be treated as 'conduct to the prejudice of good order and military discipline.'" (Id. p. 894.)

He further states: "The definition of mutiny at military law is indeed best illustrated by a reference to the adjudged cases treating of that offense as understood at maritime law," and cites several cases which have been held not to constitute mutiny, such as "violence against the officer, without proof of intent to override his authority," or "mere disobedience of orders, unaccompanied by such intent." It is clear from what has been said that the conduct of these men did not amount to mutiny, but that it was merely mutinous, and that the same should have been charged as an offense under the ninety-sixth article of war.

5. With reference to Capt. Harvey, it should be stated that his conduct in this case was opposed both to law and the regulations. The sixty-ninth article of war, dealing with arrest and confinement, provides in part as follows: " * * * A soldier charged with crime or with a serious offense under the Articles of War shall be placed in confinement, and when charged with a minor offense he may be placed in arrest."

The authority to place soldiers in arrest is predicated, therefore, upon a commission by them of an "offense." If one or more men, acting singly or in concert, commit an offense, one or all may be placed in arrest; and if an entire battery should join in committing the same offense, it would be a proper exercise of authority to place the entire battery in arrest. It would not be proper, however, to place an entire battery in arrest merely for the purpose of "having all the men present the next day." Neither would it be proper to place an entire battery in arrest in order to prevent the occurrence of some anticipated event. The result desired in either of these cases should be accomplished in some other and proper manner. The Army Regulations provide in paragraph 2 that "military authority will be exercised with firmness, kindness, and justice," and in paragraph 3 that "superiors are forbidden to injure those under their authority by tyrannical or capricious conduct or by abusive language." In considering all the elements of this case, the conclusion is inevitable that the conduct of Capt. Harvey in placing his battery in arrest was not only capricious and unwarranted, but that it resulted in bringing about a situation which an officer of greater experience would have avoided, and which placed a number of young soldiers in a situation they did not understand and which formed the basis of an alleged offense they did not intend to commit. Nothing could be clearer than that these men did not intend to mutiny, but were merely seeking to ascertain from their commanding officer why they had been placed in arrest and whether or not it was proper for them to attend drill while their status of arrest had not been terminated but only suspended during the period of the duty which they had been directed to attend. One of these noncommissioned officers, Sergt. Mahen it appears in the evidence, attempted to speak to the battery commander on this subject when he approached them near the battery office. The testimony is that the captain told his sergeant to shut up; that he would do the talking; and that all the others remained quiet until marched off to the guardhouse. It appears of record that Capt. Harvey did not ask or order these men to join their battery for duty after he had explained to them the nature of their conduct, but merely waited a brief interval for action on their part. This not being taken within the minute or so during which he so waited, he formed them in line and marched them to the guardhouse and turned them over to the officer of the day. Clearly the conduct of the men was not mutiny, but the conduct of the officer, under all the circumstances indicated and of the fact that he was dealing with young and inexperienced men, was not creditable to him or to the service of which he forms a part.

6. The conduct of this case on the part of the prosecution is also open to grave censure. Indeed, the atmosphere that seems to have surrounded the trial of this case was such that it is impossible to believe that the defendants were given a fair trial. The conduct and attitude of the judge advocate (the court permitting) were arbitrary, oppressive, and injurious to those rights of the defendants which the law attempts to guarantee. His conduct was calculated to intimidate the witnesses for the defense to the point where the whole course of justice is rendered uncertain. (Record, pp. 30, 34, 36, 38, 40, 44, 45, 49, 54.) Fairness of trial suffered; fundamental rights were trespassed upon.

7. Inasmuch as the substantive offense charged does not appear to have been made out by the evidence of record; inasmuch, further, as the situation in which these men were placed and out of which charges against them grew resulted largely from the unwarranted and capricious conduct of a very youthful and inexperienced officer; and inasmuch, finally, as the record of this case impresses me with the belief that the accused were not given a fair trial, in the exercise of the power of revision conferred upon me by section 1199, Revised Statutes of the United States, I hereby set aside the judgment of conviction and the sentence in the case of each of these several defendants and recommend that the necessary orders be issued restoring each of them to duty.

S. T. ANSELL,
Acting Judge Advocate General.

EXHIBIT 6.

WAR DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE INSPECTOR GENERAL,
Washington, November 15, 1917.

Memorandum for the Chief of Staff:

1. The court, consisting of seven field officers and five captains, embraced what I believe to be a personnel well above the average of military courts.

The accused were represented by counsel, presumably of their own choice, and, so far as appears, this counsel has made no claim to the reviewing authority that the men did not receive a fair trial.

2. While the conduct of the case is, as stated by the Acting Judge Advocate General, open to grave censure, yet it can not be assumed that the members of this court were influenced thereby in their action.

It is also true that Capt. Harvey, the battery commander, is an officer of very short service and that his actions in this case were ill-advised, unjustifiable, and clearly demonstrate his unfitness to command men.

3. Stripped of all technicalities, the evidence is believed to show conclusively that these men, in concert, deliberately refused and failed, and persisted in failing, to obey the orders of their commanding officer, and that they did this in the presence of the entire battery. There is, and can be no doubt as to the fact that they fully understood that they were disobeying orders.

4. The action proposed by the Acting Judge Advocate General, would, in my judgment, have a most demoralizing effect upon discipline. It is believed that these men are guilty of an offense which, under normal peace conditions, would be very serious and which, under war conditions, is even more so, but, in view of the actions of the battery commander, and of the whole circumstances surrounding the case, the exercise of clemency by the Secretary of War appears to be demanded.

It is suggested: First, that the unexpired portion of their sentences be remitted and that they be restored to duty as privates, if same can be done legally; Second, that Capt. Harvey be severely reprimanded and that he be relieved from command of Battery A, Eighteenth Field Artillery, if this has not already been done, and that he be assigned to duty elsewhere.

EXHIBIT 7.

WAR DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE CHIEF OF STAFF,
Washington, November 13, 1917.

Memorandum for the Chief of Staff.

Subject: Authority of the Judge Advocate General to set aside the judgment of conviction and the sentences of a general court-martial.

1. Herewith are the proceedings of a general court-martial held in the cases of 14 enlisted men of Battery A, Eighteenth Field Artillery, charged with the crime of mutiny, together with an opinion of the Judge Advocate General, which concludes as follows:

* * * "In the exercise of the power of revision conferred upon me by section 1199, Revised Statutes of the United States, I hereby set aside the judgment of conviction and the sentence in the case of each of these several defendants, and recommend that the necessary orders be issued restoring each of them to duty."

2. The case is one involving a most flagrant miscarriage of justice. The men were tried for mutiny, when they had not committed mutiny. They were driven into the situation which served as a basis of the charge by the unwarranted and capricious conduct of a young officer commanding the battery, who had barely two years' service. In fair justice to the men accused there should and it would seem must be some agency with power to restore them to the status possessed by them prior to their trial and conviction.

3. It is hardly within the province of the undersigned to express an opinion as to the legality of the action indicated by the Judge Advocate General, but a careful reading of the extended opinion of the Judge Advocate General on the exercise of his power under section 1199, Revised Statutes, and submitted under date of November 10, 1917, for the personal consideration of the Secretary of War. leads to the conviction that his authority to act in the manner stated is undoubted.

4. When officers of the Regular Army of long experience, such as most of the members of the general court-martial in question, commit such grave errors as are indicated in this case, how much more danger of miscarriage of justice will there be at this time when the great majority of officers are new to the service and have little knowledge of military law or procedure. Therefore, in this time of war, it is considered highly expedient, as well as legal, that the power of the Judge Advocate General as herein expressed be fully exercised.

5. One criticism to the concurrence in the opinion of the Acting Judge Advocate General is that it may detract from the disciplinary power of commanding generals, who have the power to convene court-martials and review their proceedings; but in view of the fact that injustice has been done in the case in question as well as in many preceding cases, it is believed that the rendering of such justice is paramount and should overrule the above consideration.

6. Action is recommended as indicated in memorandum for The Adjutant General herewith.

NOVEMBER 13, 1917.

Memorandum for The Adjutant General.

Subject: Trial by court-martial of 14 enlisted men of Battery A, Eighteenth Field Artillery.

The Secretary of War directs that the action indicated in paragraph 7 of the attached memorandum from the Acting Judge Advocate General be executed and that the necessary orders be issued restoring to duty each of the men convicted and whose sentences were approved in General Court-martial Order No. 1174. Headquarters Southern Department, Fort Sam Houston, Tex., October 16, 1917.

WAR DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE CHIEF OF STAFF,
Washington, November 17, 1917.

Memorandum for the Chief of Staff:

The accompanying papers are the record of the trial by general court-martial of certain enlisted men of Battery A, Eighteenth Field Artillery, on the charge of mutiny, in violation of the sixty-sixth article of war.

There are two phases of the case which merit careful consideration before the action taken and recommended by the Acting Judge Advocate General is carried into effect.

First. The conclusion of the court.

Second. The action of the Acting Judge Advocate General under section 1199, Revised Statutes of the United States.

The court that tried these men was composed of 12 officers of experience. The senior member of the court was commissioned in 1884 and the junior member in 1904.

Mutiny is defined in Digest of Opinions of the Judge Advocate General as follows:

"Mutiny at military law may be defined to be an unlawful opposing or resisting of lawful authority, with intent to subvert the same, or to nullify or neutralize it for the time * * *."

The first sergeant, through whom the battery commander gave his orders, testified as follows:

Q. What signal did you give the battery to form?—A. Two long blasts of the whistle, sir.

Q. Was that signal generally understood by every member of the battery?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Did any of these accused men respond to that signal and fall in for drill?—A. Corpl. Parks was out in front of the battery sitting down.

Q. Did he remain with the battery from that time until the battery went out to drill?—A. No, sir.

Q. What did he do after that time?—A. He went over and joined the rest of the noncommissioned officers in front of the orderly room.

Q. After you gave these noncommissioned officers the instructions of the battery commander to the effect that they were released from arrest for the purpose of attending drill, were they given ample opportunity to join the battery and go to drill?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. What occurred, Sergeant, immediately after you gave them this order that they were released from arrest and would attend drill?—A. When I delivered the order, sir, all the noncommissioned officers filed out of the office, sir, and went down the other side of the orderly room. I lined the battery up, and there were no noncommissioned officers present. I went back over to the noncommissioned officers and asked them if they were going to drill or not, to which they replied: "No, not under those conditions of being released for just until after drill. * * *"

The action of these soldiers as testified to by the first sergeant, if true, seems to constitute mutiny as defined in Digest of Opinions as quoted above.

The lack of judgment of the battery commander undoubtedly created the situation which finally resulted in the trial of these soldiers. I can not, however, see that this lack of judgment on the part of the battery commander can justify the act of these soldiers. It may, in my judgment, very properly be taken into consideration in awarding sentence by the court and in action by the reviewing authority.

Gen. Ruckman, an officer of long experience, approved the sentence as awarded by the court. These men are at United States Disciplinary Barracks, Fort Leavenworth, Kans., serving sentence.

The proceedings of the court were sent to the office of the Judge Advocate General of the Army, who reviewed the case and concludes his review by stating:

"* * * In the exercise of the power of revision conferred upon me by section 1199, Revised Statutes of the United States, I hereby set aside the judgment of conviction and the sentence in the case of each of these several defendants, * * *"

Section 1199, enacted in 1866, provides as follows:

"The Judge Advocate General shall receive, revise, and cause to be recorded the proceedings of all courts-martial, courts of inquiry, and military commissions and perform such other duties as have been performed heretofore by the Judge Advocate General of the Army."

The Judge Advocate General concludes that the word "revise" in the above quoted statute gives him the authority to set aside and completely nullify the action of a court composed of 12 experienced officers, which action had been approved by the department commander.

The definition of "revise" as given in Standard Dictionary is as follows:

"To go over or look over or examine for the correction of errors or for the purpose of suggesting or making amendments, additions, or changes; reexamine; review."

As the authority exercised by the Judge Advocate General has, within the memory of the officers of the Army now on the active list, been exercised only by persons who have by law authority to exercise command, it is believed the intent of the law should be beyond question before such radical action is taken. It is believed doubtful if Revised Statutes, 1199, gives the Judge Advocate General the authority he has taken.

The justification for this belief is also found in the Articles of War, contained in the act of June 3, 1916. Articles 46 and 48 provide who have authority to carry into execution the sentence of courts-martial.

The commanders mentioned in articles 46 and 48 have power to disapprove a finding.

Nowhere in the Articles of War can I find the Judge Advocate General is given authority to nullify the acts of courts-martial. As the action of the Judge Advocate General, if permitted to stand, establishes a precedent which may be far-reaching in its bearing on the discipline of the Army, I recommend his action be disapproved.

If it be decided that the Judge Advocate General has the legal right to take the action taken, there is nothing to do but restore these men to duty and order them back to their battery.

I recommend that Capt. Harvey be informed that the evidence in the record of the trial of these men discloses the fact that he was entirely lacking in judgment in his handling of the men of his battery, not only at the time they committed the offense but the evening before; that the lack of discipline in his battery, which he must have known, should have indicated to him the necessity for absolute justice and the exercise of wise discretion in the handling of the situations that arose; and that he has been woefully lacking in some of the qualities his superiors have a right to expect of all officers, and especially one who has had the advantage he has had.

EXHIBIT 10.

MARCH 12, 1919.

Questions by Gen. J. L. Chamberlain; answers by Gen. E. H. Crowder.

Q. When you took up the duties of Provost Marshal General, leaving Col. Bethel, the senior officer in the Judge Advocate General's Office, in charge, was he given any specific instructions relative to the administration of the office in so far as it related to matters of military justice, or did he automatically take up those duties as senior officer?—A. The latter. As senior in the office he assumed charge, leaving it to be determined by the volume of work developed just how much of the burden of Judge Advocate General I could carry consistent with performing the duties of Provost Marshal General. The record of opinions in the office should disclose during this period the amount of attention I gave to the office of Judge Advocate General.

Q. About the middle of August, 1917, when Gen. Ansell became the senior assistant in the office of the Judge Advocate General, did he receive from you, either in writing or verbally, any specific instructions as to the administration of the office or did he assume those duties and perform them automatically as the senior officer?—A. The latter. I do not recall issuing any instructions on the subject at all, either orally or in writing.

Q. In November, 1917, at the time that the order appointing Gen. Ansell Acting Judge Advocate General, was revoked, at which time you resumed active charge of the office, did Gen. Ansell receive from you or, so far as you know, from the Secretary of War or the Chief of Staff any instructions relative to the duties which he should perform in the office, or did he automatically continue, as he had been doing before, his duties as senior officer?—A. I do not recall any such instructions, and his initiative and authority, previously exercised as senior officer, remained undisturbed. (Added.) The records of the office as to opinions signed and as to court-martial cases acted upon will disclose whether there are any exceptions to be made to the statement I have just recorded—that the initiative of Gen. Ansell was left undisturbed as senior officer.

Q. In some paper which I have recently examined I found a statement made by Gen. Ansell to the effect that upon the occasion referred to the duties and responsibilities pertaining to reviews of courts-martial and other matters connected with the administration of military justice were placed in the hands of his junior in the office, and that from that time until his departure for Europe—in fact, until his return from Europe—he had no responsibilities respecting the administration of military justice.—A. My recollections as to that are in substantial accord to the testimony of Col. E. G. Davis, then lieutenant colonel or major, who has covered this point fully in his testimony before the Senate Military Committee, and is to the general effect that he continued with undiminished authority in handling all matters arising in the section of military justice, and determined himself what cases would be passed up to me as needing my personal attention.

Q. Who was the junior officer to whom Gen. Ansell referred?—A. It must be Col. E. G. Davis.

Q. Upon his return from Europe, in July, 1918, did Gen. Ansell resume his duties in the office as the senior officer automatically, or did he receive from you definite instructions relative to the scope and limitations of such duties?—A. He received no such instructions and resumed his former relations with the office automatically.

Q. The point I wish to make is: Between November, 1917, and July, 1918, except during his absence in Europe, was Gen. Ansell performing his duties as senior officer in exactly the same unrestricted manner that he was prior to and subsequent to those dates?—A. Precisely; so far as I had any knowledge and I am not on my warning that he considered that he was in any way restricted, except in so far as he was restricted by the decision of the Secretary of War in section 1199 of Revised Statutes.

Q. He never actually exercised the authority which, under that statute, he claimed?—A. I believe that in more than a dozen cases which remained he exercised and promulgated decisions under that statute.

Q. This without having submitted for interpretation that statute to higher authority?—A. I think while the proper consideration of that was pending that he exercised the authority in probably more than a dozen cases.

Q. Do you recall whether or not the case of the noncommissioned officers of Field Artillery at El Paso was the first case in which he exercised or attempted to exercise this function?—A. I do not.

Q. From the records it appears that the order of November, 1917, detailing Gen. Ansell as Acting Judge Advocate General was never actually issued, or at least given publicity, but that it was a suspended order. Have you any knowledge as to the reasons for that peculiar way of handling an order; by whom, or why?—A. Why it was marked for suspended publication nearly two months later?

Q. Yes.—A. I have no idea. [Gen. Crowder, referring to this suspended order.] There was a memorandum of November 3 (I think the dates are accurate) from Gen. Ansell to me which was delivered to me in my office at Seventh Street, reciting the reasons why he thought an order should be issued under the provisions of 1132 of the Revised Statutes, relieving me from duty as Judge Advocate General and detailing himself as Acting Judge Advocate General. A reply from me on November 4, the following day. On November 6 the submission by him to the Acting Chief of Staff of a formal order necessary to accomplish my relief and his detail, concluding with the statement that he was authorized to say that the issue of this order would be agreeable to Gen. Crowder. The subsequent procedure I am not clear about, for I understand informally that the order submitted by Gen. Ansell was referred to the General Staff and reported back in a modified form. Whatever the facts may be an order of this character was approved by the Acting Chief of Staff, Gen. Biddle, and marked for suspended publication. The first information that I had that such an order had been approved and marked for suspended publication was about November 17, when I was informed of the fact by the Secretary of War in person, the occasion being an interview on the question of appointments to be made in the Judge Advocate General's Department. The Secretary of War passed to me a list of recommendations submitted by Gen. Ansell and asked me if I approved of that list. I glanced over it and saw that most of the names thereon were names of men whose qualifications I had personally inquired into. I handed the list back to the Secretary with the statement that the appointments recommended were, I thought, all well-qualified men. He then acquainted me with the fact that he had asked Gen. Ansell whether the list had my approval; that Gen. Ansell left his office and came back with a copy of this order that had been approved by the Acting Chief of Staff, Gen. Biddle, relieving me from duty as Judge Advocate General and detailing Gen. Ansell. It was the first information the Secretary said that he had had of the issue of such an order. At that time I acquainted the Secretary of War with the correspondence that had passed between Gen. Ansell and myself, recommending the issue of such an order, and my statement to Gen. Ansell in my letter that he should take the matter up directly with the Secretary of War in his own way. I said that, directly the Secretary of War, realizing that the question of who should be bureau chief was one upon which the Secretary of War would expect to function personally, and especially as to who should be Judge Advocate General, in view of the large civic jurisdiction of the Judge Advocate General not handled through the Chief of Staff at all. There followed some conversation between the Secretary of War and myself, which was supplemented, I understand, by conversation between the Secretary of War and the Acting Chief of Staff, Gen. Biddle, who undertook to state his personal recollection of the statements made by Gen. Ansell to him at the time he submitted this order. At that time I did not know that there was a written memorandum of submission of the question by Gen. Ansell to the Acting Chief of Staff, which written memorandum settles in a very definite way the representation that Gen. Ansell made to the Chief of Staff in regard to my personal attitude toward the subject.

Q. Did you have any conversation with Gen. Biddle at this time relative to the issuing of this order?—A. I do not remember; I may have had some conversation with him but do not recall it.

Q. So you do not know what lead to that peculiar situation of this suspended publication?—A. No. I remember that the impression that it made upon me was that perhaps that was customary at that time because of the rush of business and was a concession made to the Government printers as to the amount of printing they had to do.

MARCH 12, 1919.

Q. What was the procedure in the four death cases of the A. E. F.—A. When the records came in they went to the Disciplinary Section and were reviewed therein by Maj. Rand, a lawyer of New York City, recently commissioned in the Judge Advocate General's Department, who is a man who had had extensive criminal practice and was associated with Jerome of New York City in the trial of very important criminal cases which claimed the attention, at that time, of the Nation. He turned in a review all too brief. I thought, sustaining the proceedings. When the review reached me I remarked, to whom I can not say now, that the review in such an important case should be drawn in such a way as to show all the facts of the case necessary to convince the reader that the case had been examined with thoroughness and great care. I am here depending altogether upon my recollection, as I have not attempted to go through the records of the office and follow the administration as accurately as I might do after conference with the officers who were directly charged with this important line of work. Anyway, the cases went back with instructions for a more exhaustive review and when that review came up I was still in a doubtful frame of mind, not because of the insufficiency of the record, although I would have been glad if the cases had been tried with greater attention to that greater detail which the serious character of the offenses required, but I had before me a letter sent directly by the commanding general of the A. E. F., asking that the sentences should be approved and that he be given authority to carry them into execution. I carried the final review up to the Chief of Staff in person and had quite a prolonged conference with him.

The interview between us commenced with a statement by me to him to this general effect: "Gen. March, you are but recently returned from the theater of war. You know the conditions there first hand; you may have some personal knowledge of these cases. The extreme sentence of death has been imposed. They are the first sentences of this character to reach us from the theater of war. I know the public interest that will attach to these cases, and the public attention that will be given to any execution of these sentences. I know also how serious a thing it is to disagree with the commanding general of an army in the field on a question of this character. I have brought the cases to you with a report which concludes without a recommendation, because I wish to leave this question of clemency to be settled after conference between you and me; and later on between us and the Secretary of War. It would be very unfortunate if we went before the President in such a matter with divided counsel if it is possible for us to reach a common conclusion."

Gen. March then and there expressed a view on the cases. The extent to which he claimed personal knowledge of these cases is now dim in my mind, but that he knew generally of conditions over there and proclaimed that he had that knowledge is very distinct in my mind. He announced then his view that the sentences should be approved and carried into execution and that was his final state of mind at the end of the conference. This led me to leave the review with him in the form in which I submitted it, that is, with the statement that the records were sufficient but without a recommendation as to the course which should be pursued respecting clemency.

I returned to my office and gave orders to an officer, whose name I do not recall, but I think was Col. A. E. Clarke, to visit The Adjutant General's Office and obtain from the records of that office some facts respecting the ages of these boys, the length of their service, the amount of training they had, and also to examine our own office to see how many cases of disobedience of orders or sleeping on post had come up from the theater of war in which sentences of less severity had been given, and to examine generally into the rank of punishment. When Col. Clarke (if he were the man) reported back I was advised of the fact that two were under 20 and two under 19 and that they had short periods of service.

I was apprised of the fact that there had been other cases coming up from the theater of war, trials for these same offenses, and that in none of the cases had the death penalty been awarded. I was left in doubt in my own mind as to whether the officers of the A. E. F. had given these newly enlisted soldiers instructions as to the gravity of these two offenses—disobedience of orders and sleeping on post. Later, I submitted the case to Gen. Ansell, expressing to him the feeling that I had about the execution of these sentences, and asking him to submit me a memorandum. This he did in rough form, which is now in the hands of the Inspector General, and which speaks for itself. My recollection is that he submitted this memorandum on the 15th day of April, 1918, and that on the following day I submitted a supplemental memorandum on these cases incorporating what I thought was the essential part of Gen. Ansell's memorandum to me. My recollection is that the Chief of Staff had not reported on the cases and that when he did report he referred, not only to my original memorandum but to my supplemental memorandum.

In addition to what is stated here I had more than one conference with the Secretary of War as to the final action to be taken upon these cases in respect of clemency. My recollection is that there were three such conferences and that in the last conference between us the Secretary of War stated that his mind was made up not to execute the death penalty, notwithstanding Gen. Pershing's urgent request for authority to carry the sentences into execution.

Q. After his return from France Gen. Ansell issued certain written instructions to the boards which were operating in the department. Did any reason exist whereby he could not have issued those instructions or similar instructions in regard to any matters in the office, except during his absence?—A. No; as I was consulted on the orders he issued.

MARCH 17, 1919.

Q. Do you know the source of the article which appeared in the New York World on January 19?—A. I do not, but I do know personally the man under whose name it was published, Roland Thomas. He called at my office with the Secretary of War's visiting card, and asked to see a limited number of records, which I do not think exceeded six. I gave him access to the records and in the course of an hour, and I think in less than half an hour, he returned with two court-martial orders in his hand. At that time Col. Reed, the head of the Section of Military Justice, was in my office conferring with me. Mr. Thomas said, "Here is a confirmation of what the papers are saying, namely, that there is grave inequality of punishment. I have in my hand," he said, "two court martial orders showing proceedings in two cases tried in two courts at Camp Dix, N. J., both trials for desertion. In one case the man is sentenced to 25 years; in the other to six months." Col. Reed said to him, "Let me see those orders." Thomas passed them to Col. Reed, who looked at them and handed them back. That ended the conversation and Mr. Thomas went out and a few days thereafter there appeared the article in the New York World, occupying the entire first page of the editorial section of the Sunday edition, January 19, and invaded two or three interior columns. I think the total length of time he was in my office did not exceed an hour, and I feel it did not exceed half an hour.

Q. What were your conclusions relative to the preparation of that article?—A. That it was prepared by some one who had access to the records of my office.

Q. You stated that you had no knowledge as to the identity of the person who prepared it?—A. Absolutely not.

Q. Is there anyone in your office who would be in a position to possess that information?—A. Every officer on duty in the office would have access to those records and they would be particularly available to officers at work in the Section of Military Justice and in the clemency section.

Q. Then an article of that kind could be prepared by any one of those officers without it being apparent to anyone else that they had prepared same?—A. I should say so; and add that it might be prepared by any clerk who had the ability to write such an article.

Q. It appears in the evidence that at the time Gen. Ansell was appointed brigadier general, and by virtue of such appointment became senior assistant in the office of the Judge Advocate General that he received certain verbal orders of the Secretary of War regarding his duties. Have you any knowledge regarding that subject?—A. I do not recall ever having heard of such orders being issued, but would not undertake to recollect every conversation I had at that time.

Q. In the order, which was issued on November 8, assigning Gen. Ansell to duty as Acting Judge Advocate General appears this statement: "The verbal orders of the Secretary of War, dated August 11, designating Brig. Gen. Samuel T. Ansell judge advocate, National Army, as Acting Judge Advocate General of the Army, are hereby confirmed and made of record." Have you any knowledge as to those verbal orders?—A. None at all.

Q. My attention has been called to a mimeographed office memorandum of April 10, 1918, signed by you (shown later that same was not signed) as Judge Advocate General, in which is described the organization of the office, in which you are shown as Judge Advocate General; Gen. Ansell as Assistant Judge Advocate General, and Col. Mayes as assistant. It shows Col. Davis as the Chief of the Division of Military Justice. Was that memorandum showing and confirming the organization which then existed or did that memorandum effect a reorganization of the office and refer to a condition which went into effect at that time?—A. I do not recall a memorandum of that date and would like to see it. I do not recall the issue of this memorandum of organization. I can not recall that the subject of the new organization of the Judge Advocate General's Department was discussed at that particular time. My impression is that this is simply confirmatory of an existing organization which had been in force for an indefinite period prior to the date of same, April 10, 1918. I might be permitted to state that Col. Davis, who, as Chief of Military Justice Division, handled probably 50 per cent of the papers coming into the office, and would be able to give definite information as to how long this had been in force. It seems to me that in the rather cursory reading of his testimony before the Military Committee of the Senate recently he covered that point.

Q. Do you happen to recall the approximate date upon which Col. Davis was assigned to that section?—A. He was almost the first choice and had been on duty in that section continuously for a period of several months, except a few weeks that he was absent on a tour of inspection, during which he was substituted by Col. A. E. Clarke. Their administration of the section must cover a period of several months prior to April 10.

Q. In Gen. Ansell's testimony before the Senate committee, he states, "Referring to the occurrences of November, 1917. I was then told that matters of policy, such as this, would not be passed upon by me, except after conference with my chief." In answer to Senator Frelinghuysen's question "Who told you that," Ansell answered, "The Secretary of War; probably also the Chief of Staff and the Judge Advocate General. I know the Secretary of War told me and it was generally understood." Have you any knowledge on that subject; any more than you have already stated?—A. No; except that immediately following my interview with the Secretary of War about November 17, when we discussed the merits of applicants proposed for appointment in the Judge Advocate General's Corps, the Secretary of War addressed me a letter, which I presume you have or can get, discussing these questions, expressing his desire that I give more time to the duties of Judge Advocate General and less time to the duties of Provost Marshal General. In the conference about November 17 he made it very clear that he never contemplated that I would not be in charge of the policies. Referring to Gen. Ansell's memorandum of November 10, 1917, here was the thought: I got my first knowledge of the memorandum of November 10 from the Secretary of War on November 23 or 22, and not at the interview of November 17. I never asked the Secretary of War where that memorandum or brief of Gen. Ansell's of November 10 had been. I have allowed myself to believe that it was one of a large number of papers, perhaps, submitted to him near the date of it, but not taken up by him about the time he spoke to me about it, to wit, November 22 or 23. I say he supposed I was in charge of the office because he apparently had learned on November 17 from a conversation with Gen. Ansell of the issue of the Executive Order No. 1132 of the Revised Statutes, detailing him to Judge Advocate General, the effect of which was to relieve me. Now, it would be strange and something to be explained if he had that brief of Gen. Ansell's dated November 10 on his desk when he talked on November 17, and had not mentioned it. I never, as I say, made any inquiry, but just assumed that he had not yet reached it and that he reached it some time before November 22 or 23, when we had our conversation about the brief.

Q. And after November 17?—A. Yes.

Q. What are the circumstances which led to the clemency board?—A. The whole thing is set forth in correspondence between my office and the Secretary of War direct. My recollection is that during the period I was absent in Chicago, to which place I had gone at the direction of the Secretary of War to address the Selective Service Board, Ansell turned in some kind of a report, which I found on my desk when I returned, and which led to additional correspondence, as the result of which the board of clemency was organized. That correspondence ought to show who made the original suggestion. It should be said that the time for convening such a board of clemency came with the signing of the armistice and resulting conditions approximating those of peace, the matter of convening the clemency board is interwoven in my mind with the further admonition that I caused to be issued about this time to all courts and reviewing authorities, that as to offenses committed after November 11 they would observe the limits of punishment established in the peace-time order, except in those cases where the courts and reviewing authorities could enter on record a valid reason why the punishment imposed in a particular case was in excess of those limits. Both orders were intended to operate in the same field of excessive punishment, the last one mentioned to take care of offenses after the signing of the armistice, and the other to reduce the war-time punishments, that is, punishment for offenses committed during the period of war, to peace-time standards. In my inquiry as to why an order had not been issued of admonition to courts on the question of courts I learned that such an order had been suggested by Col. Read, of my office, to Gen. Ansell in September of 1918, the purpose of the order being to admonish courts, particularly in this country, that less severe punishment would meet the situation here. Col. Read, in giving me this information, submitted the rough of the suggestion he at that time laid before Gen. Ansell, with the remark that Gen. Ansell regarded the suggestion favorably but that at his direction the memorandum went to a board of review to be passed upon there, and that the board of review, probably because of excessive work, had never reached it and the matter died. I used this memorandum that Col. Read said he submitted to Gen. Ansell in September of 1918 in preparing the order admonishing courts in regard to quantum of punishment respecting offenses committed after the signing of the armistice.

Q. Gen. Ansell states, "In September, upon my insistent recommendation, power was established in the Acting Judge Advocate General in France to make rulings upon matters of the administration of military justice, which would control the commanding general, unless overruled by the Secretary of War. This is now being opposed by the commanding general American Expeditionary Forces, and my own action and the propriety in procuring the issue of this order is being subjected to question."—A. I am familiar with the memoranda and draft of order which was submitted by Gen. Ansell upon this subject, and also have the draft of the order signed by Col. Brown, General Staff, after revision. I find that the order, as it reads, is quite different from the memorandum which he submitted, and that the order as it reads practically gives to the senior officer of the Judge Advocate General's Department over there the very authority which Gen. Ansell's interpretation of 1199 would have given. Yes, it is the very authority, but sought to be deduced from other sources.

Q. Have there been any circumstances connected with that which do not appear in the records?—A. Yes. Shortly after returning to duty in the office there came to my desk a request from France, from the Board of Review, an opinion rendered upon a controversy which had arisen between Gen. Bethel, the judge advocate on Gen. Pershing's staff, and Gen. Kreger, in charge of the branch office of the Judge Advocate General's Department in France. It appears that Gen. Kreger, in a number of cases, had returned the proceedings under General Order 84, and under the mandatory provisions of that order the reviewing authorities were compelled to give effect to Gen. Kreger's decision. This was the subject of protest and dissent by Gen. Bethel. In looking over the opinion and the accompanying correspondence I learned for the first time of the issue of General Order 84. I sent for Gen. Ansell and asked him as to the origin of that order. He replied that the order had originated with him. I then asked why he had not conferred upon the Judge Advocate General at Washington the same power that he conferred upon the Acting Judge Advocate General in France with respect to the right given by that Order No. 84 to control the action of reviewing authorities. He answered, "I did not think I could get such an order through." My next question was, "Do I understand that this Order No. 84 was issued by the department unwittingly?" His reply I remember with the greatest accuracy, "Most unwittingly." He explained that when the proof of the order came to the office for revision certain of the officers who had helped him consider the original order desired to make some amendments therein, but that he had limited the amendments to what could be described as "verbal changes," so that he might, if interrogated by the Assistant Chief of Staff, say that there had been no change in the substance. The conversation between us terminated about that point. It was late in the afternoon. The next morning when I returned to the office I dictated a memorandum order to Gen. Ansell asking him to put in writing what he had said to me the evening before, and, as I remember, said with respect to the order having been issued unwittingly by the War Department. In the early morning hours he came to me with my order in his hand and said he did not quite understand why I asked him to put that conversation in writing; that I ought to understand that it would be embarrassing for him to do so. He seemed wrought up and to some extent agitated. It was evident that he desired to avoid compliance with order, and I said to him, "All right, Ansell, just so you and I have the same recollection of the conversation." He left, carrying the order with him, and it must be in his possession. I think he had both the original order and the copy. I have no copy in my office. I expected him to leave the order with me, but he carried it away with him and I never called upon him to return it.

Q. Did you have any conversation with the Secretary of War relative to the issuing of that order?—A. I heard a conversation between the Secretary of War and Gen. Ansell on the subject.

Q. What was its purport?—A. His statement differed in some respects from the statement that I have made. The point was not pursued because during the conversation the Secretary of War stated that he was not particularly concerned with words used, but had sought the interview with Gen. Ansell for the purpose of ascertaining his real state of mind and that he would not indulge in any controversy about words. Gen. March was present at that interview.

Q. Was that order allowed to stand after the Secretary of War and Gen. March learned of it?—A. No immediate action was taken for a few days, perhaps three or four; the matter was left undecided, and the next information I had came from the Secretary of War himself when we were leaving the War Department Building one afternoon. He said to me at that time, "I think the best thing to do is to discontinue the branch office in France and that will automatically repeal General Order No. 84." I said to him, "That will require serious consideration." The next information I had was from a telegram which had gone to Gen. Pershing discontinuing the office in France and revoking all orders and instructions relative thereto. That order was not issued upon my recommendation. A proposition is now pending to revive the office in France, but with the jurisdiction similar to the jurisdiction of the office here, minus this extraordinary power to control the action of the reviewing authorities, respecting their action upon sentences.

Q. Referring to the statement that this order is now being opposed by the Commanding General in France you state, "But it is not true to a certain extent that the order is being opposed by the Commanding General, American Expeditionary Forces. On the contrary no word of opposition is on record nor can any trace be found." In the files which you handed me to-day I found some cablegrams which refer to that matter. I have not been able to digest them and am not able to question you very intelligently on that subject, but in looking it over it occurred to me there were cablegrams which appeared to be a protest to the Judge Advocate General.—A. The protest you found in that bunch of papers, if you could call it a protest, was against the establishment of the office in the first instance, and refers to a prior date and not to this action at all. Our first orders over there were misunderstood and for more than a month action was delayed in establishing the branch office in France, and some inquiries came up which indicated that Gen. Pershing thought it was unnecessary for an army operating in the theater of war. In respect of this last incident, which was a recent incident, the Commanding General of the Expeditionary Forces was not brought into the controversy between Gen. Bethel and Gen. Kreger, in any way that I noticed. It seemed to be a difference between two lawyers and two Judge Advocates General, which had been certified for the opinion of the Judge Advocate General of the Army. I am not aware that Gen. Pershing had the matter brought to his attention and in that sense I made this statement.

Q. Will you state briefly the sequence of events in connection with the four soldiers who were sentenced to death in France?—A. You are entitled, in answer to that question, to an exact chronology of executive administrative action on those four cases, which I am not in a position to give, not having recently revived my recollection by recourse to documents, but can state with substantial accuracy.

Q. Are there documents on file which will cover that completely?—A. Yes; it can be covered completely, but there is an accusation which I saw in the Congressional Record which I would like to cover in my reply. I well remember my first attitude on the question of those four death cases that came up from France. Of course we had administered the office in expectation that cases of that character would reach the office. My attention was particularly attracted to them by the fact that the commanding general of the Expeditionary Forces had addressed a letter to the Judge Advocate General upon the question of execution of the death penalty, and favored the execution of these four men.

The first review of the cases was prepared, as I now recollect, by Maj. Rand, who was working in the section of military justice. Maj. Rand's place at the bar of New York City is an enviable one. He had participated in the trial of notable criminal cases and his assignment, when he reported to be commissioned, was naturally to this section of military justice. He found no prejudicial error in the cases and stated that the findings and sentences were legal. I was dissatisfied with the review because of its brevity, feeling certain that we would not have a proper record of official action unless the review of the case was exhaustive and furnished evidence to the reader that the cases had been carefully considered. My recollection is that in the first draft the unusual letter to which the commanding general of the Expeditionary Forces had sent in was not incorporated. That was one thing that I asked to have incorporated. Just how many times the report was rewritten I can not say, but I remember to have taken the precaution of submitting the records to Col. Wigmore, who was on duty in the office of the Provost Marshal General, and not at all in the office of the Judge Advocate General, for examination, because of the fact that he is the author of a standard work on evidence. I received back a report from him that the records were sufficient to sustain the findings and sentence. I then took the record to the Chief of Staff and submitted them in person, expressing to him the doubt that was in my mind as to the final action to be taken respecting clemency, but assuring him that the best talent in my office pronounced them free from error. I said to him on that occasion that it would be unfortunate to pass up to the President a divided opinion on these cases if by conference we could reach agreement. I referred to the fact that he had but recently returned from the theater of war and knew the conditions there, and might have some knowledge of these four cases. We had a conference, in which he revealed himself of the opinion that the four men should be executed in accordance with the recommendation of the commanding general of the American Expeditionary Forces. I said to him, "If that is your final opinion I shall leave this report with you, to go to the President." I did so and returned to my office. Almost immediately after my return I called in Col. Clarke and asked him if it would not be wise to search the records of The Adjutant General's Office and ascertain some facts outside of the record which might weigh in the final disposition of the cases. I mentioned to him that I particularly desired to know the ages of these men, their earlier environment, and also to search the records of our own office to see how similar cases had been handled in the theater of war. About this time I walked into Gen. Ansell's office and talked about the cases to him and asked him if he would not make an examination of those records and give me his opinion. He made up his report and submitted it to me in the rough, that is, it was not reduced to the form that reports are when intended to be part of the records of the office, but was the kind of report that is given to the head of the office upon request.

Q. Gen. Ansell states, referring to the report which he made upon his return from Europe, "This report never reached the Secretary of War."—A. That statement, as I recollect, first came to my knowledge reading the Congressional Record of recent date, and I think in a letter addressed by Gen. Ansell to Mr. Burnett. I came to the office and asked for the report, as I did not remember to have seen it. It is true that upon his return Gen. Ansell came to my office and submitted a document which contained a number of observations which he had made, explaining that it was more or less a personal document which he thought I would be interested in. I read it over and it is the one that has been used a lot in public addresses, but he never brought in his official report and I did not see any official report until I instituted this search after noticing the Congressional Record. I called upon the executive officer to get me the report. He brought a carbon copy. I asked him where was the original. He said he did not find it on file. Later he came to me with the original and said it was on Gen. Ansell's desk. It was addressed to me, as I remember, not to the Secretary of War. I do not remember to have ever seen that report and know he never personally submitted it as he did the informal report. It is true that up to that time it had never been forwarded to the Secretary of War.

Q. In connection with the publication of the order of November 8, designating Gen. Ansell as Acting Judge Advocate General, were you, upon any occasion, present during interviews between the Secretary of War and Gen. Biddle?—A. I have a little difficulty in answering the question. My difficulty arises from the fact that I am unable to say whether the Secretary of War repeated to me some conversation that he had with Gen. Biddle, or whether I talked directly with Gen. Biddle. I do recall that I heard about this time that Gen. Biddle said that Gen. Ansell had represented to him that we were agreed that the order should be issued and when he was asked more particularly he remarked, "That is the impression I have carried with me all this time; but if Gen. Ansell should say he did not use language of that kind I would not be in a position to dispute him." I dismissed the thing from my mind after I saw the memorandum Gen. Ansell handed Gen. Biddle and which contained what Gen. Biddle had seemed to recollect.

Q. That, then, was Gen. Biddle's explanation presumably of why he passed that order without bringing it to the attention of the Secretary of War?—A. Yes.

Q. What connection had Gen. Ansell with the revision of the Articles of War?—A. I was appointed Judge Advocate General on February 15, 1911. I do not remember just when Gen. Ansell came to duty in the office, but I think in 1913. The first revision was submitted, I think, in May of 1913, but it was in the course of preparation for probably a year before it was submitted. During that time if I had any correspondence with Gen. Ansell it ought to be on the files of the office or he may have copies of it. I have no recollection of the correspondence to which he refers. It would be quite natural for me to consult him, for his legal abilities had attracted my attention even prior to the date of my appointment. If he has the correspondence it ought to answer your question. I have not it. I have two or three memoranda that he submitted to me upon articles which we were considering for incorporation in the code. I have them put away in a file in which I keep all of the official memoranda I receive from Gen. Ansell that do not become final—of which there are a large number—just as for every other subordinate in my office. I have looked them over to see what evidence they contain and find two or three memoranda on two or three different Articles of War. I have asked questions of the men in the office at the time whether they heard these views of Gen. Ansell's respecting the scope of revision. I have not learned of any expression he made at that time of dissent from the revision on account of it being lacking in scope and fundamentals. I think I have covered your question. He never was aggressive in making suggestions and had the most ample opportunity, because not until 1916 did we get the revision through. Perhaps he has memoranda which would elucidate the subject further.

Q. In that connection can you give the names of the officers of the Judge Advocate General's Department who were especially engaged in the revision of those Articles of War?—A. Gen. Kreger took a more active part than anyone else. He helped on them while yet acting judge advocate of the Department of Colorado. Later, when he entered upon duty in the office, he frequently was consulted thereon. The office was a small one in those days and I do not instantly recall the names of others, but perhaps I could with the aid of my records. Gen. Kreger ought to be asked about this, because his recollection would be better than my own.

MARCH 15, 1919.

Questions by Gen. CHAMBERLAIN.

Q. Give your name and rank.—A. James Easby-Smith, colonel, judge advocate, at present on duty in the office of the Judge Advocate General.

Q. How long have you been on duty?—A. I was commissioned a major in July, 1917; on account of being chairman of the district board of the District of Columbia I did not accept same until September 20, 1917, and was then ordered to report to the Judge Advocate General personally for assignment to duty. Was ordered to duty in the Office of the Provost Marshal General, and remained on duty in that office until November, 1918, when I went abroad, and on my return from abroad, the latter part of February, 1919, I was verbally assigned to duty in the office of the Judge Advocate General's Department, where I am now on duty.

Q. On what date in November, 1918, did you leave the Provost Marshal General's Office for France?—A. I left on the 27th of November.

Q. During the month of November, 1917, an order issued but never published to the Army, relieving Gen. Crowder from his duty as Judge Advocate General and detaching Gen. Ansell as Acting Judge Advocate General. Some controversy has arisen as to the issuance of that order and other matters directly connected with same. What information, if any, have you bearing upon that subject?—

A. Well, I knew nothing about the issuing or revocation of the order, except by hearsay, until recently, when, in compliance with Gen. Crowder's directions, I inspected and secured copies of the original papers in the Office of The Adjutant General, and Chief of Staff, but I can fix certain dates on account of the following facts: On a date, which I have now fixed as Saturday morning, November 24, 1917, Gen. Crowder, whose office was in the room next to the one I occupied, called me in early in the morning, probably 8.30, and handed me a brief, which had been submitted by Gen. Ansell to the Secretary of War dated November 10. I am very positive that he had received it from the Secretary only the day before for the reason that he stated to me that he had been very much humiliated the evening or night before by the Secretary handing him the brief and stating in surprise that it was remarkable that Gen. Crowder had been Judge Advocate General for nearly two terms and was not aware of a power residing in his office. Lieut. Col. Johnson, subsequently brigadier general, was then executive officer, and either at the beginning or during the interview, Gen. Crowder called him in. The general stated that the brief proceeded from false premises and directed Gen. Johnston and myself to drop everything in hand and devote ourselves exclusively to the investigation of the facts and the authorities, and to prepare a memorandum brief for him covering the entire subject. I immediately began an investigation of all statutes by which Congress had vested appellate power in any court or courts, and Gen. Johnston began an investigation of the records of the Judge Advocate General's Office. The next day, which was Sunday, November 25, Gen. Johnston and I spent practically the entire day in the record office of the Office of the Judge Advocate General, examining the action which had been taken by Gen. Holt and others from the sixties to the eighties. Sunday night and the next day, Monday, the 26th, Gen. Johnston and I prepared the reply brief and submitted it to Gen. Crowder, either Monday, the 26th, or Tuesday, the 27th of November. The way that I fixed the dates is that Gen. Crowder's reply brief is dated November 27 and I am positive that the day that I worked in the record office was Sunday, because no one was present in the office and the offices were closed, so that I fixed the date when the brief was handed Gen. Crowder as Friday, November 23, the evening or night before he handed it to me.

By hearsay, which, I think, however, is admissible as establishing the fact itself of receiving information, I will state that when Gen. Johnston and I were working on the brief he then told me that Gen. Ansell had, a short time before, obtained an order from the Chief of Staff appointing him Acting Judge Advocate General and that the order had been revoked by the Secretary. By this information I am sure that the revocation had been made prior to the submission of the brief by the Secretary to Gen. Crowder.

Q. Have you any knowledge or have you heard anything to indicate the date upon which that brief was submitted by Gen. Ansell?—A. No; I have no information concerning that. I observed this concerning the brief: It is dated November 10, 1917. Gen. Ansell has stated, as I understand, that he submitted it on November 10. Before submitting the brief to the Secretary Gen. Ansell passed it around among the officers on duty in the office of the Judge Advocate General. They all signed their concurrence except Col. H. A. White, who signed it at the end with the explanatory words after his signature, "As explained." In the file of the papers is a memorandum dictated and signed by Col. White, under date of November 12, 1917, not concurring altogether with the opinions expressed in the brief. It must therefore have been subsequent to Col. White's memorandum of November 12 that the brief was submitted, but as to the exact date I have no information.

Q. On this occasion, did Gen. Crowder say anything regarding the circumstances under which the order detaching Gen. Ansell as Acting Judge Advocate General had been secured?—A. Gen. Crowder never mentioned that subject to me until within the last two or three weeks. At the time he handed the brief to me he made no reference whatever.

Q. You had no knowledge of it?—A. No; the statement above was made by Gen. Johnston.

Q. Have you any further information which would throw any light upon this controversy which has arisen?—A. I don't think I have any information except what I have gained by an examination of the records recently.

Q. What recent examination have you made?—A. As soon as I returned from France about three weeks ago, Gen. Crowder asked me to examine the entire controversy and all files and records bearing upon the questions in the controversy, and I have done so, submitting a number of memoranda. I also secured, with some difficulty, through Col. Kelly, of The Adjutant General's office, who I think obtained it from the office of the Chief of Staff, the entire file relating to Gen. Ansell's designation as Acting Judge Advocate General and his revocation, but the only information which I ever had, until recently, was in regard to the preparation of the brief, and my presumption is that Gen. Crowder designated Gen. Johnston and myself to prepare this brief because of the fact that all of the officers on duty in the Judge Advocate General's office had signified their concurrence with Gen. Ansell's views. Being in the Provost Marshal General's office I never at any time was connected with the working of the Judge Advocate General's office, except in that one instance.

Q. Referring to the memorandum you mention and to the memoranda which you prepared and the information which you have obtained from the records, has that practically all been embodied by Gen. Crowder in his statements in the courts?—A. I have not seen his statements in the courts, but I presume they have, because they were all submitted to him, and on each occasion he stated that it was exactly what he wanted, and I assume he was satisfied. Some of these memoranda were signed by me and some were not. I don't think, General, I know anything of any importance, except that I feel sure I can definitely fix the dates.

* * * * *

Col. SMITH. I have been on the most intimate and friendly terms with Gen. Ansell for many years. Shortly after my work on the brief in November, 1917, he exhibited a very distinct coldness toward me, which, however, seemed to have worn off by the time I went abroad, in November, 1918.

Upon my recent return to this office I met him in the corridor. My son, who had also been to France and also well acquainted with Gen. Ansell, was with me. To my great astonishment he attempted not to speak to me on that occasion and his manner was observed by my son.

About two hours later, on the same day, I passed him in the corridor with Maj. Howard Adams, who had also been on duty in the office of the Provost Marshal General, and Maj. Adams spoke out directly and said, "Good morning, General." Gen. Ansell looked us full in the face and passed on without changing expression.

On two occasions since then, within the past week, Gen. Ansell has declined to speak to me, although of course I have made no approach after the previous rebuffs.

Maj. Adams had nothing to do with it, but during the whole of his time in the Army was chief of one of the divisions in the office of the Provost Marshal General.

I state as hearsay that nearly every officer who was on duty in the office of the Provost Marshal General and closely associated with Gen. Crowder, who are now on duty in the Judge Advocate General's office, has stated to me that Gen. Ansell has ceased to speak to him or recognize them.

Q. Do you know whether this change of attitude on his part has been exhibited in connection with any of the officers who had been connected with the Judge Advocate General's office prior to the return of Gen. Crowder to the office?—

A. I know those men very slightly and have no occasion to converse with them.

EXHIBIT 12.

MARCH 17, 1919.

Brig. Gen. Lytle Brown, General Staff, after being duly sworn, testified as follows:

(Questions by Gen. Chamberlain.)

Q. In August, 1918, on account of certain differences of opinion between Gen. Bethel and Gen. Kreger, regarding the force of recommendations made by Gen. Kreger in his review of court-martial cases, Gen. Kreger submitted a memorandum for the amendment of General Orders No. 7. Gen. Ansell, in submitting the case, states:

"I concur in the views of these two officers, and recommend that the above designated order be amended, so as to require all cases tried by general courts-martial in the American Expeditionary Forces to be reviewed, to determine their legality, by the Acting Judge Advocate General of those forces. The substantive portion of a draft of order to accomplish this purpose is herewith."

In the draft of that order it was provided that "any sentence, or any part thereof, so found to be illegal, defective, or void, in whole or in part, shall be disapproved, modified, or set aside, in accordance with the recommendation of the Acting Judge Advocate General." That order, as it was drawn and issued, gives to the Acting Judge Advocate General in France a power far greater than that possessed by the office of the Judge Advocate General in Washington, and gives, practically, the power which would have been given had Gen. Ansell's interpretation of section 1109 been accepted. You are familiar with that matter?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. It has been claimed that it was never intended to give such a power. Have you any information on that subject.—A. No; I have no information that would clear that up exactly, but I am of the opinion that the object of the order was thought mainly to be the throwing into the Judge Advocate General's office in France the business which should be attended to there without the necessity of referring it to Washington—thereby lightening the work of the Judge Advocate General's office in Washington and expediting the work of the administering of justice in the Expeditionary Forces. I am quite certain that the study of the question in War Plans Division did not contemplate giving authority in France which would be denied the Judge Advocate General's office in Washington. I have no information whatever that anything was inserted in this order surreptitiously. The War Plans Division simply approved the order, as written by Gen. Ansell's office, and sent it up, in the exact form as written by Gen. Ansell, to the Chief of Staff. It was approved in the Chief of Staff's office and sent to The Adjutant General for issue, exactly as it was sent up to that office. In examining the order which was issued, I find that there is a slight change of phraseology, but to my mind not a change of meaning from the order as it left the War Plans Division and passed through the office of the Chief of Staff. There is a slight alteration in the wording and phraseology of the order issued by The Adjutant General. Why that change occurred is not known by me.

Q. Was it that change which made it incumbent upon the commanding general to carry out the recommendations of the Acting Judge Advocate General?—A. The change involved that part of the order. There was a change in the phraseology of that part of the order.

Q. Have you copies of those papers that would—A. I have the copy, the one duplicate copy of the paper that went from the War Plans Division to the Chief of Staff, and there signed by Gen. McIntyre and stamped with Gen. March's name and sent to The Adjutant General for issue.

Q. Please have a copy made and sent to this office.

EXHIBIT 13.

WASHINGTON, D. C., March 17, 1919.

Col. Beverly A. Read, Judge Advocate General's Department, Chief Military Justice Division, being first duly sworn, was interrogated by Maj. Gen. J. L. Chamberlain, Inspector General, and testified as follows:

Q. What is your full name, rank, organization, and duties?—A. Beverly A. Read, colonel, Judge Advocate General's Department, Chief Military Justice Division.

Q. How long have you been chief of this division?—A. I succeeded Col. Davis in April, 1915.

Q. Before or after Gen. Ansell left for Europe?—A. After, sir. Col. Mayes was in charge of the office at the time I was detailed in charge of that division.

Q. (Inspector handed Col. Read a copy of an office memorandum dated April 10, giving the organization of the Judge Advocate General's office.) Are you familiar with that?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Do you know by whom that was prepared?—A. No, sir.

WASHINGTON, D. C.,
March 25, 1919.

Recall of Col. Read.

Q. After the record in the case of a court-martial leaves the board of review, what becomes of it?—A. In those cases in which an opinion in writing is rendered, as, for instance, cases involving the dismissal of an officer, death penalty, confinement in the penitentiary, and in all cases of conscientious objectors, the opinion is prepared by the officer to whom the particular case is assigned. After he completes this opinion he submits it to the chief of his section of the Military Justice Division. If the chief of that section concurs in that opinion it then goes directly to one or the other of the two sections of the board of reviews. The section of the board of review concerned then considers that opinion in the same way that an appellate court would consider a case sent to it. If the board of review concurs in that opinion it then goes directly to me as Chief of the Military Justice Division, and also as ex-officio member of each of the two sections of the board of review. The opinion I may say is still in the rough. If I concur with the board then the opinion, the rough copy, is marked "final" and it is written up, initialed by me, and if the case is one for submission to the President, as, for instance, the death penalty or dismissal, or in the infrequent cases where the President himself is the convening authority, the record goes from my office to the Judge Advocate General or the Acting Judge Advocate General, and if he concurs he signs the opinion and it then becomes the opinion of the office and is forwarded to The Adjutant General for transfer, through the Chief of Staff, to the Secretary of War and finally to the President. In those cases which come up to this office under General Orders, No. 7, we deal directly with the reviewing authority concerned through the Judge Advocate General or the Acting Judge Advocate General, as the case may be.

In connection with the review of the records of trials by general court-martial in my division there is, I think, one defect or weakness in the system which, however, it seems to me, is practically unavoidable and irremediable. It is this. The vast majority of the cases which come there for review are those cases in which the dishonorable discharge imposed has been suspended and those cases in which no dishonorable discharge was imposed. No written review is prepared in those cases unless an error is discovered which necessitates either setting the conviction aside or returning the record for certain corrections. Here is where the defect lies to which I refer. The determination as to whether or not the record is legally sufficient to support the findings and sentence is practically a matter submitted to the judgment of the officer who reviews the record and the chief of that particular section of the Military Justice Division. If they should make a mistake, that mistake may not be discovered at all or may only be discovered when the case comes before the office again on an application for clemency, and the record is then again reviewed. There have been occasional instances of this sort, very infrequent, but there have been instances. Of course, with efficient lawyers—officers—to review the record a mistake of this sort should never occur, but we have not always been fortunate in having all high-class lawyers in those lower sections of the division. It would be impracticable, of course, for the hundreds and thousands of records of general courts-martial which come to this office to be reviewed by the boards of review as at present constituted. As a matter of fact, it is almost a physical impossibility for them to keep up with the work, which is properly assigned to them as it is.

Q. That you regard as the only defect?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. This, however, is more a defect of possible personnel than of system?—A. Yes, sir; except that if the sentence is found to be illegal, the accused would have served part of an illegal sentence before the error could have been discovered and the necessary corrective action taken.

Q. When you became Chief of the Division of Military Justice, in the spring of 1918, did you receive any specific instructions relative to the handling of the cases under General Orders No. 7?—A. No, sir.

Q. What was your policy in those cases?—A. Shortly after I took charge of the Division of Military Justice I called Col. Mayes's attention to the fact that quite a number of the sentences imposed by general courts-martial appeared to me to be unnecessarily severe. He agreed with me, but stated that under the provisions of General Orders No. 7 he thought we were limited to passing on the legal sufficiency of the records and that we had no authority under that order to make any suggestions to reviewing authorities as to the quantum of punishment. He suggested, in view of this limitation, that whenever a record was reviewed and the officer reviewing it considered the punishment too severe he should make a memorandum to that effect, signed by himself, and appended to the record, so that it would immediately attract attention when the question of clemency arose in that particular case. This was the practice of the office. After Gen. Ansell returned from France and assumed charge of the office, I called his attention to this matter and told him the construction which Col. Mayes had placed on General Orders No. 7, and which construction I thought was legally correct. We discussed the matter several times, according to my recollection. Gen. Ansell agreed that the sentences in some instances were too severe, and, if possible, some action should be taken to bring about a correction in this regard. Shortly after he instituted the first board of review, which was in the early part of August, 1918, the board of review and I discussed the question with Gen. Ansell on one or more occasions, and my recollection is that he some time thereafter verbally directed that in those cases which came before the board of review we would not be bound by the limitations of General Orders No. 7 in regard to recommending a reduction in the amount of punishment if we thought that course advisable. Some time in October, however, he formally reduced those instructions to writing and we have followed that procedure since that time. I subsequently informed him that the instructions did not authorize me to make recommendations in the matter of the reduction of sentences in those cases which did not go before the board of review and he directed me to follow the same policy with regard to all cases where we thought the punishment was too severe. I might say right here that in August I submitted a memorandum to Gen. Ansell, prepared by myself, in which I called attention to some of the sentences which, in my judgment, were too severe, and in that memorandum I referred to the fact that while I thoroughly realized that the sentences were imposed by courts for their disciplinary effect and that the courts in imposing the sentences were actuated undoubtedly by the very highest motives, I thought, among other things, that unduly severe sentences might have an unfortunate effect upon the civil community. Some time after I submitted this memorandum we had a conference in Gen. Ansell's room, at which were present, if my memory is correct, Gen. Ansell, Col. Morrow, Col. Davis, Col. Power, Col. Keedy, Col. Tucker, and myself. There may have been one or two others, but I am not sure. My recollection is that it was understood at that conference that a general order be prepared by me for submission to the War Department, with the recommendation that it be promulgated to the service, calling attention to the severity of certain sentences and suggesting the advisability, particularly within the continental limits of the United States, of adhering wherever possible to the limits-of-punishment order, which, of course, was no longer in effect, it being limited to a time of peace. In September I prepared this general order myself, and submitted it to the board of review, but due to the overwhelming press of work before that board, and which press of work subsequently necessitated the formation of the second board of review, they were unable to complete consideration of the proposed general order prior to the time of the armistice on November 11.

Q. Is General Orders No. 84 in force at the present time as originally promulgated, so far as you know?—A. No, sir; it has been amended within the last few days by a new general order, which was prepared in my division under my direction. It was in force up until the time when the branch office was discontinued, March 1.

Q. In one of his statements Gen. Ansell says that about 10 days before his appearance before the Military Committee, all matters pertaining to military justice were ordered routed in other channels. What was the situation with regard to that?—A. I would have no information about this. All papers leaving my division normally go to the Judge Advocate General or the acting head of the office direct.

Col. B. A. READ. Referring to Gen. Ansell's report, made as a result of his observations while in Europe, I personally have never seen that document. On at least two occasions, once while the office of the Judge Advocate General was located in the State, War, and Navy Building, and once since the office was moved to the Mills Building, he has assembled the officers of the department and delivered a talk, or lecture I presume it might be called, based on his experiences and observations abroad. At the time he delivered the lecture in the Mills Building I recall that he had in his hand and read from a typewritten document which contained, from its appearance, a good many pages, and this

Recall of Col. Read.

Q. After the record in the case of a court-martial leaves the board of review, what becomes of it?—A. In those cases in which an opinion in writing is rendered, as, for instance, cases involving the dismissal of an officer, death penalty, confinement in the penitentiary, and in all cases of conscientious objectors, the opinion is prepared by the officer to whom the particular case is assigned. After he completes this opinion he submits it to the chief of his section of the Military Justice Division. If the chief of that section concurs in that opinion it then goes directly to one or the other of the two sections of the board of reviews. The section of the board of review concerned then considers that opinion in the same way that an appellate court would consider a case sent to it. If the board of review concurs in that opinion it then goes directly to me as Chief of the Military Justice Division, and also as ex-officio member of each of the two sections of the board of review. The opinion I may say is still in the rough. If I concur with the board then the opinion, the rough copy, is marked "final" and it is written up, initialed by me, and if the case is one for submission to the President, as, for instance, the death penalty or dismissal, or in the infrequent cases where the President himself is the convening authority, the record goes from my office to the Judge Advocate General or the Acting Judge Advocate General, and if he concurs he signs the opinion and it then becomes the opinion of the office and is forwarded to The Adjutant General for transfer, through the Chief of Staff, to the Secretary of War and finally to the President. In those cases which come up to this office under General Orders, No. 7, we deal directly with the reviewing authority concerned through the Judge Advocate General or the Acting Judge Advocate General, as the case may be.

In connection with the review of the records of trials by general court-martial in my division there is, I think, one defect or weakness in the system which, however, it seems to me, is practically unavoidable and irremediable. It is this. The vast majority of the cases which come there for review are those cases in which the dishonorable discharge imposed has been suspended and those cases in which no dishonorable discharge was imposed. No written review is prepared in those cases unless an error is discovered which necessitates either setting the conviction aside or returning the record for certain corrections. Here is where the defect lies to which I refer. The determination as to whether or not the record is legally sufficient to support the findings and sentence is practically a matter submitted to the judgment of the officer who reviews the record and the chief of that particular section of the Military Justice Division. If they should make a mistake, that mistake may not be discovered at all or may only be discovered when the case comes before the office again on an application for clemency, and the record is then again reviewed. There have been occasional instances of this sort, very infrequent, but there have been instances. Of course, with efficient lawyers—officers—to review the record a mistake of this sort should never occur, but we have not always been fortunate in having all high-class lawyers in those lower sections of the division. It would be impracticable, of course, for the hundreds and thousands of records of general courts-martial which come to this office to be reviewed by the boards of review as at present constituted. As a matter of fact, it is almost a physical impossibility for them to keep up with the work, which is properly assigned to them as it is.

Q. That you regard as the only defect?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. This, however, is more a defect of possible personnel than of system?—A. Yes, sir; except that if the sentence is found to be illegal, the accused would have served part of an illegal sentence before the error could have been discovered and the necessary corrective action taken.

Q. When you became Chief of the Division of Military Justice, in the spring of 1918, did you receive any specific instructions relative to the handling of the cases under General Orders No. 7?—A. No, sir.

Q. What was your policy in those cases?—A. Shortly after I took charge of the Division of Military Justice I called Col. Mayes's attention to the fact that quite a number of the sentences imposed by general courts-martial appeared to me to be unnecessarily severe. He agreed with me, but stated that under the provisions of General Orders No. 7 he thought we were limited to passing on the legal sufficiency of the records and that we had no authority under that order to make any suggestions to reviewing authorities as to the quantum of

EXHIBIT 14.

WASHINGTON, D. C.
March 17, 1919.

Lieut. Col. Edwin R. Keedy, Judge Advocate General's Department, member of the board of review, being first duly sworn, was interrogated by Maj. Gen. J. L. Chamberlain, Inspector General, and testified as follows:

Q. What is your full name, rank, organization and duty?—A. Edwin R. Keedy, Lieutenant Colonel, Judge Advocate General's Department, member of the board of review.

Q. How long have you been on duty in the office of the Judge Advocate General?—A. One year; I reported as I recall, on the 16th day of March, 1918.

Q. Have you been on duty in the Division of Military Justice during this entire period?—A. Yes. The only time I was absent was when I was ill for a short time with influenza.

Q. How long have you been a member of the board of review?—A. From its inception, which so far as I recall was August 9, 1918.

Q. You are doubtless familiar with the controversy which is in progress and the various accusations and charges which have been made in the public press and elsewhere regarding the administration of military justice. Of course military justice in the Army is being administered under the laws as they exist and not as they might exist. Under the laws as they exist I would like your opinion as to the manner in which military justice is administered in the Army, as learned by you in the review of cases which come before you from all parts of the Army.—A. I would like to speak first, sir, of one thing which impressed me very much as a civilian coming into the service, by way of the distinction between the review accorded a case by court-martial and one accorded a civil case. In the civil courts there is an appeal or a review of the case only upon the initiative of the accused and only when he is able to employ counsel to appeal the case for him. In the military law, as a result of the provisions of 48th A. W. and G. O. No. 7, as well as section 1199 of the Revised Statutes and the orders promulgated under it, in all cases by general court-martial the accused is given a review of his case automatically and as a matter of right. When the sentence involves death, the dismissal of an officer, or the unsuspended dishonorable discharge of a soldier, this review takes place before the sentence is ordered to be carried into execution. In other cases the review occurs subsequently to such action. All records of trial by general court-martial are sent to the Judge Advocate General's Department and are there reviewed. In cases where the sentence is death, dismissal, or dishonorable discharge, unsuspended—the only cases regarding which I am in a position to express an opinion—I think that taken as a whole the results of the administration of the law by the Judge Advocate General's Office during the time I have been connected with it have been at least as satisfactory so far as justice is concerned as the administration of justice by the appellate civil courts; in fact I would say on the whole I would think it has been more satisfactory because of this fact that as actually administered the Judge Advocate General's Department did a very great deal toward reducing sentences which civil appellate court has no power to do.

Since the creation of the board of review the Judge Advocate General's Office has had in effect a real appellate court. The functions of that board of review have been those of an appellate tribunal, and that phrase was used in the order promulgated by the then acting Judge Advocate General creating that board of review, and so far as I recall the recommendations of that board of review have been approved by the Judge Advocate General and acting Judge Advocate General in all but one or two cases; and what is even more significant so far as results are concerned, the recommendations of this board of review as approved by the Judge Advocate General have been approved by the Secretary of War and the President in practically all cases. So far as has been brought to my attention and so far as I recall, the recommendations of the board of review, as approved by the Judge Advocate General or the acting Judge Advocate General, have been overruled by the War Department on questions of law in but two cases. So far as recommendations for the commutation of punishment are concerned I only recall six cases where the Secretary of War did not concur in the recommendation of the Judge Advocate General's Office, and in three of those the President followed the recommendation of the Judge Advocate General's Department instead of that of the Secretary of War. In cases where the commanding general of a territorial department, camp, or tactical division has had the power under the Articles of War to carry the sentences into execution, the recommendations of the Judge Advocate General's Department, so far as I know, have been followed in practically all cases. I only recall three cases—there may be more but I don't think there are many more—where the recommendations were not followed.

Q. You refer now to the review of those cases here?—A. Yes, sir. The great significance of the fact that the recommendations of the Judge Advocate General's Department have been followed in practically all cases is this, that although under the law the Judge Advocate General has not the power to act by way of disapproval of findings and the reduction of sentences, yet practically the views of his office have been carried into effect. Where the sentence imposed by court-martial has involved death or the dismissal of an officer, or penitentiary confinement of either an officer or an enlisted man, the review of the record of trial in the office of the Judge Advocate General, since the creation of the board of review, is, in my opinion, as thorough as that ordinarily accorded the record of trial in a civil appellate court. To be exact, the character of the review is substantially this: The record of trial is assigned to a judge advocate, whose duty it is to read and study the record, considering both questions of law and also the question as to whether or not the evidence is sufficient to support the finding. After he has thus studied the record he prepares what is known as an original report, which is in the form of an opinion, such as is written by an ordinary appellate court. This report and the record are then studied by the immediate superior of the officer who prepared the report. The second officer, after such study, expresses his opinion as to whether the report prepared by the first officer is correct. After this has been done the record of trial, with the report prepared by the first officer and the opinion thereon by the second officer, goes to the board of review, where it is carefully studied by three officers acting in practically the same capacity as an appellate court. After the board of review has determined on what in their opinion is the proper disposition of the case and has prepared or had prepared the complete review of the record, this review and the record are then presented to the head of the Military Justice Division, who expresses his opinion thereon. The record of trial and the review then go to the Judge Advocate General or the Acting Judge Advocate General for his consideration. Since the Judge Advocate General has returned to duty in many instances the opinion of the former Acting Judge Advocate General has been secured by the Judge Advocate General. If the record of trial is one which requires the action of the President, the record of the trial, with the review thereon, is sent to the Secretary of War for his opinion; afterwards to the President. If the record of trial is one to be acted upon by the commanding general of a department, camp, or tactical division, the Judge Advocate General communicates his opinion with the proper recommendation to such commanding officer, and, as has been said above and may be appropriately repeated here, the recommendations of the Judge Advocate General have been in practically all cases carried into effect by the particular official whose power it is, under the Articles of War, to carry sentences of general court-martial into final execution. During my service in the office of the Judge Advocate General I have been impressed by the fact that both the Judge Advocate General and the Acting Judge Advocate General have constantly had in mind the proper administration of the military law. So far as has come to my notice both of these officers have striven to secure an administration of the military law that will produce real justice, and in my opinion this result has been substantially accomplished, at least so far as the cases which have come under my observation are concerned.

Q. What apparent effect, if any, has this controversy had upon the question of coördination and teamwork in the Military Justice Division of the office?—

A. In my opinion the morale of the office has been very little affected. Of course it is natural that there should be a certain amount of discussion—that is inevitable—but I am unable to see that the real work of the office has been impaired to any appreciable amount. The head of the Military Justice Division, who, in my opinion, is an officer of unusual ability and capacity, has insisted at all times that no discussions in connection with this controversy should affect the work of his division. I think I can speak with assurance that it has in no way colored the action of the Chief of the Military Justice Division or the board of review acting under him.

Q. To what extent, if any, has this controversy and the discussions to which you refer affected the personal relations of the officers in the Division of Military Justice?—A. So far as I know, sir, they have not affected the relations of the officers of the Military Justice Division at all.

Q. Have they, so far as you know, in any degree affected the personal relations between Gen. Crowder or Gen. Ansell on the one side and other officers in the department on the other?—A. It is rather difficult, sir, for me to answer that question because most of the communications which either Gen. Crowder or Gen. Ansell have had with the Military Justice Division have been through the head of the division, Col. Read, and I have seen no indication that the relations which existed before this situation arose have been affected by it. I have not noticed that either Gen. Crowder or Gen. Ansell have given any signs of personal feeling toward any officer growing out of the situation in question.

Q. You are familiar with General Order No. 7, 1918, and General Order No. 84?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Are you familiar with the discussions of memoranda from the Judge Advocate General's Office preliminary to and in connection with the issuance of General Order No. 84 amending General Order No. 7?—A. I don't believe, sir, that I can say that I am. I was present at a discussion with reference to the provisions of General Orders, No. 84, but I recall no information by way of memoranda or otherwise preliminary to that except one case, where the commanding general of the S. O. S. refused to follow the recommendation of the Acting Judge Advocate General in France.

Q. Just what do you mean by saying you were present at a conference regarding the wording of General Order No. 84?—A. I was present at a conference where, as I recall it, some time ago the question of phrasing an order that would go somewhat further than General Order No. 7 had gone would be prepared, and the question of my connection with it was merely as to the matter of phraseology, as to how it should be worded to accomplish what it actually did accomplish. In regard to the question as to whether there was anything of a surreptitious character in connection with the preparation of that order, I recall that somebody made a suggestion as to whether Gen. McIntyre would agree with that, and in my own mind, as it was published, I concluded that Gen. McIntyre approved it.

Q. Do you associate that particular case with a discussion relative to the wording of General Orders, No. 84?—A. That I do not recall, sir. That was the very thing, sir, I was trying to recall, and I can't recall whether that was the exact occasion or whether they were simply coincidental.

Q. Is there anything further you wish to state?—A. In addition to the experience of one year as an officer in the Judge Advocate General's Department, I have been interested in the administration of the civil criminal law for about 13 years and have made studies of the systems in England, Scotland, and Canada, the first two under the auspices of the then President Taft. From the point of view of a civilian lawyer with this experience, as well as an officer of the Judge Advocate General's Department, I have been impressed with the fact that both Gen. Crowder and Gen. Ansell have done a great deal to improve the administration of the military law and toward making it accord in spirit and in practice with the improvements in the administration of the civil criminal law. For instance, Gen. Crowder, I understand, was responsible for the creation of the disciplinary barracks, with the accompanying feature of the indeterminate sentence, and also instituted the system of the suspended sentence, both the indeterminate sentence and the suspended sentence being regarded as progressive of modern penology. Gen. Ansell during my connection with the office on a number of occasions referred to the fact that in instances courts-martial were imposing what seemed to be excessive sentences and took steps in so far as he had the power or influence to bring about the reduction of such sentences. To my mind, although I speak with certain hesitancy regarding this particular matter, the creation of the board of review by Gen. Ansell, giving it in effect and in substance, though of course not officially, the functions of an appellate tribunal, was a most important step toward securing an adequate review of court-martial records and toward the consequent securing of substantial justice in the administration of the military law. In view of these considerations it has been a source of regret to me that any apparent controversy between these two officers, with the consequent publicity and distortion of the facts relative to the administration of the military law, particularly by reason of the fact that they have been unduly featured by the newspapers, has appeared to cast doubt and discredit upon the real achievements of these two officers.

Q. As the result of your experience in the office of the Judge Advocate General, is it your belief that the interpretation placed upon section 1199 produced an effect which in any degree lessened Gen. Ansell's efforts to improve conditions in so far as he was able to do so under the law?—A. Of course, I am unable to answer as to whether or not the matter referred to lessened his efforts. I can only say that I was impressed by his efforts.

WASHINGTON, D. C.,
March 18, 1919.

Recall of Lieut. Col. Edwin R. Keedy.

Q. What was the date that you went on duty in the Division of Military Justice?—A. About March 16, 1918.

Q. In the application of the provisions of General Order No. 7, did any material change take place upon the occasion of Col. Davis being relieved as chief of that division and Col. Mayes taking up those duties?—A. After I reported for duty to the Military Justice Division, Col. Davis remained as chief of that division for only about four weeks. During that period I did not have the opportunity to form any definite opinion as to the policy pursued by Col. Davis with reference to recommendations under General Order No. 7, as most of the cases reviewed by me during that period had been forwarded for action of the President under the forty-eighth article of war. During the time that Col. Mayes was Acting Judge Advocate General I formed the general opinion that the function of the Judge Advocate General under General Order No. 7 was considered to be less broad than had previously been considered. After Gen. Ansell returned from France and became Acting Judge Advocate General, he undoubtedly gave a more liberal interpretation, so far as the function of this office was concerned, to General Order No. 7 than had been given it under Col. Mayes. More extensive recommendations were made to commanding generals by Gen. Ansell under General Order No. 7 than had been made by Col. Mayes.

As the result of my subsequent inspection of opinions signed by Col. Davis during the period that he was chief of the Military Justice Division, I have formed the opinion that Col. Davis felt more free to make recommendations under General Order No. 7 than did Col. Mayes.

EXHIBIT 15.

WASHINGTON, D. C.,
March 17, 1919.

Lieut. Col. Charles C. Tucker, Judge Advocate General's Department, being first duly sworn, was interrogated by Maj. Gen. J. L. Chamberlain, inspector general, and testified as follows:

Q. What is your full name, rank, organization, and duty?—A. Charles C. Tucker, lieutenant colonel, Judge Advocate General's Department, on duty in the office of the Judge Advocate General, Washington, D. C., in the Military Justice Division.

Q. How long have you been on duty in the office of the Judge Advocate General?—A. Since March 28, 1918.

Q. How long have you been on duty in the Division of Military Justice?—A. Since that date.

Q. As a result of your experience in the Division of Military Justice and as a member of the board of review, what have been your observations and what are your views relative to the manner in which military justice is administered, with special reference to whether or not, within the limitations of the law, everything within reason is being done to protect the interests of officers and enlisted men come to trial before courts-martial?—A. At or about the time that I received a commission as major, Judge Advocate General's Department, a large number of civilian lawyers like myself were commissioned to serve in the Military Justice Division. At that time there were in the Judge Advocate General's Office not more than five Regular Army officers—Gen. Ansell, Col.

Mayes, Col. Morrow, Col. Davis, and Maj. Weeks. The personnel of the office other than these Regular Army officers consisted of civilian lawyers. Roughly speaking, there were in the neighborhood of a hundred civilian lawyers in the department, of whom between 40 and 50 were serving in the Military Justice Division. These men brought to their work the experience, training, and ideals of civilian lawyers. They were instructed, as I was, that their chief duty was to see that the accused in all cases were given the benefit of legal principles and legal safeguards. I found that in the review of general court-martial records by my associates, and this is equally true of myself, we had more in mind the safeguarding of the accused than military discipline. This for the reason that none of us or few of us had had any military experience; certainly I had had none. In other words, I brought to bear in the work of these reviews, and I am sure my associates did the same thing, the ideals, training, and experience solely of the civilian lawyer. After the establishment of the board of review, of which I was made a member, I observed that the men in preparing reviews were acting largely as counsel for the accused rather than writing such opinions as would emanate from an appellate court. This was so apparent that from time to time we had to issue instructions that the reviews should not be in the nature of briefs but rather in the nature of opinions.

Q. Referring to the safeguards placed around an accused, what is the effect of the safeguards in the administration of military justice as now applied compared to those in civil practice?—A. As a result of the reviews of general court-martial cases in the office of the Judge Advocate General, I am certain that the accused have received as much, if not greater, consideration than the accused receive in appellate civil tribunals. The reviews in the office of the Judge Advocate General are much more carefully prepared than most opinions in civil appellate tribunals; that is to say, the accused receives more careful consideration and his case the scrutiny of more lawyers in the Judge Advocate General's office than it does in any appellate court that I know of. I may add here that for 20 years I have been a reporter of the Court of Appeals of the District of Columbia and accordingly am familiar with its opinions. Every case in the office receives the scrutiny of at least five or six men before it is put in final shape.

Q. What has been the impression produced by this unfortunate controversy upon the officers on duty in the Military Justice Section, so far as you have observed?—A. It has to a certain extent affected the morale of the office and has disorganized it to some extent. The dominant feeling is one of indignation that an impression should be left upon the public that the men of the office have been derelict in their duty in safeguarding men and officers tried by military tribunals.

Q. You say it has affected the morale of the office. Can you explain fully what you have in mind?—A. In the first place, it has resulted in many discussions among the men based upon newspaper reports concerning the controversies between their superior officers. I would not say there have been any factions in the office, but there has been more or less difference of opinion as to the right and wrong of the controversy; the whole thing has been so involved in obscurity that it necessarily has given rise to a great deal of talk and discussion. Few, if any, of the men have understood what the real issues were in the controversy; that is to say, whether they involved personal questions only, or whether they were based solely upon a desire for reform.

Q. Have these discussions led to any personal unpleasantness?—A. Absolutely none, so far as I know. Every man in the office that I have heard discuss the matter has expressed himself in terms of very great admiration for the ability displayed by Gen. Ansell while he was acting as Acting Judge Advocate General and for Gen. Crowder for the work that he has done. I know of no man in the division who has taken any sides in the matter at all.

Q. Do you know of any instance of any man or men in the division who, as the result of this controversy, are not on entirely friendly terms with either Gen. Ansell or Gen. Crowder?—A. Not one. I do know, of course, that since this controversy began the relations between the men and Gen. Ansell have not been as close—that is to say, he has not as often sent for them and consulted with them since Gen. Crowder's return to the office—their relations have been almost entirely with Gen. Crowder. That is perfectly natural under the circumstances.

Q. You do not attribute that to any ill feeling, but rather to his change of status in the office?—A. Exactly.

Q. Do you consider that the conditions which you have just mentioned have interfered with the administration of that division?—A. To a certain extent, yes. Of course, the matter has died down now to a considerable extent, and there is much less discussion and interference with the work of the office than there was when the controversy began.

Q. You are familiar with General Order No. 7, and also General Order No. 84?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Have you any knowledge as to the discussions or the conditions concerning the issuance of General Order No. 84 in so far as it amended General Order No. 7?—A. My recollection of the matter is this: Some time in the latter part of August or early part of September, as the result of letters received from Gen. Kreger, in which were pointed out differences between himself and Gen. Bethel over the authority of Gen. Kreger in the review of general court-martial records; the matter of granting Gen. Kreger greater authority was discussed by Gen. Ansell with Col. Read, chief of the division, and the members of the board of review, which then consisted of Lieut. Col. Power, Maj. Keedy, and myself. At an interview, at which I think we were all present, the draft of a modification of General Order No. 7 was prepared, dictated, I think, by Gen. Ansell, with numerous suggestions on the part of the rest of us. Col. Read desired to see a copy of this modification that was dictated by Gen. Ansell, and we left, some of us, including Col. Read, with the impression that copies of this dictation would be sent to us for further revision. It appears that Gen. Ansell understood that we all agreed upon the modification of the order as then dictated by him and submitted that to the Chief of Staff. Thereafter, when it was ascertained that a misunderstanding on this point existed, Gen. Ansell sent to the Chief of Staff and procured the papers that he had submitted to it, and Col. Read, Lieut. Col. Power, Maj. Keedy, and I went over the paper again and made some further changes, and finally submitted to Gen. Ansell the modification of General Order No. 84, which met with our approval, and this last paper, which was identical with the General Order No. 84 as published, was then submitted to Gen. Ansell, and I understand submitted by him to the General Staff.

Q. Was that the form of amendment which at that time was agreed upon by Gen. Ansell and you officers, which was identical with the form in which it appeared in General Order No. 84 when it was published?—A. Yes, sir; as finally revised by us. The draft as originally submitted to the Chief of Staff, as I recall it, differed slightly with the final draft that we prepared.

Q. Do you recall the points of difference?—A. No; I do not. They were merely verbal.

Q. But the original draft embodied that feature which compelled the commanding general to abide by a recommendation of the Acting Judge Advocate?—A. Yes; that particular provision was considered the most important part of the whole order.

Q. Was there at that time any discussion of the ruling of the Secretary of War on section 1199?—A. I don't recall section 1199 being discussed. It was recognized that it gave Gen. Kreger a power that was not possessed by the Judge Advocate General of the Army. There is no doubt about that. It was done with that intention—of giving him that greater power. In fact, I remember in the discussion that the expression was used that it was a wedge that perhaps would result finally in a greater power being given the Judge Advocate General of the Army.

Q. Is there anything further you wish to state?—A. It is to be regretted that the public has not been made better acquainted with the actual work of the revision that has been done in the last year by this office and what has been accomplished. It is unfortunate that the impression should be left on the public mind that all of the severe sentences that have been pronounced by courts-martial have been carried into effect; as a matter of fact, they have not been. To illustrate by a concrete case: Czarniecki, a soldier was sentenced to death for desertion last summer. I happened to write the review. The review disapproved the finding or rather modified the finding to absence without leave. The man was sent to the disciplinary barracks for a term of several years. Just a day or two ago I was asked whether there was any reason why the man should not be restored to the colors. I said there was not, and I believe he has been or is about to be restored to the colors. There you have a man sentenced to death a few months ago now at liberty or who will shortly be restored to liberty. This is typical of innumerable cases of that sort, and it is true of many of these cases of alleged barbarous and severe sentences. If the public were only made acquainted with the fact that the mere imposition of a sentence means practically nothing, it would aid, it seems to me, in placing the office in a very much better position. I went to Gen. Crowder and expressed myself as I have expressed myself to you. I asked him for permission to make public a memorandum prepared by Col. Wigmore on the subject of the administration of military justice, and was told it might be used. After taking up the matter with the correspondent of the New York Times, Gen. Crowder concluded that the memorandum had better be made public by Senator Chamberlain.

Q. Was that memorandum prepared by Col. Wigmore sent to Mr. Chamberlain?—A. Yes; it was sent to the Secretary, and by the Secretary sent to Mr. Chamberlain.

Q. That all was made public?—A. It was put in the Congressional Record, but otherwise not made public.

MARCH 17, 1919.

Q. Give your full name, rank, and the duties upon which you are engaged.—

A. William H. Kirkpatrick, major, a member of the board of review, Judge Advocate General's Office, second division.

Q. How long have you been on duty in the Judge Advocate General's Office?—

A. I was commissioned August 27, 1918, and reported on September 6, 1918.

Q. Have you been on duty during this period continuously in the division of military justice?—A. I have.

Q. Under the military code as it now exists does the organization of the Judge Advocate General's Office, in the division of military justice operate efficiently and effectively in guarding the rights of officers and enlisted men?—A. I should say that it does; without the slightest question.

Q. The protection which the present system gives compares how, in your mind, with the protection given in cases tried by civil courts? I am speaking now of the appellate end of it.—A. Speaking merely from the standpoint of the appellate authority, I should say that the accused receives fuller protection under the present system than does the accused in the civil courts. The only restriction that I meant to make was that I was confining what I say to the appellate end of the proceeding.

Q. State briefly what you have in mind.—A. I think that the entire system of military justice as administered within my experience, works more efficiently and more successfully than justice as administered in the civil courts, for the reason that it has removed a great many of the technical protections, so called, which the accused in civil court proceedings may avail himself of, and thereby frequently defeat the ends of justice.

Q. In your observations has this controversy in any way reacted to affect the morale or efficiency of the division of military justice of the Judge Advocate General's Office?—A. The controversy has, of course, created differences of opinion in the office, but so far as I have observed has not resulted in lowering the morale or creating dissent.

Q. Have these differences in opinion and discussions resulted at all in personal unpleasantness in the relations of the officers, between themselves or the officers and either Gen. Crowder or Gen. Ansell?—A. Only to this extent, sir: That I believe there is some feeling that the published reports of Gen. Ansell's testimony did not do justice to the work which has been done by the officers of this division. I say the published reports, because every time I hear it discussed it has been with the reservation that Gen. Ansell, in his actual testimony, may have actually done full justice to the work of officers in the division. I don't think that at any time Gen. Ansell has been charged with the full newspaper reports.

Q. You say justice has not been done to the officers on duty there. What is the office general opinion as to whether or not justice has been done to the functioning of the office?—A. If you please, General, I did not say that in my mind justice has not been done, but that discussions were based on the fact that the newspaper reports did not do justice to the work, according to Gen. Ansell's testimony. What I mean to say is not to the officers themselves, but to the work which they have done, in that the newspaper reports have, of course, dwelt upon the crudities of the actual court-martial proceedings and did not make anything of the corrective action taken in the office here.

MARCH 17, 1919.

Maj. Sherman Moreland, Military Justice Division, Judge Advocate General's Office, after being duly sworn, testified as follows:

Questions by Gen. Chamberlain:

Q. Under the military code, as it now exists, what is your opinion as to the operation of the organizations of the Division of Military Justice of the Judge Advocate General's Office, in the protection of the enlisted man who has disobeyed the laws?—A. I think that, taking the system of military justice from top to bottom, the accused gets justice oftener than he gets it in the civil courts. It possibly is the fact that he gets injustice done to him, in the first instance, more frequently than he gets it done to him in the civil courts, but, on the other hand, he gets justice done to him more frequently in the first instance in military trials than he does in trials in civil courts, and the injustices which are done to him in the first instance in military courts are corrected. I think, in a manner that is deserving of the highest commendation, and I think can compare very favorably with the protection which he gets in civil courts.

Q. Has this unfortunate controversy, which has arisen in connection with the Judge Advocate General's Office, operated to affect the morale of the Division of Military Justice or to affect the efficiency of its operation?—A. Due to things that occurred about the time the controversy opened, I do not think it has affected the morale or the efficiency of the office.

Q. Has it, so far as you have observed, affected the personal friendly relations between the officers of that division or between such officers and either Gen. Crowder or Gen. Ansell?—A. I do not think it has. I believe that the published reports of Gen. Ansell's attitude have produced a good deal of resentment in the minds of many officers of the department of military justice.

Q. Because of what?—A. The reason being that it was regarded by such officers as, if not an unfair, at least not a full statement of the work of the department and reflected on many who had reason to believe that they were acting, not only legally, but conscientiously in regard to the matters put before them. As an illustration of the effect of the published reports of Gen. Ansell's testimony, the two boards of review met together and requested Gen. Crowder to permit them to make a statement to the press, and also requested him to obtain an opportunity for them to testify before the Senate committee, the members of those boards believing that the published report of Gen. Ansell's testimony had placed them in a false light with the people from whom they came, and that, in order to protect themselves, they would have to clear that up in some way or other.

Q. Give your full name, rank, and present duties.—A. James Sidney Sanner; major; member of the second board of review, Division of Military Justice, Judge Advocate General's office.

Q. How long have you been on duty in the office of the Judge Advocate General?—A. Since the 28th or 29th of October, 1918.

Q. Have you been on duty in the Division of Military Justice during that time?—A. Continuously.

Q. As a result of your service in the Division of Military Justice, what is your opinion as to the protection given to officers and enlisted men tried by court-martial? Does the system in force operate effectively and efficiently to give to these men all the protection which the law permits?—A. I know nothing whatever about officers' cases. My duties are concerned altogether with cases affecting enlisted men. As to them I would say that on review by the Judge Advocate General's office the machinery is extraordinarily elaborate for the protection of accused and convicted persons. In so far as the machinery before review may be involved, the system, in my judgment, functions as well as systems of judicature do generally, that is to say, here and there will be found miscarriages and mistakes, which the Judge Advocate General's Office is busily correcting.

Q. So far as you have observed has this controversy affected the morale of the office, or has it in any way interfered with cooperation and affected the efficient working of the machinery?—A. So far as I have been able to observe, not in the slightest degree. At the outset of the organization of the second board of review we were given certain liberal and human standards of judgment, both by Col. Reed, chief of the division, and by Gen. Ansell, the acting head of the office, which standards have been in no sense modified by the taking over of the office by Gen. Crowder.

Q. Are you aware of any personal unpleasantness which was brought on by this controversy between officers of the division themselves, or between such officers and either Gen. Crowder or Gen. Ansell?—A. All controversies create partisanship in a sense, and there have been differences of opinion in the office respecting this controversy, but nothing of a bitter character or at all of a character that entered into the execution of the work. I can say that there has been no division into parties or camps, or any division that has the slightest effect upon the point of view or the getting out of the work.

WASHINGTON, D. C., March 25, 1919.

Recall of Maj. Sanner.

Q. You are a member of the special board of review, are you not?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. State briefly the functions of that board.—A. A board ordered by Gen. Crowder to consider the legal sufficiency of records criticized by the board of pardons as being either poorly tried or badly tried, or weak, or not convincing upon the evidence. The board is required to advise the general in each instance of such criticism whether the same is just.

Q. State briefly the conclusions which you have formed as to the efficiency of this system.—A. Just what proportion of the whole number are criticized by the clemency board in the first instance I am not able to say except by hearsay. My opinion is that not more than 1 in 10, if that many, are so criticized. The board finds that between 1 and 2 in 10 of these criticisms is justified, so that the proportion of bad trials to the whole number of cases is extremely small—way below the common experience of appellate procedure in the civil law. As the result of four years' experience on the trial bench of Montana and nearly six years' experience upon its appellate bench, my observation is that no system of judicature exhibits any better, if as good a record.

WASHINGTON, D. C., March 18, 1919.

Col. Lewis W. Call, Judge Advocate General's Department, being first duly sworn, was interrogated by Maj. Gen. J. L. Chamberlain, Inspector General, and testified as follows:

Q. What is your name, rank, and organization?—A. Lewis W. Call; colonel; Judge Advocate General's Department.

Q. You are on duty at the present time in the office of the Judge Advocate General?—A. I am, sir.

Q. How long have you been on duty in the office?—A. As a commissioned officer?

Q. Yes.—A. I have been on duty as a commissioned officer since August 20, 1917.

Q. During the entire period have you been on duty in the Division of Military Justice?—A. No, sir.

Q. Have not been on that duty at all?—A. No, sir.

Q. What duty are you on?—A. I have been chief of the Division of Contracts, Claims, Accounts, and Fiscal Affairs.

Q. You are familiar with this controversy which is going on in connection with the office of the Judge Advocate General?—A. Simply as it appears in the public press.

Q. So far as you have observed, has this controversy affected the morale of the office?—A. I think that it has not to any appreciable degree. The matter is talked over more or less, but I have not noticed that it affects the loyalty to the office of any officer.

Q. Do you consider that it has affected operations to such an extent as to have affected the efficiency of the office?—A. I do not.

Q. So far as you have observed has it affected the personal relations of the personnel of the office?—A. I have not observed that it has.

Q. You tell me you have never been associated with the Division of Military Justice so that you would not be familiar with the details of the operation of that division?—A. Only in this way, that the questions arising in the Division of Military Justice have been discussed in conference, including officers of other divisions.

EXHIBIT 20.

MARCH 18, 1919.

Questions by Gen. J. L. Chamberlain. Answers by Col. E. G. Davis.

Q. Give your full name, rank, and present duties.—A. Col. E. G. Davis, Judge Advocate General's Department; retired officer serving at the present time under the grade of colonel.

Q. How long have you been on duty in the office of the Judge Advocate General?—A. I was in the office of the Judge Advocate General from the 1st of June, 1917, to about the 9th or 10th of September, 1918, since that time I have been on duty with the General Staff.

Q. During what portion of this period were you on duty in the Division of Military Justice?—A. From about the middle of October, 1917, until the middle of May, 1918. Those dates are approximate only.

Q. Are you familiar with the controversy pertaining to the administration of military justice which has arisen and which has become such a prominent feature in the public press?—A. I am.

Q. Will you state briefly, please, any facts which you may have bearing upon this controversy? Going back to October, 1917.—A. As I stated, I took up my duties in the Judge Advocate General's Office on the 1st of June, 1917. I held various positions, including that of executive officer until some time, I think, about the middle of October, 1917, when I was placed in charge of the Disciplinary Division of the Judge Advocate General's Office. At that time Gen. Ansell was Acting Judge Advocate General. He had consulted me freely during the time that he had been in charge of the office and had told me that he was not satisfied with the way in which that office was being administered, in that he thought that a too rigid adherence was being observed toward the Regular Army ideals; that he wanted to find a man more liberal in his tendencies, and who would be less bound by the traditions of the office than the former incumbent had been (referring to Col. White); and he wanted me to try out the work. At the time I took over that branch of the office there were but three or four officers besides myself on duty there, and two or three civilian clerks. The work increased very rapidly from that time on, and the force in the office increased very rapidly also. I had not been there very long when a case known as the "mutiny case" came to the office. The defendants in that case had been sentenced to dishonorable discharge and terms of imprisonment ranging from two to five years. I reviewed the record in that case and wrote the opinion of the Judge Advocate General's Office. We decided, after full consultation, that the men had been improperly convicted of mutiny, and that the fullest kind of restoration which the law authorized should be had in that case. I wrote the review after the customary form and terminated with a recommendation that any unexecuted portion of the sentence be remitted, and that, upon their written application to that effect, the men be allowed to reenlist. Gen. Ansell was dissatisfied with this solution. He argued that it did not do full justice to the men, and he began to hunt around to determine whether or not some fuller remedy could not be found under existing law. He directed that I make a search of the statutes and the decisions to see if something could not be done along that line, and, among other things, I examined section 1199, Revised Statutes, and reported to him that I thought a higher power could be deduced from that statute, if thought advisable. I prepared a brief along that line and submitted it to him, and Gen. Ansell used this brief as a basis of a more elaborate brief which he prepared and submitted to the Secretary of War on this same subject. Briefly, the contention of Gen. Ansell was that the word "revised," as found in 1199, Revised Statutes, conferred authority upon the Judge Advocate General to set aside, vacate, modify, or reverse any sentence of a court-martial, no matter at what stage of execution the sentence might be when the record came to the Judge Advocate General's Office. That brief was submitted to the Secretary of War and by him referred to Gen. Crowder. I might say that before being submitted to the Secretary of War it was submitted, in an office conference, to all officers on duty in the Judge Advocate General's Office, and all of us, I think, including myself, assented to the brief.

My own assent was in effect that the power could be deduced from the statute, if the Secretary thought it advisable to attempt it at this time, but I advised Gen. Ansell against the form of action which he proposed to take in that and similar cases. He believed that the power should reside in the Judge Advocate General to take any corrective action that might be found necessary in a court-martial case. He was not satisfied with the procedure which had therefore been followed of making recommendations to the Secretary of War, or through him to the President, and letting the corrective action be taken in obedience to an order issued by the Secretary of War, or under the direction of the Secretary. In this mutiny case, to which I referred, he accepted my review of the case, but changed the concluding paragraph of the review. He introduced language of this kind, which, I think, had never before been used in a review prepared in the Judge Advocate General's Office: "I hereby set aside the judgment of conviction and the sentence in the case of each of these several defendants, and recommend that the necessary orders be issued restoring each of them to duty." It was Gen. Ansell's contention that this ultimate power of saying whether the verdict of a court-martial should stand should be vested in the Judge Advocate General rather than in the Secretary of War or in the President. From that particular view I strongly dissented at the time the brief was prepared and advised Gen. Ansell against taking that position. I told him that the logical outcome of such a position would be that he (the Judge Advocate General) would be asserting the right to reverse or modify or set aside the completed action of even the President of the United States in cases where he might be the reviewing or confirming authority. Gen. Ansell replied that he would not hesitate on that account; that he thought the principle was right, and he was willing to go to the extreme limit. This opinion, which Gen. Ansell submitted to the Secretary of War in support of his position was, by the Secretary of War, referred to Gen. Crowder, and almost immediately thereafter Gen. Ansell received a note from the Secretary of War which he (Gen. Ansell) showed me, in which the Secretary said that Gen. Crowder had found it possible to so divide his time that he could give a part of each day to the office of the Judge Advocate General, and that he was sure Gen. Ansell would be glad to welcome Gen. Crowder back to his official family. Gen. Crowder thereupon returned to the Judge Advocate General's Office and resumed control.

Q. Upon what date was Gen. Ansell's memorandum of November 10, relative to the construction of section 1199, Revised Statutes, submitted to the War Department?—A. I would say, from my recollection of the matter, that it was probably submitted on that same date, or not more than one or two days thereafter. I mean by date—November 10. I might say in fuller explanation of that that the memorandum which had been prepared in the mutiny case, and which bears the date of October 30, 1917, was held in the Judge Advocate General's office and submitted to the Secretary of War with the memorandum which Gen. Ansell prepared in support of his views as to the construction of section 1199, Revised Statutes.

I discovered that Gen. Crowder had prepared and submitted to the Secretary of War an opposing brief of his views prior to his return to the Judge Advocate General's office. Within a day or two after his return he gave me a copy of his brief and asked that it be made the subject of study in the Disciplinary Division of his office. This was done. He, about that time, or shortly thereafter, directed Col. Clarke, who was my principal assistant, and myself to make a further study for the purpose of ascertaining and stating at length the arguments which could be deduced from a study of the law and the decided cases in support of his view of the statute. Col. Clarke and myself made this thorough study and investigation and we discovered what had been overlooked in the first study of this matter and what, I think, Gen. Ansell had also overlooked; that the very point he was contending for had been made the subject of a decision in one of the Federal courts in a district of New York and decided adversely to his contention. We collected these authorities for Gen. Crowder and began the study of what action could be taken by the War Department to prevent the infliction of hardships in any case tried by military court which might result in a change of status before the case was reviewed by the Judge Advocate General's office. It had been Gen. Ansell's contention that full justice could not be done the men in the mutiny case because they were dishonorably discharged and the discharge had been executed and the men could not be put back until they themselves applied for restoration. We made this study for the purpose of determining whether there was a method of staying the execution of sentences which could be made of force and effect under the statutes as they then existed, and thus prevent the occurrence of any case which could not be fully corrected by the processes of the Judge Advocate General's office and the War Department, as they had theretofore been exercised. About that time the Houston riot cases came to a climax by the execution of 13 negroes at Fort Sam Houston, Tex. That case had been tried and the sentences executed before the War Department knew what the result of the trial had been. That came as something of a shock to the War Department and it was anticipated that a great deal of objection over the country would arise as to what seemed like a summary execution of the court-martial judgment without opportunity to appeal to the pardoning power for clemency. I think that apprehension was not well founded, because the objection which we expected did not develop, but it emphasized the necessity of having some power of review in the Judge Advocate General's office before a sentence of that character could be executed, and we prepared and asked the War Department to issue a general order, which was paragraph 1 of General Order 169, War Department, 1918. This was an order which stayed the execution of any sentence of death until reviewed in the Judge Advocate General's office. That was simply a first step in the formulation of what later was issued as a General Order No. 7, 1918.

Col. Clarke and I continued our study of that matter, and when we finally had our data together and agreed upon what could be legally done, I drafted what was later General Order No. 7, 1918, and submitted it to Gen. Crowder for approval, together with a memorandum which was prepared for his signature, to be submitted to the Secretary of War, in support of this corrective action. General Order No. 7 was designed to stay the execution of any sentence of death, dismissal of an officer, or dishonorable discharge of an enlisted man until such sentence could be reviewed as to its legality in the office of the Judge Advocate General. Gen. Ansell objected to the issuance of this order. He objected to it on the ground that it was not based on correct legal theory; that it was an interference with the power of reviewing authorities conferred by statute, and he filed a memorandum with Gen. Crowder in which he opposed the issuance of this order and stated that in any event it did not go far enough and would not work out the corrective action that was necessary.

Gen. Ansell still contended that his view of section 1199 was correct. He never accepted the other theory and never willingly supported it. When the action of the Federal court of New York was called to his attention, it was found that the exact point had been there passed upon. That was the case, General, of Sergt. Mason, who tried to shoot Gulteau, the assassin of President Garfield. If I remember correctly, the Judge Advocate General decided in that case that there was something irregular with the proceeding and had recommended that they be set aside. The Secretary of War, or the President, had refused to follow his recommendation, and the contention in the civil court was that the ruling of the Judge Advocate General was decisive of the matter; that his views must be followed, or, in other words, that he had the power to set aside and reverse this finding. The Federal court practically laughed the contention out of court, did not treat it seriously, and decided that no such power had been conferred upon the Judge Advocate General.

Gen. Ansell disposed of this case by saying that it was only the decision of an inferior Federal court and not the decision of the highest court of last resort, and he still contended for his own view. After General Order No. 7 had been made effective, Gen. Ansell was in a position intermediate between myself and Gen. Crowder. I disposed of, over my own signature, all cases which were reviewed by the office and found correct. I sent up for his signature all cases in which we found corrective action necessary, or in which we found some error of law which had to be passed upon by the opinion of the head of the office. All of these cases which went forward for action passed through Gen. Ansell's hands. Gen. Ansell has stated in his testimony before the Senate Military Committee that he was relieved of all responsibility for the administration of military justice from some time in November, 1917, until about the middle of July, 1918. I quote these words from his testimony: "From some time in November until the time I left for France, about the middle of April, I had nothing to do with the administration of military justice. I mean that the proceedings did not come over my desk." That statement is not correct. During all the time that he was in the office as Acting Judge Advocate General, every—

Q. When you use the words "Acting Judge Advocate General," do you use it advisedly or do you mean as senior assistant in the office of the Judge Advocate General?—A. As a matter of fact, Gen. Ansell was the senior assistant in the office of the Judge Advocate General, but in this capacity he signed possibly 50 to 75 per cent of all papers that were signed in the office, and he signed himself as Acting Judge Advocate General, even though Gen. Crowder was present and at the head of the office. Therefore, when I referred to Gen. Ansell as Acting Judge Advocate General, I mean that he assumed to act as the Judge Advocate General in the final disposition of papers and signed himself as the Acting Judge Advocate General.

Q. Was the status of Gen. Ansell, by virtue of being the senior assistant from the period, November, 1917, until the middle of April, 1918, in any way different from his status prior to November, 1917?—A. His status was in no wise different, except that after Gen. Crowder returned to the office of the Judge Advocate General in November, 1917, Gen. Ansell had ceased to be the highest ranking officer in the office and had become the senior assistant. In all other respects his position was the same.

* * * So that, as I say, from the middle of November until the middle of April, all cases which I passed up for the action of higher authority passed through Gen. Ansell's hands, and he finally disposed of and signed many more cases than he passed on for the action of Gen. Crowder. If the general court-martial reviews for the months between November and the middle of April were examined they would show that Gen. Ansell's signature will be found appended to a very great many.

My position in the office during this period was a very difficult one, for the reason that all of these cases had to pass through Gen. Ansell. Whenever a case involving the application of General Order No. 7 would be sent to his desk, Gen. Ansell would send for me and would contend that the action recommended was improper or ineffective or wrong in theory, or something of that kind, and would again go over on every possible occasion the old argument that his action under 1199 was the only correct one after all, and that the office was simply compromising with principle by trying to make any other solution work.

Q. Were any memoranda prepared by Gen. Ansell, or is there anything on record which would show that he had persistently adhered to his views and resisted the application of views contrary to same?—A. I am not sure whether anything was made of record in that connection or not. After General Order No. 7 went into effect there never arose any case in the Judge Advocate General's office, so far as I know, in which it could be fairly claimed that the department was without power to do full and exact justice to the defendant. The criticism which has been lately made public that a great many severe sentences were imposed by general court-martial is not, in my judgment, in any way related to the administration of justice under the law as it existed, and under the law which Gen. Ansell found so much fault with. That whole difficulty could have been corrected by a simple suggestion from the War Department as to limits of punishment which should be applicable in time of war. I discovered early in my administration of the disciplinary division that many sentences were excessive; that punishments were widely varying; that in two cases of perhaps the same nature one would be punished mildly and the other severely, and I asked Gen. Ansell in the fall of 1917, many times, as to whether our office should attempt to take corrective action for the purpose of equalizing punishment and making such adjustments, as we could make at the time these sentences were imposed. The answer to that was always that it would perhaps be inadvisable to attempt to make all of those corrections at that time; that many of these men who were sentenced to long terms of confinement would go to the disciplinary barracks for a time, and shortly thereafter return to duty, and long sentences would automatically take care of themselves; that when the war was over would be a more opportune time to make these general corrections.

I perhaps ought to say, in justice to Gen. Ansell on this point, that he was not entirely clear in this matter. Although he never gave any positive directions as to what should be done, there were times when he very much doubted the wisdom of approving a sentence without attempting to reduce it to a punishment more suited to that particular case.

I also consulted Gen. Crowder about this matter, and Gen. Crowder was of the opinion that it would be unwise, with all the work we had to get through with, to attempt to make adjustment at the time the sentences were passed upon; that if the sentences were legal and valid it was well, unless the sentence was extremely excessive, to let it alone. In many cases we recommended substantial reduction, and so far as I know, these were carried into effect by the War Department upon the recommendation of the Judge Advocate General.

Q. You stated a moment ago that after the issuance of General Order No. 7 the Judge Advocate General's Office found no case which, under the law, they were not able to correct any injustice which was done. Were there any cases in which the recommendations of the Judge Advocate General to undo injustice or to do justice which were not carried out by the War Department?

—A. I do not at this time remember a single case in which recommendation was made by the Judge Advocate General for a remission or mitigation of a sentence of an enlisted man that was not carried into effect. There were several recommendations made by Gen. Ansell, while Acting Judge Advocate General, that were not approved by the War Department, but I think the failure to approve was rather because his recommendations would work injustice than otherwise.

I refer to a number of cases in which officers were tried for offenses involving the use of intoxicating liquor. Gen. Ansell adopted the policy early in his administration of the office that whenever an officer was tried for any offense involving the use of intoxicating liquor, no matter what the action of the court was, no matter what the sentence of the court was, if it appeared from the evidence that he had used it, or that he probably used it, Gen. Ansell insisted upon submitting a recommendation that that officer be summarily discharged. Many recommendations of that kind were disapproved by the War Department, but are the only ones disapproved during my incumbency of that position. Yes; there was one other—a case involving the trial of cadets at West Point, recommendations, which were prepared at the direction of Gen. Ansell, were not approved, but they were in the nature of increased punishment rather than a recommendation for clemency. I know of no recommendation for clemency that was disapproved.

Certain cases of considerable importance that have recently been discussed in the public press occurred during my administration of the Disciplinary Division of the Office of the Judge Advocate General. These were known as the four death cases which came from France. Two of them involved a sentence of death for sleeping on post, and two a sentence of death for disobedience of orders. This case has been cited to show the attitude of the Judge Advocate General's Department toward the doing of justice, and inasmuch as this case was reviewed while I was in the office, I think it proper to mention the facts in that connection. Gen. Ansell, in his letter to Congressman Burnett, made it appear that it was necessary for him to go over the head of Gen. Crowder and the Secretary of War and make a sort of special appeal to the President through a member of the judiciary committee of the House in order to prevent the execution of these sentences. Those cases arose under General Order No. 7, and the execution of the sentences was naturally stayed until the record could be reviewed in the office of the Judge Advocate General. More than this, the cases were of that character which required the action of the President as confirming authority before they could be executed.

When these cases first came to the office I assigned them to Maj. Rand for review. Maj. Rand is an exceptionally good lawyer, and reviewed these cases, wrote a brief review in each case, and finally recommended that the sentences be carried into execution. These four cases, as prepared by him, were sent by me to Gen. Ansell. A letter had been written by Gen. Pershing recommending the execution of the sentence of death in these cases. Maj. Rand embodied this letter in the review of one of the cases, and merely referred to it in the review of the other three. Shortly after these cases were submitted to Gen. Ansell I was called to his office, I think by Col. Mayes, who was then acting as Gen. Ansell's assistant, and who read over all papers before they were finally signed by Gen. Ansell or passed on by him for Gen. Crowder's signature. Col. Mayes stated they had decided that it would be better that Gen. Pershing's letter should be embodied in the review of each of the four cases, instead of merely being referred to in three of them. The reviews were sent back for that particular change. No other suggestion was made, either as to the recommendation or as to any other feature of the review. After this correction had been made I again submitted the cases to Gen. Ansell, and they passed through him to Gen. Crowder for his signature. The rule of the office was that any paper which passed Gen. Ansell and got to Gen. Crowder's desk for his signature had met with Gen. Ansell's approval, unless the opposing view was indicated in a memorandum or verbally communicated.

Q. Were such papers initialed by him?—A. I think, if I remember correctly, that Gen. Ansell did not make a practice of putting his initials on the papers but would append a slip of paper and put his O. K. on that.

After these cases had been passed on to Gen. Crowder, he (Gen. Crowder) brought them to the disciplinary division with the statement that he could not sign such reviews; that they were entirely too brief and that it would be an injustice to ask the President to send four men to death without stating fully all the facts and circumstances surrounding the trial, so he would have a complete picture of what he was doing. Gen. Crowder assigned Col. Clarke to a special study of these cases and Col. Clarke reviewed them in connection with all other trials coming from that same division at about the same time. He rewrote the reviews and again submitted them to Gen. Crowder, this time, I think, direct. Gen. Crowder was still dissatisfied and required further elaboration, and finally Col. Clarke prepared them in a manner satisfactory to Gen. Crowder and submitted them, with the concluding paragraph of the review omitted, the idea being that would be inserted by Gen. Crowder in his own words. These cases finally reached this stage along in the early days of April, 1918. One morning about that time I was called into Gen. Ansell's office and Gen. Ansell asked me, "What's the matter with Gen. Crowder?"—I think he said, "What the hell, etc.—about these cases." He said, "He just directed me to write a review in those cases." I said, "Gen. Crowder is very anxious about those cases. He does not want to sign a recommendation that the sentences be executed until he knows that that is justified," and I remarked further that Col. Clarke, who had been studying these cases, thought that these sentences should not be executed, and Gen. Ansell then remarked, "Well, I don't agree with Clarke. I think they ought to be."

The review which he prepared, however, in the manner I have indicated, simply embodied the statement of the case which had been made by Col. Clarke and ended with his own statement that he thought the sentence ought not to be executed.

Gen. Crowder then took all papers prepared for him and he prepared, in his own language, a memorandum for the Secretary of War setting forth all the facts and circumstances connected with the trial of these cases. Gen. Crowder had actually recommended that the sentences be carried into execution, finding that the trials were legal; that there was evidence to support the findings, etc., but his accompanying memorandum, in which he set out all the reasons why the sentences ought not to be executed, was treated by the Chief of Staff as a recommendation for clemency and he filed a memorandum, I think, stating that he did not agree with the views of the Judge Advocate General.

The Secretary of War adopted the views of Gen. Crowder and wrote a long letter to the President, explaining the case and recommending the sentences be commuted. The President wrote to the Secretary of War a letter, in which he thanked him for the clear presentation of these cases and stated that he entirely agreed with his view of the action to be taken, and that he was glad to sign the order prepared for his signature. Both the letter of the Secretary of War and the letter bearing the signature of the President are on file with those cases in the office of the Judge Advocate General.

Referring again to General Order No. 7 and Gen. Ansell's criticism of it, I noticed that in his letter to Congressman Burnett he used the following language: "The Judge Advocate General recommended and the department finally adopted an administrative method known as General Order No. 7, which suspended certain sentences until the proceedings could be examined in this office and the commanding general advised with. This was an administrative palliative which was described by the Judge Advocate General as necessary to 'head off a threatened congressional investigation,' to 'silence criticism,' 'to prevent talk about the establishment of courts of appeal,' and to make it 'apparent that an accused did get some kind of revision of his proceedings other than the revision at field headquarters.'"

He here speaks of the recommendation of the Judge Advocate General as an administrative method and as an administrative palliative which was described by the Judge Advocate General as necessary to head off "threatened congressional investigation," to "silence criticism," to "prevent talk about the establishment of courts of appeal," and to "make it apparent that an accused did get some kind of revision of his proceedings other than the revision at field headquarters." The use by Gen. Ansell of these quotation marks would seem to indicate that these matters so included were used as an argument for the establishment of General Order No. 7. Inasmuch as I prepared both the order and the argument in support of it, I am confident that no such language was used in anything that had to do with obtaining the approval of the Secretary of War in the establishment of that order.

Q. What was Gen. Crowder's actual attitude with respect to General Order No. 7?—A. So far as I know, Gen. Crowder's attitude was this: He believed that it would effectively meet any criticism which had been raised by Gen. Ansell as to a lack of corrective power in the office of the Judge Advocate General when cases were reviewed in which we discovered that errors of law had been made in the trial and disposition of the case. I do not know, of course, what the innermost attitude of Gen. Crowder toward this order was, but that was the purpose of its adoption, and it was designed as a complete answer to the contention that the War Department was incapable to do justice to the men tried by court-martial. I note also, in referring to this same order, that Gen. Ansell claims that full action under this order was not taken until September, 1918, after his return from France. He states that prior to that time the office view had been that the Judge Advocate General's office was limited in passing upon any case that came to the office under that order to technical questions of law, and that they were forbidden by the terms of the order to advise convening authorities as to punishments that had been given in particular cases. He states that notwithstanding the order and notwithstanding the view that had been taken by the Judge Advocate General's office he reversed that view and instructed boards of review to express their opinion in addressing military commanders to the effect that justice would require clemency on their part in passing upon certain sentences, and if it was a case in which the commanding general could not take action that we would forward the proceedings direct to the President, which means the Secretary of War.

Gen. Ansell is mistaken in his statement that this is the first time that this corrective action was applied under General Order No. 7. General Order No. 7 was administered during the time that I was in the Judge Advocate General's Office and in the Disciplinary Division. We conceived it a function of the Judge Advocate General's Office to constantly advise reviewing authorities as to the action which it would be proper to take in particular cases by them. We suggested that they reverse or set aside the action of the court wherever errors of law had been exhibited inasmuch as they had reserved jurisdiction to do so, and we also suggested certain mitigation of punishment in particular cases when we thought the case deserved it.

It was exactly this procedure that Gen. Ansell so strenuously objected to as it was applied in the early part of 1918, under General Order No. 7. He stated, for instance, that a commanding general could not, under the law, reverse jurisdiction to take any further action in a court-martial case which had once passed his hands; that when he had acted on it such action was final, and if any corrective action was later taken it had to be taken by the Secretary of War, or, as he contended, it should be properly taken by the Judge Advocate General, under the power which he claimed could be deduced from 1199, Revised Statutes.

During the time that I was in the Disciplinary Division, notwithstanding these views held by Gen. Ansell, having Gen. Crowder's support for the carrying out of this policy, this action continued to be taken.

On the 18th of April, 1918, I left the office of the Judge Advocate General to make a trip of inspection of the military camps in this country, for the purpose of ascertaining how General Order No. 7 was being carried out and how military justice was administered in these camps under this order. Upon my return to the office of the Judge Advocate General, about the middle of May, I found that Gen. Ansell had, in the meantime, departed for his trip to France, and Col. Mayes had become the senior assistant to Gen. Crowder and was signing papers as Acting Judge Advocate General. Col. Mayes, in the meantime, placed Col. Reed in charge of the Disciplinary Division, and on my return I was assigned to other work, and two or three months thereafter assigned to the General Staff. Col. Mayes supported Gen. Ansell in his objection to the corrective action which the department was taking under General Order No. 7, and when he became senior assistant he reversed these corrective processes which we had established, and it was Col. Mayes's view of this order which Gen. Ansell stated that he reversed in September. His action, therefore, was simply a going back to the policy which was established in the Judge Advocate General's Office when General Order No. 7 was first published, and which he at first strenuously opposed.

Q. Could you from memory, or having access to the files, readily select a few cases that would verify this condition stated by you?—A. I don't know that I could do it from memory. By going through the court-martial records for any given month or period certain cases could be selected which would show this action.

Q. From the statements of Gen. Ansell it would appear that during the period that he was senior assistant in the Office of the Judge Advocate General, but more especially during the period from November, 1917, until April, 1918, that efforts made by him to better conditions of the enlisted man and to throw greater protection about him, were opposed, and he had been unable to bring about results which he desired to bring about. Are you familiar with that statement?—A. I might say in answer to that question that there was no opposition to any effort which Gen. Ansell or anybody made for the purpose of throwing the greatest protection around any man tried by court-martial. The whole question was as to how the greatest protection could be secured under the law. Gen. Ansell's insistence upon his view was not that justice was not done in particular cases, but that it was not done in the way he thought it ought to be done.

Q. So far as you recall was any recommendation or suggestion which was made by Gen. Ansell along the lines of corrective measures turned down or failed to receive consideration except in so far as pertained to the interpretation of section 1199, Revised Statutes?—A. No, sir. I may say that in that connection that following the mutiny case to which reference has been made that Gen. Ansell took the same action in a great many other cases immediately following; that is, he purported to set aside the sentence of the court-martial.

Q. Was that action taken by him after the question of the interpretation of 1199 had been announced by the Secretary of War?—A. No, sir; I think that action was taken in the interim, when the decision of the Secretary was pending. Some cases, I think, you will find slipped through and orders issued by The Adjutant General carrying this action of Gen. Ansell's into effect. Others, depending upon the way they were routed after they left our office, were held up and when Gen. Crowder returned to the Judge Advocate General's Office he found that several of those cases had not been acted upon, and the recommendations of Gen. Ansell that it be done in a particular way, were disapproved and the clemency which he recommended was brought about in the old method, or by doing it according to the established custom of the Judge Advocate General's Office, making the Secretary of War, rather than the Judge Advocate General the authority as to what should be done.

Q. Do you recall whether or not the case of the El Paso mutineers was the first upon which this action was accorded?—A. That was the first. I am positive about that; it was made a test case.

Q. I have here an office circular dated April 10, 1918, giving the organization of the Office of the Judge Advocate General. Do you recognize that circular?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Can you tell me whether or not that circular confirmed an organization which, at the time existed and which for a considerable period in effect had existed, or whether it shows a new organization to go into effect at this time? When I speak of the organization I do not refer to the individual who may fill a particular place but to the organization of the office. I am speaking with respect to the Division of Military Justice.—A. This does not establish anything new in the Office of the Judge Advocate General. It is simply a statement of what had been in effect in the Judge Advocate General's Office for a long time. As nearly as I recall this was sent out very largely for the benefit of the new officers coming in so they would know what the office organization was and how to handle their work, but no new principle or new ruling is established by this order. It is practically what it was during the whole time I was in the Disciplinary Division. As I said before, every court-martial case that left my desk for higher action went to Gen. Ansell.

Q. Referring to this subject Gen. Ansell states, "He (Gen. Crowder) established for the officer in charge of that division (Military Justice) a direct relation and channel of intercourse, whereby the work of the Division of Military Justice was not subject to my supervision or to Col. Mayes, my immediate assistant. Both Col. Mayes and I believed that this method of military justice was bad, and upon April 15, just before sailing for France, having been invited by the Judge Advocate General to express myself upon the management of this office, I frankly told him so." Have you any information or knowledge on that subject more than what you have stated?—A. The only exception that could possibly exist to the statements I have made is this that during the period when we were working in the office over the establishment of General Order No. 7, and formulating the rules for carrying it into effect I frequently consulted directly with Gen. Crowder and frequently placed the result of investigations I had made on Gen. Crowder's desk. These did not go through Gen. Ansell's hands for the reason that he was entirely out of sympathy with what we were trying to do, and Gen. Crowder had directed us to make the investigation, and we felt this had nothing to do with Gen. Ansell's position in the office, and we did not consult Gen. Ansell about anything we did in connection with that order, in getting it established or the rules for getting it into effect. But as to actual action on cases, no case went to Gen. Crowder that did not first pass through Gen. Ansell. There were certain cases in which I assumed the right to act; for instance, when I found that a court-martial record was incomplete; that the record did not show that the Judge Advocate had been sworn, etc., I exercised the authority of sending it to the reviewing authority for correction, but all matters where corrective action was taken, or where clemency was recommended, or where anything of that larger nature was involved, those matters passed through Gen. Ansell to Gen. Crowder, according to office memorandum.

Q. From the documents I find this statement made by Gen. Ansell: "I have at all times insisted upon the location of revisory power in this department and I have said, and said in the beginning, that while I preferred that that power be located in the highest law officer of the Army, I was content to have it located in the department somewhere. This was not done. From the time of Gen. Crowder's return to the office in November, 1917, I urged in several memoranda the necessity of closer supervision of court-martial procedure." Can you enlighten me on this subject?—A. I can not say what he said in memoranda after November, because he may have written and submitted a great many which I did not see, but I do know that his contention for a location of the revisory power was the old contention that it ought to be located in the Judge Advocate General. The statement that he was content to have it located somewhere in the department, or anywhere in the department does not accord with my recollection of what actually happened. About the time that General Order No. 7 was being prepared Col. Clarke and I prepared for Gen. Crowder a suggested revision of section 1199, Revised Statutes. Under this revision it was proposed to give the President, as the Commander in Chief of the Army, full power to vacate, set aside, modify, reverse, etc., any judgment of a military court, and to apply whatever corrective action he thought was necessary. The effect of this amendment, if it had been adopted by Congress, would be to carry into legal effect the recommendations which Gen. Ansell made, and the only differences would be that the supreme power would be located in the President rather than in the Judge Advocate General.

I recollect distinctly that Gen. Ansell criticized this proposal and objected to it, and did not support it.

Q. Have you any knowledge relative to issuance of General Order 84, amending General Order 7?—A. I was asked at one time after I left the Disciplinary Division to prepare a proposed amendment of General Order 7, designed to give the Acting Judge Advocate General in France a wider authority in the review of courts-martial cases, and I did prepare such a proposed amendment and submitted it to Col. Morrow, who was then the executive officer, but what was done with it after that, I do not know.

Q. You have no knowledge as to the conditions under which General Order 84 was secured?—A. No, sir.

Q. During the period that you were in the Judge Advocate General's office what were the conditions relative to the personal attitude of Gen. Ansell and Gen. Crowder in respect to each other and with respect to other officers in the department? Was there a spirit of criticism on the part of either?—A. I heard Gen. Crowder make no criticism of any officer in his department, so far as I can recall at this time. I do not even recall that he criticized Gen. Ansell's view in reference to this matter. There was a feeling, I think, in connection with my relations to Gen. Crowder, that there were certain things in connection with this whole thing that were not properly the subject of conversation and we did not discuss it, and I think I can say accurately that I never heard Gen. Crowder discuss or criticize any officers in his department for any view they might have.

I can not say this with reference to Gen Ansell, because, as I say, whenever a case came up involving an application of General Order 7, he would call me into his office and rehash the whole controversy time and time again. He would defend his views and criticize the views which Gen. Crowder had adopted, and it was an unending controversy until some time in, perhaps, March, 1918, when it reached a sort of climax and Gen. Ansell and I had some discussion about the matter, and he told me he was tired of hearing my views on the matter, and I said I was only answering his own questions; and after that he never discussed any of his opinions with me, but frequently thereafter he discussed them with Col. Clarke, my senior assistant.

Q. I am speaking as to whether or not there were any criticisms of a personal nature about the office of such character that they would create or tend to create discord in the office; interfere with cooperation and teamwork?—A. Well, I will answer that question by—I don't think there was. I think Gen. Ansell criticized Gen. Crowder for wanting to hang on to the office of Judge Advocate General—as he termed it—but that was a criticism which, so far as I know, was expressed only to myself and to two or three other officers.

Q. Have you any knowledge relative to the procedure of Gen. Ansell in securing the issuance of the order relieving Gen. Crowder and appointing him. I speak now of anything beyond the memoranda which are of official record?—

A. Yes, sir; I have. Gen. Ansell consulted me before asking Gen. Crowder in writing to concur with him in a request that he (Gen. Ansell) be designated in orders as Acting Judge Advocate General. He showed me before he submitted it, and read to me a memorandum which he was sending to Gen. Crowder, in which this request was embodied, and a day or two later he showed me and discussed with me Gen. Crowder's reply. Gen. Ansell was very much disappointed and seemed a little bitter over the fact that Gen. Crowder had refused to join him in that request. I do not know what Gen. Ansell did after that to secure the issuance of the order, inasmuch as he did not thereafter show me or consult with me about its issuance. I only know what I have stated; that he proposed first to get Gen. Crowder's concurrence, and that he failed to get that. What he did after that I am unable to state.

Q. The order relieving Gen. Crowder and appointing Gen. Ansell is dated November 8, and according to the records a copy of that was delivered to Gen. Ansell on that date, or possibly the following day.

The memorandum review of the Texas mutineer cases, as I recall it, was dated October 30. This case was submitted or received in the office of the Chief of Staff on the 8th, the date of the issuance of the order and eight days later than the date of the memorandum. Has this any significance so far as your knowledge goes?—A. I don't know that it has any. My recollection of the delay in submitting the memorandum in the mutiny case was due to the fact that after it was prepared it was held up with the idea that it would go at the time that this supporting brief that Gen. Ansell prepared was submitted. Whether it had any relation to the order designating Gen. Ansell as Acting Judge Advocate General I am not prepared to state.

Q. During the period that you were in the office after November, 1917, did you observe any bad effects upon the morale or upon the efficiency of the office resulting from this controversy?—A. I do not think it did so long as I was in charge of the disciplinary division. Upon my relief from the disciplinary division that whole office went to pieces for a time, in that nobody knew where he was at or what action to take, and the whole procedure was made over again under the views of Col. Mayes, and there was very much disorganization and very much confusion. I don't think it affected the morale of the office particularly, because all the officers were anxious to serve efficiently.

Q. What officers who were on duty in the office at the time of that change would be cognizant of the changed conditions?—A. The officers who were there could tell more than anyone else. Keedy and Millar were there. Col. Clarke continued in the office while I was on a trip of inspection during the time the change was inaugurated, and could tell of the upset condition in the office which resulted.

Recall of Col. E. G. Davis.

Q. State the circumstances which led to the establishment in France of a branch of the Judge Advocate General's office.—A. The branch office of the Judge Advocate General in France was established by General Order No. 7, War Department, 1918. Some time prior to the publishing of this order the establishment of a branch office in France had been suggested. If I remember correctly it was first suggested by Gen. Ansell. I have a distinct recollection that he found that such a branch office had been established during the Civil War and made the recommendation that such an office be established in France. When we had decided upon General Order 7, which would have the effect of staying the execution of sentences until they could be reviewed in the office of the Judge Advocate General, we realized that the establishment of a branch office in France had become important and embodied a provision for such an office in General Order 7.

Q. Gen. Ansell, referring to the execution of the Houston rioters, states: "At that time the War Department was holding that the department commander had full, final, and complete authority to carry that judgment into execution." There never was any question, was there, as to the authority that was given the department commander under the Articles of War?—A. No, sir; I think not. I think it was conceded that he had that authority.

Q. Gen. Ansell continues: "It was not so some time after that, for as a result of my agitation of the existence of this advisory power an order was issued that the death sentence should not be carried into effect until there should have been a review of the record by the Judge Advocate General." Do you recall whether or not this change was the result of his agitation? A. My recollection of that matter is about as follows: When Gen. Crowder returned to the Judge Advocate General's Office, Col. Clark and I began the study, as heretofore described, for the purpose of working out a solution of the question of administering military justice in such a way that no man could be sentenced to death or dismissed from the service or dishonorably discharged until the record of his trial had been reviewed for its legality. While we were engaged in this study the executions in the Houston riot case occurred at Fort Sam Houston, and this led to the issuance of paragraph 1, I think it was, of General Order 169, War Department, 1917. This order had the effect of staying the execution of a death sentence until the record of trial had been reviewed in the office of the Judge Advocate General. That order was prepared by me. I saw no paper or communication, memorandum of any kind, by Gen. Ansell on this question. It was prepared on my own initiative, and as a result of a study of 1199, which I was then giving to this subject.

Q. What are your recollections regarding the changes which were made in the office of the Judge Advocate General in the wording of the draft of General Order No. 84, amending General Order 7?—A. My only knowledge of that matter is this: At the time any question of amending General Order 7 came up in the Office of the Judge Advocate General I was not serving in the Disciplinary Division but was called into consultation with reference to the amendment of that order. It was agreed in this conference that the order should be amended, and it was suggested that inasmuch as I had written the original order I should prepare the draft of the amendment, and Gen. Ansell directed me to prepare such a draft. I did so and submitted my draft to Col. Morrow, who was the executive officer in the Judge Advocate General's Office, and nothing in connection with that letter afterwards came to my attention. I did not see the papers submitted by Gen. Ansell and only know that I prepared a draft of the amendment.

When the cases were first submitted to Gen. Ansell and Col. Mayes—that is, to the office in which they sat—Col. Mayes, after the papers had been there for a short time, sent for me and pointed out that the letter in which Gen. Pershing had recommended the execution of these sentences had been embodied in the review of only one of the cases, and merely referred to in the review of the other three cases. He stated that it was his opinion that this important letter should be embodied in the review of each case and the papers were taken by me from Col. Mayes's desk, for the purpose of making that change. My recollection is very clear on the point that Gen. Ansell was present in the room at that time, although I do not recall that he took any part in the conversation that ensued between Col. Mayes and myself. There was no argument about it at all; if they wanted that change made in the review, why that was all there was to it. That is so far as Col. Mayes's participation in this case went—to my knowledge.

The next time I had any conversation with either of them about this matter was along about the 10th of April, 1918. I was in Gen. Ansell's room for some other purpose and he came out of Gen. Crowder's room and sat down at his desk, and said to me—in words about as follows, "What in the hell is the matter with Gen. Crowder about those death cases?" I explained to him that he had Col. Clarke at work reviewing these cases, and he seemed very anxious to be sure of his ground before making definite recommendations, and that Col. Clarke had come to the conclusion that the sentences ought not to be executed. To this Gen. Ansell replied that he did not agree with Col. Clarke—that he thought the sentences ought to be executed, and he further stated that Gen. Crowder had directed him to make a review of the cases himself.

Those two events stand very clear in my mind, and there is no possible confusion between them.

Q. To the best of your recollection, was Col. Mayes present at that time?—A. I do not recall whether or not Col. Mayes was in the room at that time. There were other people in the room, but I have no recollection that Col. Mayes was there. I am sure he did not converse. He may have been there, but I would not state so positively.

Q. Up to the time of that conversation have you any knowledge as to what part, if any, Gen. Ansell took in connection with these proceedings?—A. I have no direct knowledge; no, sir; but I know that the rule of the office presupposed that everything that went to Gen. Crowder passed through Gen. Ansell first.

Q. You have no affirmative knowledge?—A. No, sir; I have not.

Q. You don't know, then, whether or not, when the papers originally passed through his office to Gen. Crowder, he personally examined the cases?—A. No, sir; I have no affirmative knowledge on that point, but I am quite sure he was in the office on the occasion that Col. Mayes turned the cases over to me, with the suggestion that Gen. Pershing's letter be embodied in each. The impression I received was that this was the only change they wanted made in the reviews.

Q. After that change had been made, do you recall whether you took the papers in yourself, or did they go in in the routine way?—A. I have no distinct recollection of that; I suppose, though, that they went in the usual routine way.

Q. Do you remember the circumstances of the circular which went out along in March, 1918, relative to joint trials? Was that over your signature?—A. I think it was over Gen. Crowder's signature, but I prepared the paper.

Q. Do you recall whether or not Gen. Ansell or Col. Mayes had any connection with that paper at all. Did they make a protest?—A. I think they did not. That is, they made no protest. Whether or not they had anything to do with the paper or not I do not know. My recollection of it is that I turned it over to Col. Spiller, the executive officer, for office approval, before sending it out, and I am quite sure that it bore the signature of Gen. Crowder, when finally published. After it was published, and some cases came in which showed that judge advocates misunderstood the purpose of the circular there was, I think, some criticism by Col. Mayes, but none before, as I recall.

Q. Was that circular the cause of any special trouble or embarrassment?—A. A misunderstanding of that circular, I think, resulted in faulty trials in several cases which were criticized by the department; and the results, I think, were set aside. To that extent; yes. I don't know to what extent it was the subject of embarrassment. It was misunderstood by some judge advocates in the field, and they applied it in cases where it was not intended that it should be applied.

The reason for the publication of the circular was as follows: There were several cases which came to the department in which joint defendants; that is to say, men who participated jointly in the commission of crime, had been separately charged and separately tried; tried each of them by the same court. Now, it was perfectly obvious that the members of the court, after trying one defendant, would have a perfectly clear idea as to the other defendants. We sent this circular out with the idea in mind of informing judge advocates that when a situation of that kind arose, the practice should be to try them jointly.

Q. Referring back to the four death cases in France, do you recall the circumstances under which those cases first came to your desk? Were they returned by you for correction?—A. I don't recall that; but if that was the situation, I probably did, because I would want each case complete in itself. I don't even recall that there was a letter from Gen. Pershing with them; I had so many cases on hand at that time.

Q. You don't recall the circumstance of returning them?—A. No, sir. It is probable I did if that situation existed.

Q. Was this during Gen. Ansell's absence?—A. I think he was absent during all of that. I don't think those cases were called to Gen. Ansell's attention until after they had been sent to Gen. Crowder.

Q. Your idea is that they were not called to his attention until Gen. Crowder called upon him for a review?—A. Yes; unless I talked with him when he came back. I was trying to refresh my memory by talking to him, and he thinks that I told him about these cases then, and that he disagreed with me—from what I told him—and that is probably true, because I know we disagreed, and in some way or other they were turned over to him to examine, I thought by Gen. Crowder's initiative. It may be I asked Gen. Crowder to turn them over, but at any rate they had gone to Gen. Crowder before Gen. Ansell had anything to do with them and had gone to Gen. Crowder with the prepared review.

Q. Then it is your belief that Gen. Ansell never examined those cases himself until after he had been requested by Gen. Crowder to do so?—A. That is my recollection. I don't know about the request of Gen. Crowder.

Q. Was not that a case which, prior to the time it came up to your desk the first time, had been the occasion of a lot of talk in the office?—A. I can't say as to that. I think I had discussed the case with Davis and Clarke, as I frequently did with important cases, but could not say whether Gen. Ansell had talked about it or not.

Q. You are confident in your own mind that at no period during the handling of these cases he expressed or even entertained the views that the sentences should be executed?—A. I am quite sure that he did not; that is, upon the merits of these particular cases. We might have talked about the abstract question of whether a man who went to sleep on post in the presence of the enemy and endangered the command should suffer the death penalty.

Q. Have you any reason to believe that about this particular time he did or may have expressed himself that way?—A. That is a general supposition on my part—arising out of the fact that I often discussed abstract questions of that kind—especially with Gen. Ansell.

Q. You spoke the other day about the Camp Grant cases. Were those cases especially conspicuous?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Briefly, what was the point?—A. Those are the cases of, I think, 21 Negroes who assaulted one woman and were separately charged with the offense and jointly tried, there not being even an allegation of conspiracy or joint action in any of the charges. The records had to be disapproved. A number of them were sentenced to death and deserved it—but all were disapproved.

WASHINGTON, D. C., March 18, 1919.

Col. John H. Wigmore, Judge Advocate General's Department, being first duly sworn, was interrogated by Maj. Gen. J. L. Chamberlain, Inspector General, and testified as follows:

Q. What is your name, rank, and organization?—A. John H. Wigmore; colonel; judge advocate, United States Army.

Q. Have you any means of fixing the date upon which Gen. Ansell's memorandum of November 10, 1917, came into the possession of Gen. Crowder?—A. I being then on duty in the office of the Provost Marshal General, the general called me into his office and showed me a memorandum which he stated had been handed to him the night before by the Secretary and that it had given him a most extraordinary shock at the doctrine contained in it. He asked me to look it over and give him my informal opinion, which I did within a day or so. The day was a Saturday; this is the only positive item as to the date that I can contribute; but I know that thereafter Col. Easby-Smith and Col. Johnson, at Gen. Crowder's direction, worked upon the materials for a brief in reply to the memorandum and that this work extended over the succeeding Sunday and Monday. The identification of this Saturday with November 24 is made out by other data contributed by the other officers.

Q. Did you assist in the preparation of the letter of February 13, 1919, submitted by Gen. Crowder to the Secretary of War?—A. I did.

Q. Referring to that letter, charges have been made in the public press that it contained certain misstatements and misinformation. What information have you in regard to that?—A. The first draft of that letter is dated February 8. On page 2 of the draft occurs the sentence, "The story was disbelieved and he was found guilty." This sentence occurs in a concise allusion to a case cited by Senator Chamberlain, the allusion being prefatory to a full explanation. The Senator's description of the case had already stated that the court-martial had at first found the case not guilty, but afterwards, a consideration being directed by the commanding general, the court had found the accused guilty. This intervening stage in the action of the court was therefore perfectly well known to the Senator, for he himself had stated it; in the draft of the reply, therefore, the full description of the case was not thought necessary. On February 12, Wednesday, at 10 a. m., Gen. Crowder informed me that a meeting of the Senate committee had been suddenly appointed for the next day and asked me whether I could complete the draft in season to assist him at the hearing. I replied that the draft must be completed, and I worked with two stenographers until 1 o'clock that night to complete the draft. It was presented to Gen. Crowder the next morning at 8.30, February 13. In the final draft, which he went over with me, he noted the above passage and remarked that it omitted to state the intervening finding of the court. I explained to him how the omission had been made and he directed that in the subsequent copies the omission be restored. He then, as the hearing was coming on that day, signed and sent the letter to the Secretary of War for transmission to the Senator. In the meanwhile I returned to the office and caused four new sets of carbons to be made of the letter with the omission restored. That afternoon Senator Chamberlain telephoned the Secretary of War concerning this omission, and upon my meeting Gen. Crowder later that afternoon he remarked, "It has happened just as I told you. This omission has been noticed and should not have occurred in the first draft of the letter." The second series of copies were dated February 13, Thursday, the day of the hearing, and carbons were dispatched to the Secretary of War and the original containing the omission was withdrawn. As Senator Chamberlain was already aware of the omission, and as it was not deemed to be material in any event, no further notice was sent to Senator Chamberlain.

As to the second alleged erroneous statement referred to by Senator Chamberlain in his recent letter, it consisted in the statement, on the same page of the draft letter of February 12, that the review of the case in question was prepared by judge advocates "who were not commissioned in the Regular Army, but were experienced lawyers fresh from civil practice." This sentence was inserted after the first above draft dated February 8 and during the second revision in the intervening days. I had received from Maj. Rigby a statement of the case and returned that statement to him, but I recall in completing the dictation of the draft that the judge advocate at Camp Gordon was named Taylor and I immediately inferred that it must be Maj. Orville J. Taylor, of Chicago, who was known to me to be a reserve officer recently commissioned. I inserted the above sentence in the draft provisionally, knowing that if the fact were otherwise the sentence could be deleted before signing, but that if the fact were as stated it would be too late afterwards to insert the sentence in the signed letter. Meanwhile I made a memorandum to verify the fact by telephoning Maj. Rigby. Owing to interruptions of telephone service, the reply did not come until Wednesday afternoon, February 12, in the midst of the final rush of preparation and the memorandum was mislaid and failed to attract my attention. The sentence therefore remained in the draft as presented to Gen. Crowder Thursday morning, February 13. But on my return to my office on that same morning I found the memorandum from Maj. Rigby replying to my telephone, reporting that the judge advocate's name was William Taylor. Upon referring to the Army directory I discovered that Lieut. Col. William Taylor was a commissioned in the Regular Army. I therefore deleted the sentence and in the copies which were then being made, dated February 13, that sentence was omitted. I also immediately dictated a correction to be sent to the Secretary of War. A copy of this correction has been placed in your hands by Maj. Rigby. It did not receive Gen. Crowder's signature until February 17, on the succeeding Monday, and was forwarded to the Secretary of War. On February 21 the Secretary of War forwarded the correction to Senator Chamberlain in a special letter.

WASHINGTON, D. C., March 18, 1919.

Lieut. Col. Robert W. Millar, Judge Advocate General's Department, being first duly sworn, was interrogated by Maj. Gen. J. L. Chamberlain, Inspector General, and testified as follows:

Q. What is your name, rank, and organization?—A. Robert W. Millar; lieutenant colonel; Judge Advocate.

Q. How long have you been on duty in the office of the Judge Advocate General?—A. Since March 11, 1918.

Q. In what division?—A. Military Justice Division.

Q. During the entire period?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. You are doubtless familiar with the controversy that has been going on in the public press relative to the affairs of the Judge Advocate General's Office?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. I would like to have your views briefly as to the efficiency of the Division of Military Justice as administered under the laws as they exist in protecting the interests of the enlisted man.—A. I would answer that, General, by saying that it is my judgment that, on the whole, the interests of the enlisted man have been efficiently protected by the Military Justice Division to the extent of its powers as construed by those in charge. Some difference of policy has existed from time to time with reference to the powers of the office under General Orders, No. 7, 1918. When I entered the office, the Military Justice Division, then being in charge of Col. Davis, the impression I received was that there was then a disposition to make recommendations to commanding generals more freely than later in the spring when Col. Mayes became Acting Judge Advocate General. How far such recommendations included recommendations of reduction of punishment I can not say. Col. Mayes made it plain that he considered that the function of the office was limited to passing upon the legality of the sentence under General Orders, No. 7. Later, after Gen. Ansell took charge, there came about a policy of making distinct recommendations in regard to the reduction of punishments more freely than had been the case before. In October, 1918, as I recall, a memorandum was prepared by Gen. Ansell empowering the Military Justice Division to make such recommendations where it was thought the case demanded it. I do not wish to be understood as saying that such recommendations were never made under General Orders, No. 7 during the time Col. Mayes was Acting Judge Advocate General, but I would judge that no such recommendations was had only in exceptional cases. In October, 1918, and shortly before the memorandum of Gen. Ansell was prepared I became a member of the board of review. Since the memorandum in question, there has been no hesitancy in recommending reduction of punishment wherever the case seemed to require it, at least in the cases which have come before the first section of the board of review. The board of review at the time which I became a member of it passed upon virtually all papers in the Military Justice Division except those relating to applications for clemency. Later, owing to the accumulation of business its functions became restricted to a smaller class of cases and at present it is occupied chiefly with cases involving commissioned officers. Making allowance for this fluctuation in the construction of the powers conferred by General Orders, No. 7 upon the office of the Judge Advocate General, I am of the opinion that, on the whole, the Military Justice Division, so far as its powers have extended, has protected the rights of accused to a degree which is not inferior to that protection accorded them in civil appellate courts.

Q. As to length and breadth of action, how do the operations under General Orders, No. 7 as applied at the present time compare with those which were in force prior to the advent of Col. Mayes as chief of this division?—A. Prior to Col. Mayes taking charge of the office I was doing work of a subordinate character and consequently I am not in a position to make a satisfactory answer to the question.

Q. How has the morale of the office been affected, if at all, by this controversy?—A. There has, of course, been considerable discussion among the members of the Military Justice Division, which has to some extent perhaps interfered with full attention to the work, but the resultant detriment has in my judgment been very slight and there has been in my opinion no impairment of any material character of the work of the division.

Q. Has this controversy given rise to any feeling on the part of any officers of that division, that an injustice had been done them, so far as you know, or had been done the division as a whole?—A. Speaking for myself I would say—and I think this view is shared by certain other members of the Military Justice Division, civilian lawyers—that the newspaper statements purporting to give the testimony of Gen. Ansell before the Senate Military Committee have had a tendency to unjustly reflect upon us and our work in the Military Justice Division.

WASHINGTON, D. C., March 18, 1919.

Maj. William H. Keith, United States Army, being first duly sworn, was interrogated by Maj. Gen. J. L. Chamberlain, Inspector General, and testified as follows:

Q. What is your name, rank, organization, and duty?—A. William H. Keith; major, United States Army; on duty with Purchase, Storage and Traffic Division, General Staff.

Q. How long were you chief clerk of the Office of the Judge Advocate General?—A. I think June 1, 1914, I was appointed and resigned September 17, 1918.

Q. Were you chief clerk during November, 1917?—A. Yes.

Q. You are familiar with a controversy which took place in the Office of the Judge Advocate General about that time with respect to interpretation of certain sections of the Revised Statutes and other matters?—A. Well, I can't say that I am familiar with it, General.

Q. You know that there was such a controversy?—A. I know that a discussion took place in the Military Justice Division. I was chief clerk of the whole division and it just came to me casually.

Q. I have before me an office circular, Judge Advocate General's Office, dated April 10, 1918, which gives the organization of the office of the Judge Advocate General's Department. Do you recognize that circular?—A. Yes.

Q. Could you tell me by whom that was prepared?—A. I am not sure of it, General, but I believe it was prepared by Col. Spiller.

Q. From your knowledge of the office I would like you to tell me whether or not that circular shows an organization which at the time existed in the office, and which had previously existed, or whether it refers to the results of a reorganization of the office differing materially from the organization which had existed?—A. This was the general organization that had been in existence for some little time. There were details in changes coming from time to time, depending upon the nature of the work or the duties assigned to the various offices.

Q. Referring to paragraph A of this order, which has to do with the routing of papers, does that give a correct statement of the method then in force and which had been in force prior to that time?—A. It gives in a general way the usual practice that has been in existence for some time. In this particular section here Col. Mayes was detailed as an assistant to Gen. Ansell, and papers passed into Col. Mayes's desk to be O. K.'d and would go on to Gen. Ansell and then to Gen. Crowder, as the case may be.

Q. Is that the policy which was followed between November, 1917, and the date of this order?—A. I don't know just the date Col. Mayes was detailed on that; it was some time, one of those dates. It had not been done like that before.

Q. How had it been done before this?—A. Before that the papers would come back O. K.'d, and then they were to be charged out to the various divisions to which they pertained, and then when the papers were completed and prepared they would be sent again to the Judge Advocate General or the Acting Judge Advocate General, as the case may be.

Q. Why do you say "as the case may be"?—A. If the Judge Advocate General was there they were sent to him; if the Acting Judge Advocate General, they were sent to him.

Q. In case both Gen. Crowder, the Judge Advocate General, and Gen. Ansell, the senior assistant, were present, would those cases probably go through Gen. Ansell before going to the Judge Advocate General?—A. Yes. They would pass in to Gen. Ansell, then when Gen. Crowder's time was taken up, mostly with the other office, he had Col. Mayes in to act as his assistant, to review the papers as they came in.

Q. During that period, did all important papers pass through the office of Gen. Ansell before going to Gen. Crowder? I am speaking now particularly of the papers which pertained to the Division of Military Justice.—A. Well, now, I would not know about that, General.

Q. In November, 1917, an order was issued detaching Gen. Ansell as Acting Judge Advocate General; subsequently, a few days after, that order was revoked and about that time Gen. Crowder took up the duties of the office, which up to that time he had to a great extent been leaving to Gen. Ansell. Is that correct?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. At that time was any change made in the channels through which the papers of the office pertaining to the Department of Military Justice passed?—

A. I can not answer that, General. I don't know, because the Military Justice Division had a colonel in charge of it and he carried these papers in the important cases either to Gen. Ansell or to Gen. Crowder.

Q. That matter did not come under your personal observation?—A. That did not come under me, so I could not answer that question.

EXHIBIT 24.

WASHINGTON, D. C., March 21, 1919.

Lieut. Col. Alfred E. Clark, Judge Advocate General's Office, being first duly sworn, was interrogated by Maj. Gen. J. L. Chamberlain, Inspector General, and testified as follows:

Q. State your name, rank, and organization.—A. Alfred E. Clark; lieutenant colonel; Judge Advocate General's Office.

Q. During what period were you on duty in the office of the Judge Advocate General?—A. From approximately October 1, 1917, until the latter part of May, 1918, to the best of my present recollection. Since that time I have been on assignment as counsel for the War Department Board of Appraisers and other special boards.

Q. Were you at any time on duty in the Division of Military Justice?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. During this entire period?—A. Substantially so; yes.

Q. What were your special duties in that division?—A. The first two months or so, possibly a little more than two months after coming here, I was, in so far as that section is concerned, engaged in the routine work of examining court-martial records and writing opinions with respect to them and the like—general work. From, I should say, the latter part of December, 1917, or early in January, 1918, I had status of assistant to Col. Davis, Chief of the Section of Military Justice, and continued in that capacity until relieved from duty in that section.

Q. Please state fully your recollections relative to the case of the Artillery mutinies at El Paso, the action taken in connection with the interpretation of section 1199, Revised Statutes, and the order appointing Gen. Ansell Acting Judge Advocate General, subsequent revocation of same, and cognate matters.—A. Some time in October of 1917 there were two or three cases that gave rise to considerable discussion in the office of the Judge Advocate General. One of these cases involved the conviction of seven or eight noncommissioned officers; in fact, all of the noncommissioned officers of an Artillery battery at Fort Bliss, I think it was, Texas. In each of the cases—the first the Narber case and the second artillerymen—dishonorable discharge had been executed. It was the view of the Section on Military Justice, where I was then on duty, that in each of these cases, and particularly in the case of the noncommissioned officers of the Artillery battery, an erroneous conclusion had been reached by the courts. The question arose as to what disposition could be made of the cases in the absence of jurisdictional error. It was at this time, which was the latter part of October or the early part of November, that Gen. Ansell first propounded his theory that the word "revise," as found in a statute first enacted in 1862, conferred upon the Judge Advocate General full appellate power. He prepared a memorandum in support of that view, which I believe came to the attention of Gen. Crowder, to my best recollection, the last part of November. I undertake to fix that time for the reason that Col. Davis and myself, under date of the 6th of December, prepared a memorandum embodying a study of the historical aspects of the legislation at Gen. Crowder's request. Gen. Crowder prepared a memorandum, in which he controverted the legal soundness of the views of Gen. Ansell. Gen. Ansell prepared a supplementary memorandum in reply, and the matter was later submitted to the Secretary of War, who, I believe, concurred in views of Gen. Crowder that it was inexpedient to undertake to deduce from the old statute the broad appellate powers for which Gen. Ansell was contending. In the cases of the men charged with mutiny the office of the Judge Advocate General, after reviewing the records in accordance with the established practices of the office, reached the conclusion that the evidence did not sustain the findings and sentence and recommended to the Secretary of War that an order be issued setting aside, mitigating the unexe-cuted portion of the sentence, and, upon application of the accused, restoring them to duty. It is my recollection that the Secretary disposed of the cases in accordance with this recommendation. With respect to the order which appointed Gen. Ansell Acting Judge Advocate General and the order which subsequently revoked the prior order, I have no personal knowledge whatever.

Q. Have you any definite knowledge as to the date upon which Gen. Ansell's memorandum was submitted beyond what you stated a moment ago?—A. Not just at this moment, General, but probably if I should go over my old files I could locate the date approximately by reference to some memorandum prepared about that time for Gen. Crowder; that is, locate it within two or three days.

Q. Are you familiar with General Order 169, the order which provided that death sentences should not be carried into effect until the cases had been reviewed in Washington?—A. If my identification by number is correct, that was a general order issued the latter part of December, 1917, or early in January, 1918, preceding General Order No. 7. At the time General Order 169 was issued, and for two or three weeks prior to that time, there had been under study and preparation by Col. Davis and myself the plan which was subsequently embodied in General Order No. 7. While the plan embodied in General Order No. 7 was in process of development a number of colored soldiers who rioted at Houston, Tex., were convicted. The convictions were approved by the commanding general of the Southern Department and 13 of the men executed by the department commander before the records had reached Washington for review. General Order No. 169 was a temporary expedient to prevent like occurrences until such time as General Order No. 7 or the plan which was embodied in that had been formulated and the order drawn and promulgated. General Order No. 7 reached all death cases as well as cases involving dismissal of an officer or dishonorable discharge.

Q. Did Gen. Ansell submit a memorandum which referred specifically to this case and which had important bearing upon the issuance of General Order 169.—A. I have no knowledge of any memorandum submitted by Gen. Ansell which suggested the issuance of General Order 169 or any order of like character. From November on the contention of Gen. Ansell was that the word "revise" conferred full appellate power upon the Judge Advocate General, and he vigorously opposed the plan which was embodied in General Order No. 7. I do not now recall whether he specially opposed the issuance of General Order 169, but never understood that he recommended or approved of it. In relation to the reform accomplished by General Order No. 7 and the practices which grew up under it, Gen. Ansell opposed them. I think there will be found in the files of the office a written memorandum prepared and signed by him opposing the issuance of this order. In this connection it may be said, with respect to other proposed changes and reforms as well as that embodied in General Order No. 7, that they did not meet the favor of Gen. Ansell, because his contention seemed always to be that these several proposed reforms were in conflict with his theory as to the true construction of the word "revise." For several months following November, 1917, Col. Davis and myself worked out and proposed a number of changes in court-martial procedure. The changes then proposed embodied substantially all of the so-called reforms now proposed. None of these proposals, as far as I know, was acted upon favorably by the acting head of the office. It was the view of both Col. Davis and myself that under existing legislation there could be worked out all necessary and practical reforms, and that this could be done largely through the promulgation of rules of procedure by the President of the United States under authority of the thirty-eighth article of war. Whenever these proposed changes and reforms became the subject of discussion, it was the invariable contention of Gen. Ansell that certain revisory powers were lodged in the Judge Advocate General, and that any change or reform which would undertake to lodge appellate powers directly or indirectly with the President or any other officer or department of the War Department impinged upon the rights of the Judge Advocate General. This led to many vigorous, if not heated, discussions not only with respect to the changes and reforms that were deemed expedient by Col. Davis, myself, and others in the department, but also with respect to the disposition to be made of pending cases.

Q. In the carrying out of the provisions of General Orders, No. 7, after it was promulgated, what was Gen. Ansell's attitude, so far as became apparent?—A. Gen. Ansell took no part in the preparation of General Orders, No. 7. He was not in sympathy with it. It was prepared by direction of Gen. Crowder and approved by him. Owing to the fact that the order and the practices which contemplated did not meet with the approval of Gen. Ansell, the practical working out of the order and the development of the practice under it were by Gen. Crowder very largely confided to Col. Davis for some time. There was developed in that section under Col. Davis the practice of making distinct recommendations with respect to the character of sentence which should be imposed when records came up under that order. Gen. Ansell and his immediate assistant, Col. Mayes, opposed the practice of the Judge Advocate General undertaking to control, direct, or influence the disposition to be made of a case by the reviewing authority through any recommendation made by him in cases coming up under General Orders, No. 7. Practically all the opinions written by officers in the Military Justice Section first came to my desk for approval with the result that I was frequently called into the office of the acting head for the purpose of discussing some opinion with Gen. Ansell or Col. Mayes, or both, recommending mitigation or clemency, and the continued intrusion of the controversy as to the proper construction of the word "revise" into the discussion of opinions written under the practice established by General Orders, No. 7, led to a great many arguments which at times were both vigorous and heated.

Q. After Col. Davis ceased to be Acting Chief of the Division of Military Justice, what change, if any, took place in the policy governing the application of General Orders, No. 7?—A. The first time that Col. Davis went away was in March, for a period of 10 days or so. During that time I was acting head of the division, being the senior officer in that division. During the time that he was away upon this first inspection trip all of the opinions which carried recommendations under the practice established by General Orders, No. 7, had to be approved by me. All discussions relating to the propriety of the Judge Advocate General making recommendations were had between Gen. Ansell and Col. Mayes on the one side and myself upon the other. There was a manifest disposition on the part of Gen. Ansell and Col. Mayes to undertake to stop or abolish the practice, a very beneficent one, in my judgment, of making recommendations to the various reviewing authorities in the field with respect to the character of sentence to be imposed. I insisted that during the absence of Col. Davis, inasmuch as he had built up the practice, as I understood it, conformably to the views of Gen. Crowder, that no change should be made in the practice until he returned. When Col. Davis returned I reported the situation to him, my experience, which was the same as he had been going through for some time before. My recollection is that he then took the matter up with Gen. Crowder, who approved the continuance of the practice, but that is just my recollection and may be inaccurate. A little later on, some time in April, Col. Davis left on a prolonged inspection trip. The primary purpose of the trip was to acquaint the service in the field more fully with the purposes of General Orders, No. 7, and in this way secure the thorough cooperation of the reviewing authorities and divisional and department judge advocates. In the meantime Col. Spiller had been transferred from the position of executive officer in the Judge Advocate General's Office to the Military Justice Section, and was the senior officer of that section next to Col. Davis, so that when Col. Davis left upon the inspection trip Col. Spiller became acting head of the section. Col. Spiller was acting head of the section for but a short time, perhaps a week or 10 days, when Col. Read was assigned to duty in the section, and as senior officer became the head. Immediately after Col. Davis left on this inspection trip the practice which had grown up under General Orders, No. 7, was modified, if not, indeed, in practical effect, abolished, and thereafter the office confined itself in dealing with records coming up under General Orders, No. 7, to the bare question of the legality of the proceedings. So far as I know, the change in policy was not called to the attention of Gen. Crowder at the time. The change in policy was substantially in accordance with the views which had been so many times expressed by Gen. Ansell and Col. Mayes during the many discussions while Col. Davis and myself were building up the practice I have referred to under General Orders, No. 7.

Q. During these various discussions to which you refer, did you ever hear Gen. Ansell express the views in effect that while he believed that the only proper solution of the question was his views regarding the proper interpretation of section 1199, yet that he would be content to use that power, if that power of revision were given, even though it rested elsewhere? A. No, sir. In that connection it may be said that a lengthy memorandum was prepared in part by Col. Davis, in part by myself, which is in the files of the Judge Advocate General's Office. It dealt with the two questions, first, the inherent power of the President to exercise appellate jurisdiction by such methods as he might adopt; and, second, his powers under existing legislation through general orders to control the progress of the case from its inception to its execution. We sought to find in the powers of the President such inherent and statutory powers as would meet all of the then needs. Gen. Ansell was vigorously opposed to these views. Not only was he opposed to the view that such inherent power was lodged in the President, but also the view that there was any legal sanction for the exercise of any such power under existing law. The memorandum prepared by Col. Davis and myself was submitted to Secretary Baker, by Gen. Crowder, who expressed his sympathy with the legal views expressed therein. The Secretary, however, suggested that in order to remove any doubt as to the power of the President to exercise full appellate jurisdiction and rather than undertake to deduce such a power from legislation, the construction of which might be open to discussion, that a bill be presented to Congress asking for such power. Conformably with this suggestion I prepared a bill by direction of Gen. Crowder which was an amendment to section 1199 of the Revised Statutes. That bill was prepared in January, 1918. In connection with the preparation of the bill I prepared, in collaboration with Col. Davis, an argument of some pages in support of the legislation.

Q. The proposed legislation did not meet with the approval of Gen. Ansell.—A. He was opposed to the amendment, which sought to confer these broad appellate powers upon the President. I discussed this matter with him several times during the preparation of the amendment and the preparation of the argument in support of the amendment. His contention was, as it had been theretofore, that the word "revise" gave certain power to the Judge Advocate General, that the proposed amendment was an encroachment upon such powers, and that he could not, therefore, favor it. Col. Davis and myself then prepared letters which embodied the argument to which I have referred in support of the bill, and these letters were signed by the Secretary of War and transmitted with copies of the bill to the Military Committee of Senate and House.

Q. What was Gen. Ansell's attitude and what position did he take with respect to the propriety of interfering at that time during the war with long sentences which had been imposed by courts-martial and duly approved by the reviewing authority, provided the record of the case showed no legal or other irregularities?—A. Speaking generally, his attitude was that it was frequently necessary in the interest of military discipline that severe sentences be imposed; that such sentences must be frequently imposed for their salutary or moral effect upon the Army at large. I have often heard him say, in justification of a policy of not interfering during the war with such sentences, that it was not to be supposed that long sentences would be actually served out in full for military offenses after the war was over.

Q. Did you hear Gen. Crowder express any views upon this subject, or are you familiar with the views entertained by him?—A. I don't think that I ever discussed that particular subject with Gen. Crowder. He was much engaged with the work of the Provost Marshal General's Office.

Q. Are you familiar with the four cases of death sentences in France which have been so thoroughly advertised?—A. Very familiar, General.

Q. I wish you would state briefly your knowledge as to the procedure in those cases, step by step, and the part played by different officers in the disposal of those cases.—A. The cases are so familiar to everybody concerned that it is unnecessary to go into the details in regard to the case. The records in the four death cases from France reached the office of the Judge Advocate General in Washington along about February 26-27, 1918. They were sent to Maj. Rand, a well-known criminal lawyer of New York, then stationed in Washington, for review. Maj. Rand reviewed the four cases, wrote a review in each case in which he found that the proceedings were regular, the verdict sustained by the evidence, and recommended that the sentences be carried into effect. The records, with the reviews, then went to the desk of Col. Davis, chief of the section, and from his desk went to Gen. Ansell and Col. Mayes, who were officing together. In the preparation of his reviews Maj. Rand had incorporated in but one of them the text of a communication or indorsement from Gen. Pershing recommending that the death sentences be confirmed and carried into execution. In the other three reviews he had referred only to the memorandum from Gen. Pershing. The reviews thus prepared by Maj. Rand were returned through Col. Davis to Maj. Rand from the office of Gen. Ansell.

with the suggestion that there should be incorporated in all four reviews rather than in only one the full text of the recommendation of Gen. Pershing. The reviews were rewritten conformably to the suggestion and were returned through Col. Davis to Gen. Ansell and Col. Mayes. From there they must have gone to the desk of Gen. Crowder. Up to that time I had understood that the office was to recommend the execution of these sentences. Prior to this time I had discussed the cases with Maj. Rand and perhaps one or two other officers and had expressed my dissent from the conclusion that the sentences should be carried into execution. The records found their way to the desk of Gen. Crowder for his approval and signature, after having passed through the hands of Gen. Ansell and Col. Mayes with the recommendation that the sentences be carried into effect. It was on this point, and some time after the middle of March, 1918, that Gen. Crowder called me into his office and stated, among other things, in substance, that these records had come to him for his approval, that he was disturbed about the cases, and he requested me to take the records, make a careful study of them, and write reviews amplifying the statement of facts with a view to setting forth a complete history of each case in the review. He also requested me to study the records in similar cases coming in from the same and other divisions in France with the view of determining whether or not the sentences imposed in other and like cases bore any relation to the sentences upon which the office was then about to act. I prepared a full review in each case, concluding with the statement that there was some evidence which, if believed by the court, would support the verdict of conviction and that there were no jurisdictional errors. The reviews prepared by me did not contain any recommendation as to action to be taken. They were submitted to Gen. Crowder about April 10. At the same time I submitted a lengthy memorandum discussing these four cases and giving the history of a number of similar cases arising in France, and concluding with a strong expression of my views as to the disposition to be made of the cases, viz, that the death sentences should not be carried into effect. About the time these reviews and this memorandum were handed to Gen. Crowder, I think on the same morning, I had my last talk with Gen. Ansell concerning these cases. He asked me, in substance, "I understand that you are not in favor of carrying the death sentences into effect upon these men convicted in France," and I told him that I most emphatically was not and that I was satisfied that if he would take the reviews which I had prepared for Gen. Crowder and the supplemental memorandum and study the whole situation carefully that he would agree with me that these sentences should not be carried into effect. This occurred about a month and a half after the records came into the office and at least a month after Maj. Rand had prepared his reviews recommending that the sentences be carried into execution. A few days later, I understand, Gen. Ansell was requested by Gen. Crowder to submit his views to the latter upon the cases, and he prepared a written memorandum for Gen. Crowder. All of the facts that he sets forth in his memorandum, both concerning the death cases and other like cases, the character of the convicted men, etc., were taken entirely from the memorandum which I had laid before Gen. Crowder on April 10. I understand that there was a formal recommendation added to the reviews prepared by me. The exact character of that recommendation I do not know, as I never saw the reviews after they left my desk. Under date of April 16 Gen. Crowder, in connection with the records and reviews, transmitted to Secretary Baker a long memorandum. I have seen a copy of that memorandum. It embodied in very large part the text of the memorandum which I had submitted to him under date of April 10, and in addition amplified views of his own. It likewise embodied, in substance, the views which Gen. Ansell had expressed in his memorandum to Gen. Crowder under date of April 15. This memorandum, signed by Gen. Crowder, went to Mr. Secretary Baker with the records and reviews, and in very large measure furnished the basis for the communication which Mr. Secretary Baker wrote about two weeks later to the President, transmitting the records and the reviews, and which, after a presentation of the facts and the history of each case, recommended that the death sentences be not executed.

Q. During the interview which you had with Gen. Ansell on this occasion did Gen. Ansell give expression to his views as to whether or not the death sentence should be executed?—A. Not upon this occasion.

Q. Did you upon any occasion hear him express his views upon this subject?—

A. Yes, sir.

Q. State definitely what they were.—A. I would not be able to give the time or the exact language used. Probably the cases came to me from Gen. Crowder for further study and report, because I had been very outspoken against recommending that the death sentences be carried into effect. In fact, I had a number of arguments with Maj. Rand and other officers in which I very strongly opposed what I understood at the time was the settled decision of the acting head of the office to recommend that the sentences be carried into effect. I say I understand that that was the settled decision of the office for two reasons—first, reviews prepared by Maj. Rand and so recommended had gone across the desk of Col. Davis to Gen. Ansell and Col. Mayes and had been returned not for the purpose of changing the character of the reviews or of the recommendations but merely for the inclusion in three of the reviews of the full text of Gen. Pershing's memorandum, and with this inclusion they had been returned and had gone to Gen. Crowder's desk for his signature. The second reason is that I had talked with Maj. Rand, who was conferring with Col. Mayes and Gen. Ansell, about the cases, and I had talked with Col. Mayes and with Gen. Ansell and had taken occasion, although the cases were not then in my hands for review, to express the settled conviction that it would be a great mistake and an injustice to carry those sentences into effect. At that time these officers did not agree with me, but were of the opinion that the views of Gen. Pershing with respect to the propriety and the expediency of carrying these sentences into effect should be followed. While these cases were under consideration in the office and before the records came to me from Gen. Crowder for review, as I have just stated, I discussed them with Gen. Ansell and other officers on more than one occasion, and Gen. Ansell had stated to me during those discussions that he thought the sentences should be carried into effect.

Q. During the period that you were acting Chief of the Division of Military Justice what was the routing of courts-martial cases at the time they arrived in the office until they left or went to the permanent files, and what connection had Gen. Ansell with and responsibility for the administration of that division?—A. First, all opinions of a general nature, dealing with the administration of military justice, were routed over his desk. Second, all opinions dealing with particular cases where the communication was addressed to the Secretary of War, or to the President through the Secretary of War, or to The Adjutant General. This second class would involve all cases where sentence had been published, so that they had become effective before the record reached the Office of the Judge Advocate General, and involved a considerable percentage of all the cases coming from the office. Third, after General Order No. 7 went into effect it will be noted that the records came direct then to the Office of the Judge Advocate General for review before sentence was finally published, and the Judge Advocate General's Office had established the practice of sending them back direct to the reviewing authorities with a statement as to the legality or illegality of the proceedings and such recommendations as it was deemed proper to make. Col. Davis was then the head of the section. The practice grew up for him to sign the opinions, returning the records, and in such cases the records would not be routed over by Gen. Ansell. The reason this practice grew up was that Gen. Ansell and Col. Mayes were opposed to the practice of returning the records with a distinct recommendation by the Judge Advocate General as to the quantity of punishment to be imposed, the general policy with respect to sentences in different classes of cases, the place of confinement, and the like. When I was acting head of the section for a short time in March I followed the practice of signing these opinions, returning the records in accordance with the practice that Col. Davis had established. Everything was routed over Gen. Ansell's desk except the opinions returning records under General Order No. 7.

Q. Was everything in the way of recommendations, reviews, etc., going to higher authority, routed over his desk?—A. Yes, sir; everything that went up to higher authority, to The Adjutant General, the Chief of Staff, the President, or the Secretary of War, was routed through him and over his desk.

Q. Do you know of any orders, verbal or otherwise, which in any way curtailed the activities or responsibilities of Gen. Ansell with respect to the administration of military justice during the period November, 1917, to the time he left for Europe, April, 1918?—A. I do not.

Q. What knowledge have you relative to the establishment of a branch office in France; any knowledge except what would be of record?—A. I think none. It was a matter of general discussion in the office, but the ultimate result was embodied in the order.

Q. The records show that in the case of the Fort Bliss mutineers Gen. Ansell in his review actually put into effect the powers which his interpretation of section 1190 gave to the Judge Advocate General?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. These were the first cases in which this action appears. It also appears that similar action was taken by him in a considerable number of cases subsequent to this. Do you recall any discussions or conversations in the office regarding that act?—A. Yes, sir. The first cases in which action was taken by the Acting Judge Advocate General under his assumed powers of revisions were, I believe, the Narber case, and the case of the seven or eight noncommissioned officers of the Artillery Battery. The action taken in each of these cases was simply to reverse and set aside the sentence, or words to that effect. It was my recollection that these cases, with the action of the Judge Advocate General thereon, went up in the usual routine to The Adjutant General for formal order, and that about that time, or very shortly thereafter, Gen. Ansell prepared a memorandum in support of the power which he had sought to exercise. In the meantime, and before this memorandum was submitted, a number of other cases were disposed of in like manner. The purpose of so doing while the matter was pending before the War Department I do not know.

Q. Have you any knowledge of a conversation which took place in connection with and at the time that you were directed to prepare a review of the four France cases in which Gen. Ansell is said to have expressed affirmatively his views relative to the execution of the sentences as imposed?—A. I did not personally ever hear any such conversation between Gen. Ansell and any other officer. However, some time after the records in the death cases from France came to me from Gen. Crowder for further study, Col Davis informed me of a conversation which he had just had; I mean by that a conversation he had shortly before he spoke to me about it. Col. Davis stated in substance that Gen. Ansell had used some profanely forcible language in connection with these cases. I would not undertake to give the language of the conversation, but my recollection of its effect or substance is that he objected to or resented the fact that the sentences were not being promptly carried into effect in accordance with the recommendations contained in Maj. Rand's reviews, instead of which they had been returned to me for further study and report by Gen. Crowder.

Q. What effect did these various controversies, which took place in November, 1917, and subsequently, have upon the morale of the office or upon the efficiency of the work of the Division of Military Justice?—A. For a time, say in the latter part of November, and a considerable part of December, it left the force in doubt and uncertainty as to the policies to be followed. However, it may be said that in the main the officers in that section were trained and seasoned lawyers from civil life or men of like training and experience in the Military Establishment. They continued to do their work with zeal and efficiency, affected somewhat perhaps by the uncertainty in which the force was left for a month or six weeks.

Q. To what extent, if any, did this controversy affect the personal relations of officers in the office in so far as same became apparent?—On the surface the relations between all of the officers remained pleasant and cordial, and such as permitted of personal contact and personal conference and discussion without the embarrassment of any personal animosities being manifested themselves. Of course, there was always this factor in the situation: For several months following November, 1917, whenever an officer went to Gen. Ansell to discuss any proposed action in a court-martial case the discussion was almost certain, before it was finished, to resolve itself into an argument on his part in support of his construction of the word "revise," so that that question was intruded in almost every legal discussion.

WASHINGTON, D. C., March 25, 1919.

Maj. Stevens Heckscher, Judge Advocate General's Department, being first duly sworn, was interrogated by Maj. Gen. J. L. Chamberlain, Inspector General, and testified as follows:

Q. State your name, rank, and organization.—A. Stevens Heckscher; major; Judge Advocate.

Q. You are a member of the so-called clemency board?—A. Not of the recently created clemency board, but I am head of the clemency section of the Military Justice Division. I ought to add, sir, that I was for a short time one of the original three members of the clemency board, but I was relieved by Gen. Crowder in order to go back to my old clemency section.

Q. Who are the members of the clemency board at the present time?—A. Lieut. Col. Ansell, Col. Easby-Smith, Maj. Conner, Maj. G. Rogers, Maj. Ashman, Lieut. Tittman, and I think one additional major whose name I do not know.

Q. State briefly the procedure in the case of the clemency board.—A. With regard to the prisoners in the three disciplinary barracks a memorandum is filled out by the commandant of the barracks in question, giving the material facts that would be relevant upon the question of clemency, together with the commandant's recommendation as to clemency. That memorandum is sent directly from the barracks to the Judge Advocate General's Office, is attached to the record of trial, and together with any other papers in the case is referred to one of the 10 or 11 officers, who reviews the case, in the first instance for the clemency board, makes a short summary of the facts attending the offense as shown by the record of trial, and also makes his own tentative recommendation as to clemency. The board then goes over this case, approves or amends the tentative recommendation of clemency, and the case then goes in to the Judge Advocate General for his approval.

In addition to this procedure there was appointed by Gen. Crowder, after I had been relieved from the clemency board, a special board of review, of three officers, of which Maj. Sannur is the head, whose duty it is to review any cases from the clemency board where the reviewing officer has indicated that the evidence is weak or not convincing or not sufficient to sustain the findings of the court. This special board reports on such cases whether in its opinion the evidence is sufficient or is convincing. I do not think it has yet been definitely decided in what way, if any, the findings of this special board are incorporated in the clemency review that goes from the Judge Advocate General's Office to the Secretary of War.

So far as my information goes, heretofore the findings of the special board have merely been set on a slip of paper, which is placed among the papers of the case, and which, of course, is the basis for the recommendation of the clemency board, but it has not been incorporated in the clemency review that goes to the Secretary of War. I understand that the question of incorporating the findings of the special board as to the evidence into the clemency review is now being taken up by Gen. Kreger.

Q. Can you give me any definite idea as to what percentage of the cases which go before the clemency board are such as to require their being sent on to this special board?—A. I really, sir, have no information upon which I could even hazard an approximation on that. The difference between the present clemency section, which is a part of the Military Justice Division, and the clemency board is that the clemency section handles all applications, letters, and petitions for clemency made by the prisoners themselves or by anyone on their behalf, while the clemency board handles cases, as it were, on their own motion which come direct from the barracks or from the penitentiaries with the memoranda as to facts that I have heretofore referred to.

Q. Who determines whether or not those cases shall actually go to the clemency board?—A. That question is determined by the record room upstairs because they see at once where a case has an application or letter or petition asking for clemency such case shall go to the clemency section, whereas the memoranda from the barracks or a list of prisoners from the penitentiary will go to the clemency board.

Q. The clemency board is not, then, under you as chief of the clemency division?—A. No, sir; I have actually nothing whatever to do with the clemency board except to try to keep in liaison with it.

Q. How long have you been on duty in the Department of Military Justice?—A. Since the latter part of 1918.

Q. As a result of your experience in the Division of Military Justice, and as a result of your observation, what are your conclusions as to the working of the system of military justice in the Army as now applied?—A. I would say that the rights of every accused are scrupulously protected in this office. First, the records are carefully examined to see that during the trial his substantial rights have been protected, and secondly, after he has been legally convicted of the offenses in question both the prisoner himself and anyone in his behalf can make and do make applications for clemency and leniency, and I can say from my own positive knowledge that in the exercise of clemency, even during the period of the war, while I was in this office a fair and liberal attitude was exercised toward prisoners, and of course since the return of conditions approximating those of peace a more liberal attitude has naturally been adopted.

Q. In your judgment, how does this protection compare with the protection which accused prisoners get in the civil courts?—A. I would say on the whole that the prisoner is afforded as careful protection of his substantial rights when his case has finally passed through the Judge Advocate General's Office to the Secretary of War or the President as afforded him in the civil criminal courts of this country. I do not mean by this answer to intimate that no changes whatever should be made in our court-martial procedure. For instance, I believe that the presence of a Judge Advocate learned in the law at each general court-martial trial would be advisable and that his duty would be similar to that of the judge in the criminal case who would charge the court as the criminal judge charges the jury, as to the law applicable in the case and that the law as so laid down by the Judge Advocate must be accepted by the court. Again I feel that perhaps the power of the reviewing authority to convene a court and send back the case for reconsideration after the court has acquitted the accused is one that is of doubtful expediency and perhaps subject to some abuse.

Q. What, in your opinion, has been the effect, if any, upon the morale of the office of the Judge Advocate General of this controversy which has been going on in the public press?—A. Of course, I think that the so-called controversy has had a somewhat unsettling and disturbing effect upon the members of the Judge Advocate General's Office. I think as a whole the men have felt that the work under Lieut. Col. Ansell, as well as under Gen. Crowder and Gen. Kreger, has been well done by an exceptionally able staff of lawyers,

I may be permitted to say so, and they further feel that perhaps not intentionally but none the less inevitable the public has received a wholly wrong impression of military justice as administered under the Judge Advocate General.

MARCH 26, 1919.

Q. Give your full name, rank, and present duties.—A. Col. William S. Weeks; judge advocate; executive officer, Judge Advocate General's Department.

Q. How long have you been on duty?—A. About the 1st of August, 1918—somewhere between the 1st and middle of August.

Q. At the time the question of amendment of General Order No. 7 was under consideration in the office, did you have any part in the discussions or in the preparation of this amendment?—A. No, sir.

Q. Were you present at any of the discussions pertaining to that amendment?—A. I think not, sir; I have no recollection of having been present at any discussion of that matter at all. It was all taken up in the Division of Military Justice and was discussed by those officers. I have nothing to do with that work.

Q. Explain definitely what has been the status of Gen. Ansell in the office of the Judge Advocate General since you became executive officer and up to the present time?—A. When I first went to the office I acted as assistant to Col. Morrow. At that time Col. Mayes was senior assistant, under Gen. Crowder, and Col. Morrow was executive officer. That lasted for about a month. During that time Gen. Crowder was in charge of all matters pertaining to departments and personnel, and went over all the important cases. After Gen. Ansell's return to the office Col. Mayes was ordered to France and, as I remember, that was about the last of August, or 1st of September. Shortly thereafter Col. Morrow was also ordered to France. After Gen. Ansell's return the running of the office remained about the same as when Col. Mayes was in charge. Gen. Crowder, as I understood it, retained charge of the appointment of all officers. I know that all recommendations were approved by him and it is my understanding that matters of policy were referred to him. That continued, in a general way, up to sometime about the middle of January, when Gen. Crowder came back and took charge of the office.

Q. Upon the return of Gen. Crowder to the office what changes were made as to the duties of Gen. Ansell with respect to the administration of military justice?—A. Shortly after his return to the office Gen. Crowder issued a memorandum changing the routing of certain classes of papers, as I remember. (Memorandum herewith.)

Q. To what extent have you been associated with the Division of Military Justice in the Judge Advocate General's Office?—A. When I was first ordered to duty in the Judge Advocate General's Department I was assigned to the Division of Military Justice, under Col. Read. I remained on that duty for about three weeks. During that time I reviewed some records, but my principal duty was preparing indorsements to letters pertaining to military justice and acting as a sort of executive officer to that division—assigning rooms, desks, checking up the record room, etc.

Q. So far as you have observed in your capacity as executive officer, what has been the effect, if any, upon the morale and efficiency of the office of this controversy which is going on, with respect to the administration of military justice?—A. So far as affecting the morale of the office I noticed no particular change. There have been several officers from the office and some officers assigned from the Provost Marshal General's Office on some special duty, whose functions I know nothing about. Prior to the time that this discussion arose I gained the impression from talking to officers from civil life on duty in the department that they believed that changes in the court-martial manual and in the Articles of War, should be made. Since this controversy arose I have not taken occasion to express any views, nor to receive any.

Q. Explain fully what disposition was made of Gen. Ansell's report of his European trip?—A. Along about the last of August, I can't be sure of these dates, but I know it occurred before we moved into this building, Gen. Ansell gave a lecture to all of the officers of the department on his trip abroad; this was shortly after his return. As I remember the circumstances he went through the executive office into Gen. Crowder's office and got that report from Gen. Crowder's desk, and then went on through into the library, where the lecture was given.

Q. Was that the original or a copy of the report?—A. That was the original. After we moved into the office over here he gave another lecture on that report to the officers who had come in since that time. When Col. Morrow and Col. Power went abroad they asked me to get that report and have copies made. I had those copies made one Sunday morning, and as I remember I had four of them made by Mr. O'Neil, a stenographer in the office, who came to work Saturday night and Sunday morning as they were leaving on Sunday afternoon. I furnished each with a copy and I kept two copies, one for myself and one I attached to the original. I found that that report had never been put on file, and later on, some one else who was going abroad (I think it was Col. Goff), asked for a copy. In the meantime I thought that Gen. Ansell had the report in his file, and I suggested that he had better put it in the files of the office—and that was done. I furnished Col. Goff a copy, I think I gave him my copy.

Q. You don't know when this report came into the hands of Gen. Crowder?—A. No, sir; I do not.

Q. When was the report, if at all, forwarded to the War Department?—A. It never was forwarded so far as I know. The last I saw of it was in the files of the office.

Q. In that report Gen. Ansell calls attention to the liabilities which are liable to grow out of the presence of our Army in France, and urged steps be taken to gather and record facts with a view to forehanded preparation against unjust claims and excessive damages for the just ones. Do you know whether any action was ever taken along those lines?—A. None so far as I know.

Q. You don't know what is being done along those lines in France?—A. I don't know, sir.

Q. Have any steps been taken by the office of the Judge Advocate General in Washington to bring about any such action?—A. None; so far as I know. It may have been taken and gone out direct from the Judge Advocate General's office without my knowing it.

Q. Is it probable that in matters of that kind that correspondence would go out without passing over your desk?—A. It could go out without passing over my desk. Does not necessarily pass through me. Ordinarily I would hear something about it, but it is not necessary.

Q. Going back to the memorandum of January, 1919, changing the routing of work in the office, do you recall what effect that had upon Gen. Ansell's duties, with respect to military justice?—A. As I remember that memorandum it read something like this: "Until further orders all matters, except those pertaining to military justice, shall be routed through Gen. Ansell. Those pertaining to military justice shall go direct to Gen. Crowder."

Q. Did this take place before or after Gen. Ansell appeared before the Senate committee?—A. This I could not say.

Q. Do you know why this change was made by Gen. Crowder?—A. No; I do not know why he made the change. I think he said something about expediting the business of the office.

WASHINGTON, D. C., March 26, 1919.

Lieut. Col. Samuel T. Ansell, Judge Advocate General's Department, being first duly sworn, was interrogated by Maj. Gen. J. L. Chamberlain, Inspector General, as follows:

Q. The draft of the order of November, 1917, designating you as Acting Judge Advocate General contains this statement: "The verbal orders of the Secretary of War under date of August 11, 1917, designating Brig. Gen. Samuel T. Ansell," etc. Can you tell me anything about those verbal orders?—A. General, I feel that as a matter of self-protection I have the right to decline, and I ought to decline, and I therefore do decline to answer this question or any other question asked me by the Inspector General in this investigation, inasmuch as I believe the purpose of it is to lay the foundation for disciplinary action against me.

MARCH 31, 1919.

Q. Give your full name and rank.—A. Maj. Andrew J. Copp, jr.; Judge Advocate General's Department.

Q. State briefly the duties upon which you have been engaged since you have been in the Judge Advocate General's Department.—A. My commission is dated July 30, 1918. My first assignment to duty was at Camp Dix, N. J., as camp judge advocate; on duty there one week; then transferred to the office of the Judge Advocate General's Department, at Washington, D. C., and was on duty there for one month, reviewing records of trial by general court-martial. The six months following I was camp judge advocate at Camp Sheridan, Ala., and on March 5 I was transferred again to the office of the Judge Advocate General and have served as a member of the special board of review.

Q. As a result of your experience, what are your views as to the protection given to the accused by the military code, as it is administered at the present time?—A. I consider the administration of military justice entirely adequate to meet the needs of the Army in times of both war and peace, and it is entirely adequate, in my opinion, to afford the accused protection at every stage of the proceedings, but because of its flexibility there is the possibility that the accused may be not afforded the protection he is entitled to. It is like any other machine which is capable of being operated either for good or for bad. There is one criticism, however, I think I wish to make, and I know that my views are concurred in by many of the officers at Camp Sheridan, with whom I was in close touch during my tour of duty there, and that is that there is frequently too long a delay between the time of confinement of the accused, and the final disposition of his case; that is, the action of the reviewing authority. Under the seventieth article of war, it is required that the charges be served upon the accused within 8 days after confinement or arrest, and trial 10 days thereafter, meaning 10 days after his confinement or arrest; or if that is impracticable that he be brought to trial not more than 30 days after those 10 days, making 40 days in all as the maximum period of confinement. It frequently occurs that this period is exceeded and there seems to be no remedy for it under the code as it now exists. I believe the remedy can be found in making the seventieth article of war a penal article, and so that an officer who causes the arrest or confinement of an accused under charges may be brought to a trial for his neglect if he allows those limits to be exceeded, but I believe the code in other respects is entirely adequate, if properly handled, and I am convinced that it should be flexible in order to enable a commanding general or reviewing authority considerable latitude in maintaining the discipline of his command. From my experience at Camp Sheridan as judge advocate I concluded that the accused was amply protected at every stage of the proceedings, particularly in view of the fact that the charges are, or should be, thoroughly investigated before he was brought to trial. From my experience on the present board of review I feel that if there is evidence of any want of protection or of any miscarriage of justice in any case that it is possible to detect by this office. There are certain standards by which a case may be determined; whether it was poorly or well tried. A well-tried case is one in which the prosecution made at least a prima facie case and counsel has done for his client all that it appears could be done under the circumstances. This appears from every record of trial as it comes to the Judge Advocate General's Office, and I believe that if the convening authority in the first instance is discreet I don't see how a serious error involving the protection of the accused could happen. There are only three elements to a well-tried case, if the court proposes to sustain the findings that is apparent from the face of the record. If the court neglects to duly advise the accused of his rights, the effect of his plea of guilty, or makes erroneous rulings in other respects; if counsel for the accused does not give protection to the client, it may or may not be discovered from the record. It is not discovered if certain facts were not brought out, as for instance, the history of the accused, or possibly the immediate cause of his committing the offense; the matter of humanity, and if that is not developed to advise the court properly why the accused committed the offense, it might not be discovered here. This office can not read anything not in the record. That would be an error of omission rather than commission on the part of the accused.

Q. What is your name?—A. John S. Lyon.

Q. And your duties?—A. I am in charge of the General Court-Martial Section of the Judge Advocate General's Office.

Q. I have here a copy of an office memorandum dated April 10, 1918, giving an office organization. Can you tell me whether this circular simply confirms an organization which was in existence at the time of its issue or whether it puts into effect a new organization? This question has reference, particularly, to subparagraph A, paragraph 11.—A. I think I have seen this or something similar to this a time ago. I think it was run off, of course after the office began to increase in volume of work. They did get up a memorandum of this kind with instructions as to how to be handled. I think that that carries about the usual way of the work now as since the war commenced. That one particular section is all that I am speaking about.

Q. You doubtless are familiar with the facts connected with the controversy which is going on with respect to the Judge Advocate General's Office?—A. Well, I have seen a little in the papers and heard of it; yes.

Q. Were you on duty in the Division of Military Justice between the period November, 1917, and April, 1918?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. And prior to November?—A. Yes, sir; have been in this office 17 or 18 years.

Q. Was there any material difference in the character of the duties performed by the senior assistant in the office subsequent to November, 1917, and prior to that date?—A. Well, I can not say about that part of it myself.

Q. You handled the papers?—A. I know they went through the office and I am under the impression that he signed them during that time, but I could not be positive whether or not they went to him. I would look at the last paragraph which would give me all the information I wanted, and I am under the impression that Gen. Ansell signed them.

Q. Had there been at that time—November, 1917—any radical change in the system of handling these papers? Would it not probably have impressed you?—A. Well, if there had been any radical change I should have noticed it.

Q. You are not cognizant of any radical change?—A. No, sir.

EXHIBIT 30.

WASHINGTON, D. C., April 21, 1919.

Col. James J. Mayes, Judge Advocate General's Department, appeared before Maj. Gen. J. L. Chamberlain, Inspector General, and being duly sworn, testified as follows:

Q. How long were you on duty in the office of the Judge Advocate General?—

A. I came on the 3d of April, 1914, and remained until the 10th of August, 1918.

Q. What was your status in the office?—A. Until the war came on I was an ordinary assistant in the office. Then I went with the division and in November, 1917, came back and was a sort of a special assistant to the Acting Judge Advocate General, Gen. Ansell, and then when he went to Europe I was practically in the same position that Gen. Ansell had been; that is, I signed myself as Acting Judge Advocate General. Of course, that was a mere administrative title.

Q. You were senior assistant and as such in the absence of the Judge Advocate General was the Acting Judge Advocate General?—Yes, sir; that was my position.

Q. And you continued in this status until Gen. Ansell's return from Europe?—

A. Yes, sir; and then I went to Europe.

Q. You are familiar with General Orders, No. 7, of 1918, are you not?—

A. Yes.

Q. What was the policy of the office relative to the application of General Orders, No. 7, prior to the time that Gen. Ansell went to Europe?—A. I can answer that only by what I found was going out of the office. When I took charge of the office upon Gen. Ansell's departure I insisted, since I was responsible, that everything pass over my desk. In that way I found what had been going on. The disciplinary division had not been sending its matter through us except, I might say, occasionally. I found that they were advising reviewing authorities with reference to matters clearly under the law, and under that order within the discretion of the reviewing authority. General Orders, No. 7, gives no room for such advice, neither does the law where punishments are discretionary and where the law has not been voided. The discretion as to the amount of punishment is in the court and the reviewing authority. I directed that such advices be stopped and the application of General Orders, No. 7, be limited to its stated purpose. The assumption of an authority to advise a reviewing authority that a sentence is too heavy carries with it the necessary corollary that this office could advise a reviewing authority that the sentence was too light and that would be unspeakable. It was for this reason that I directed that that be stopped.

Q. I understand you to state that you found the policy of the disciplinary division had been to make such recommendations?—A. Yes. They had gotten into the habit of signing their reviews themselves. Col. Davis signed them and sent them to the reviewing department. The great majority of them we never saw in our part of the office, Gen. Ansell and I. They had a direct connection with Gen. Crowder.

Q. You are referring now to the cases which came under General Orders, No. 7?—A. Yes.

Q. You are not referring to cases which were reviewed and went forward?—

A. Not to the cases that go to the President; no. I can not vouch for absolute accuracy, but I think this statement will cover it, that those cases which were forwarded by reviewing authorities having authority to take final action on them were forwarded to The Judge Advocate General merely for the review and advice directed by General Orders, No. 7, concerning which a letter would go back to the reviewing authority, advising him as to the result of the examination, and upon which the reviewing authority would then take final action. All these cases, with some exceptions—there were some of them sent through our desks—were acted upon by the disciplinary division and a letter sent to the reviewing authority by the disciplinary division. All cases requiring the action of the President were, I am quite sure, passed over our desks. There may have been exceptions to that rule.

Q. Was it your understanding during that period that Gen. Ansell was relieved from all responsibility with respect to the administration of military justice and all matters pertaining to courts-martial?—A. I have to answer that question practically. There was no order relieving him, but the disciplinary division took things directly to Gen. Crowder and assumed to send out these letters, whether by Gen. Crowder's knowledge or not I do not know. The effect was to practically leave us out of the disciplinary cases except as they went up to the President.

Q. As I understand from what you say, it practically left you out in so far as pertained to the cases which came under General Orders, No. 7?—

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Do you know why that condition of affairs existed?—A. No, sir. The letter that caused us so much trouble with respect to joint trials went out in that same way. We never saw it until long after it had gone out.

Q. Which letter was that?—A. It was a letter which advised concerning joint trials and made reference to cases properly joined, urged more joint trials, and said that joint trials should be had in all cases where accused were jointly charged or where charges were properly joined. That letter seemed to have induced a number of errors. We never saw that letter at the time. Gen. Crowder signed that letter.

Q. About when did that letter go out?—A. I don't know. That letter played a part, I think, in the Camp Grant cases.

Q. From the correspondence and from the testimony that has been taken it appears that Gen. Ansell was very much opposed to General Orders, No. 7, and to its provisions; that is correct, is it not?—A. I know that he never thought very much of the ethics of General Orders, 7; as to active opposition I never heard him say much.

Q. Did you ever connect that fact up with the fact that the cases under General Orders, No. 7, never went through your office? The fact that he was not friendly to the order—did that question ever come up for discussion at all?—A. No, sir.

Q. Now, in matters generally affecting administration of military justice outside of General Orders, No. 7, did they or did they not come under the supervision of your office?—A. You mean Gen. Ansell's office?

Q. Yes; you were his principal assistant at that time.—A. I can hardly answer that question. I know many of them did and I know some of them did not. For instance, the letter I just spoke of and numerous letters of advice were sent out from the Judge Advocate General's Office that we had not seen but I suppose most of them are all right. I do not believe this question is susceptible of answering.

Q. During the period that Gen. Ansell was absent in Europe and you were senior assistant you gave to General Orders, No. 7, the strict legal interpretation? Upon the return of Gen. Ansell from Europe what occurred, respectively?—A. I was not here.

Q. Did you leave immediately upon his return?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. You are not familiar then with the changes which he made in the application of that order?—A. No, sir. I would like to say in connection with my application of General Orders, No. 7, that I realized there were many sentences being imposed which were excessively heavy, what you may call sentences produced by war hysteria, but I considered the reduction of a sentence an attribute of the pardoning power and as not being a function of our office in advising upon the legality of the sentence. However heavy those sentences were, they were in all cases that we let them stand within the legal authority. I appreciated that all sentences ought to be coordinated, that there should be a determination of what was the adequate punishment for an offense, and that the sentences that had been imposed for that offense should be cut down so as to bring them within reasonable limits of what we determined was an adequate punishment for that offense. With that end in view I was establishing, with Gen. Crowder's concurrence, what is known as the disciplinary section of the disciplinary division. I believe that has now grown to considerable proportions. My idea being that that section should take of its own initiative an examination of cases and recommend to the Secretary of War that such sentences as were excessive should be reduced down to the proper measure of punishment, I realized when I was doing this, instead of making recommendations as the cases came along, that men in some cases would be resting under heavier sentences than should be imposed upon them for some time but the sentences had already been imposed, the ignominy of the heavy sentence was already upon the man and I did not consider it any great injustice to let the sentence stand for a sufficient time to allow such an accumulation of cases, such a study as would enable the proper measure of punishment to be arrived at, especially in view of the fact that all these men truly deserved a year's punishment; where a man had been given a sentence of say, 15 or 20 years, there is no reason to believe after his case is reviewed and found to be sustained that his sentence should be reduced below a year. Of course where I found a case which demanded immediate action, I did take action by recommending reduction of a sentence through the mitigating power of the President but not through the reviewing authority.

Q. You stated that when you became senior assistant and believing that all matters pertaining to the disciplinary division should pass over your desk, you gave instructions to that effect and after that they did pass over your desk?—

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Have you any reason to believe that that same result could not have been accomplished if Gen. Ansell had so desired?—A. No; I don't know of any reason. In fact, I don't know how the other system grew up. I felt that if I would be charged with the responsibility of the office I should know what went out of it, therefore I permitted nothing to go out expressing the opinion of the office except over my signature or in important cases, Gen. Crowder's signature.

Q. There was no objection made to that when you made the proposition?—A. No; Gen. Crowder was at that time occupied at the Provost Marshal General's Office so that he did not have very much time to be at the Judge Advocate General's Office.

Q. Upon the return of Gen. Ansell from Europe, did he automatically assume the duties of senior assistant, or did he receive any special orders so far as you know?—A. So far as I know he automatically assumed his duties.

Q. You do not know of any specific instructions which he received relative to the scope of his duties?—A. No; I probably would not know unless he told me and I do not remember him saying anything about it.

Q. Do you recall the cases of Ledoyen, Fishback, Sebastian, and Cook of the American Expeditionary Forces, known as the four death cases of France?—A. I remember those cases; yes, sir.

Q. Do you recall the circumstances connected with the review of those cases in the office of the Judge Advocate General?—A. They were reviewed and the death penalty was sustained as I remember. I am speaking of the original review.

Q. The cases were originally reviewed—I am speaking now of what the evidence shows and the examination of records—by Maj. Rand and then they passed over the desk of the chief of the division, who was Maj. Davis, to your office (Gen. Ansell's office) and finally to the Judge Advocate General, and then from the Judge Advocate General there were a lot of ramifications, there was a memorandum submitted by Col. Clark, and finally went to Gen. Ansell, etc. Do you recall what action was taken in Gen. Ansell's office on those papers when they originally passed from the division of military justice to Gen. Crowder?—A. I believe that my recollection is clear to this extent: Gen. Ansell was not there when those reviews came in and I passed those records to Gen. Crowder concurring in the reviews. The reviews I think recommended the execution of the death penalty. I concurred in that view. Then when Gen. Ansell came back Gen. Crowder asked him to review it. Gen. Ansell read the reviews and did not concur. Now, as to whether he disagreed in all the cases I am not sure, but the memorandum he filed at that time would show what his holding was.

Q. Do you recall whether or not, prior to being called upon by Gen. Crowder to review these cases, he had expressed himself verbally regarding the advisability of carrying out these sentences?—A. I am quite sure there was no change of view. I base that conclusion upon this: Gen. Ansell and I were in the same office and when these cases were turned over to him to read he immediately took the view that he afterwards maintained. I do not believe there was any change in his views. That idea may have grown up from the fact that they were sent to Gen. Crowder by me concurring in the imposition of those death sentences. Ansell and I differed on those cases and I am sure that Ansell was not here when they were passed to Gen. Crowder. I would like to say there that I approved the death penalties in those cases in view of the law as it now stands. I may say that I doubt the necessity of permitting the death penalty be imposed in all such cases; however, I was charged with the administration of the law as I found it and I therefore favored the execution of the sentences believing that they were flagrant cases such as was contemplated by the statute in authorizing the death penalty.

Q. I think you stated that Gen. Ansell was called upon to review those cases after they had gone up and that was what led to his view?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. How long were you in the office after Gen. Ansell returned from Europe?—A. Not over a week because I went on leave and then departed immediately.

Q. Have you any knowledge or do you recall anything with regard to the report which he submitted on his trip to Europe?—A. No; I don't think that it had been submitted when I ceased to have an interest in the office because I divorced myself from the office when I found I was going to Europe. Of course, I talked with him, but I never read the report. I had no time nor opportunity.

Q. During the period that you were on duty in the office with Gen. Ansell do you recall any recommendations of an important nature made by him with respect to the administration of military justice which were not adopted? I except now all recommendations pertaining to the interpretation of section 1199, Revised Statutes.—A. I do not recall any. Of course, in an office of the sort there are a great many recommendations and discussions that are hard to isolate. I don't recall anything particular now. There may have been.

Q. In France you have been in the office of the judge advocate of the American Expeditionary Forces?—A. Yes, sir.

MAY 7, 1919.

Q. Referring to the question of the four death cases in France can you tell me in a general way what Gen. Ansell's views were with respect to men who would go to sleep on post in the face of the enemy?—A. I can not affirmatively state that he ever told me what his views were, but I think it is quite possible that he may have. I base this statement upon the fact that I have held to the view that where a soldier was found sleeping on sentry duty in the front line he should receive the most severe penalty authorized for that offense, which is death unless there was some very mitigating explanation of his conduct. I have held to this view because a sentinel in such position holds the lives of his comrades in his hands. Having stated my opinions I will say that I do not remember of Gen. Ansell ever disagreeing from that view. His disagreement on the four cases from France was upon the sufficiency of those cases and not upon the principle. I can not say that Gen. Ansell ever said anything to me about this, but it is very probable, in fact extremely probable, that we have discussed the abstract proposition as I have outlined above.

Q. Was Gen. Ansell in the habit of expressing his views on subjects generally, freely and forcibly?—A. He was.

EXHIBIT 31.

APRIL 29, 1919.

Referring to this matter, Mr. Earle L. Brown, who at the time was stenographer in Gen. Ansell's office, states:

"You ask me if I can recall any discussion on the four death cases in France. I can't recall any definite discussion. I do think, though, that when those cases were first discussed that Gen. Ansell, before reviewing the cases at all, had really expressed himself that the conviction ought to be sustained, but I know that after he reviewed the cases and found the circumstances of them, or rather when the circumstances showed those men had, as I recall it, been exposed to so much fatigue and long duty, that on that ground his opinion was altered. I can't say anything definite, but that is my impression."

MAY 5, 1919.

Q. Do you recall that when Gen. Ansell returned from Europe he wrote a report of his observations over there? Did you write that report for him?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Do you know what disposition was made of the original of that report?—A. In the first place it was written coming over on the boat, and I don't know what became of it, but I know it was turned into Gen. Crowder, and my understanding was that report was made, through Gen. Crowder, to the Secretary of War.

Q. Do you know for certain that the original report was given to Gen. Crowder, or is that merely a presumption?—A. It is a presumption strong enough to satisfy me, but I can't say I saw him hand it to Gen. Crowder; but I think Gen. Ansell submitted it with a supplemental report of his personal observations, and I believe I can say with certainty that Gen. Crowder discussed that with him.

Q. Did you write that supplemental report also?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Was that written coming over on the boat or after your arrival?—A. I think it was written on the boat.

Q. Do you recall anything as to the length or character of that report—I am speaking now of the supplemental report?—A. It was nearly as long as the other.

Q. Did it differ materially from the other in character?—A. Yes, sir. I think the longer report was more of a technical discussion of the questions surrounding points which interested the Judge Advocate General's office. It was a formal report and the supplemental was, I would say, of the character of an unofficial report in that it was outside the questions common to the Judge Advocate General's Office, and it was more about his opinions as to the standing of the armies and what his observations had been as to the military situation generally.

Q. Did you at any time in the office, after your return, hear Gen. Ansell refer to the fact that his formal report had never been acted upon or submitted to higher authority?—A. No, sir. I never heard that discussed.

EXHIBIT 32.

WAR DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE JUDGE ADVOCATE GENERAL,
Washington, November 10, 1917.

Memorandum for the Secretary of War.

(For his personal consideration).

Subject: Authority vested in the Judge Advocate General of the Army by section 1199, Revised Statutes, to "receive, revise, and cause to be recorded the proceedings of all courts-martial, courts of inquiry, and military commissions, and perform such other duties as have been performed heretofore by the Judge Advocate General of the Army."

1. It is my duty to bring to your attention and present to you my views upon a long-existing situation which arose out of an ill-considered and erroneous change of attitude upon the part of this office that occurred within a score of years after the close of the Civil War—a situation which has endured ever since in the face of the law and in spite of attending difficulties but without reexamination, and which has profoundly affected the administration of military justice in our Army. I refer to the practice of this office, adopted it seems, in the early eighties, to the effect that errors of law appearing on the record, occurring in the procedure of courts-martial having jurisdiction, however grave and prejudicial such errors may be, are absolutely beyond all power of review. This nonuser of power which Congress authorized and required this office to exercise has, in numberless instances of court-martial of members of our Military Establishment, resulted in a denial of simple justice guaranteed them by law. Under the rule concededly illegal and unjust court-martial sentences, when once approved and ordered executed by the authorities below, pass beyond all corrective power here and can never be remedied in the slightest degree or modified except by an exercise of Executive clemency—an utterly inadequate remedy, in that it must proceed upon the predicate of legality, can operate only on unexecuted punishment, and, besides, has no restorative powers.

2. The last and most flagrant case of the many recent ones which have moved me to exercise an authority of this office which has long lain dormant, perhaps denied, in respect of which I address you this memorandum, was the recent case of the trial and conviction for mutiny of 12 or 15 noncommissioned officers of Battery A, of the Eighteenth Field Artillery, resulting in sentencing them to dishonorable discharge and long terms of imprisonment. Those men did not commit mutiny. They were driven into the situation which served as the basis of the charge by the unwarranted and capricious conduct of a young officer commanding the battery who had been out of the Military Academy but two years. Notwithstanding the offense was not at all made out by the evidence of record, notwithstanding the oppressive and tyrannical conduct of the battery commander, notwithstanding the unfair and unjust attitude of the judge advocate, which also appeared on the record, these noncommissioned officers were expelled from the Army in dishonor and sentenced to terms of imprisonment ranging from seven to three years. The court had jurisdiction and its judgment and sentence for that reason could not be pronounced null and void, but its conduct of the trial involved the commission of many errors of law which appeared upon the face of the record and justified, upon revision, a reversal of that judgment. That case showed the extreme and urgent necessity of a reexamination of my powers in such cases, and, after thorough consideration and with the concurrence of all my office associates, I took action in that case and concluded my review as follows:

"In the exercise of the power of revision conferred upon me by section 1199, Revised Statutes of the United States, I hereby set aside the judgment of conviction and the sentence in the case of each of these several defendants and recommend that the necessary orders be issued restoring each of them to duty."

Since this involves a departure from long-established peace-time administration of this office, I deem it my duty to acquaint you with the reasons therefor.

3. You, Mr. Secretary, and your immediate military advisers, can never appreciate, I think, the full extent of the injustice that has been done our men through the operation of this rule. Officers of our Army, howsoever sympathetic, can not approach a proper appreciation of the depth, extent, and generality of the injustice done, unless, through service in this office, they have seen the thing in the aggregate. A proper sense of the injustice can be felt only by those who exercise immediately the authority of this office. Indeed, those thus experienced can gather the full impression of the wrong done only by a complete mental inclusion of that vast number of cases where concededly corrective power ought to have been, but was not, exercised in each year of the past forty-odd years. My entire service, during all of which I have been keenly sensible and morally certain that the office practice was wrong, my six years' service in this very office during which I have borne witness to hundreds of instances of conceded and uncorrected injustice—all of this has never served to impress me with the full sense of the wrong done to the individual and to the service so much as has the experience of my present brief incumbency of this office during this war. What is true in my case is true, so they advise me, of my associates. During the past three months, in scores, if not hundreds of cases carrying sentences of dishonorable expulsion from the Army, with the usual imprisonment, this office has emphatically remarked the most prejudicial error of law in the proceedings leading to the judgment of conviction, but impelled by the long-established practice has been able to do no more than point out the error and recommend Executive clemency. All this, of course, has been utterly inadequate. It has not righted the wrong. It has not made amends to the injured man. It has not restored him, and could not restore him, to his honorable position in the service. It could do no more than grant pardon for any portion of the sentence not yet executed. Such a situation commands me to say, with all the emphasis in my power, that it must be changed and changed without delay. This office must go back to the law as it stands so clearly written, and, in the interest of right and justice, exercise that authority which the law of Congress has commanded it to exercise.

4. The Judge Advocate General of the Army is to revise all courts-martial proceedings for prejudicial error and correct the same. The law as it exists to-day is to be found in section 1199, Revised Statutes, wherein it is provided that "the Judge Advocate General shall receive, revise, and cause to be recorded the proceedings of all courts-martial, courts of inquiry, and military commissions, and perform such other duties as have been performed heretofore by the Judge Advocate General of the Army."

The word "revise," whether used in its legal or ordinary sense, for both are the same, can have but one meaning. It signifies an examination of the record for errors of law upon the face of the record and the correction of such errors as may be found. "Revise," or its exact synonym "review," is a word so frequently found in the law and so familiar to all lawyers that its meaning can never be mistaken. When used in connection with judicial proceedings it can involve no ambiguity. I am justified in entering upon a construction of the word only by the fact that this office for so long a time has ignored its meaning.

The word "revise," by the Standard Dictionary is defined thus:

"To go or look over or examine for the correction of errors, or for the purpose of suggesting or making amendments, additions, or changes; re-examine; review. Hence, to change or correct anything as for the better or by authority; alter or reform."

And the word "review," given therein as a synonym for "revise," is defined as:

"To go over and examine again; to consider or examine again (as something done or adjudged by a lower court) with a view to passing upon its legality or correctness; reconsider with a view to correction; as, the court of appeals reviewed the judgment; the judge reviewed and retaxed the bill of costs; to see or look over again; a literal meaning now rare."

In 34 Cyc., at page 1723, the word "revise" is defined as:

"To review or reexamine for corrections; to review, alter, or amend. See also 'revision.'"

And the word "revision" is therein defined as:

"The act of reexamination to correct, review, alter, or amend."

And in Black's Law Dictionary "revise" is defined as:

"To review, to reexamine for correction; to go over a thing for the purpose of amending, correcting, rearranging, or otherwise improving it."

And "review" is therein defined as:

"A reconsideration; second view or examination; revision; consideration for purpose of correction. Used especially of the examination of a cause by an appellate court."

And in Anderson's Law Dictionary the word "revise" is defined as:

"To reexamine and amend; as, to revise a judgment, a code, laws, statutes, reports, accounts. Compare 'review.'"

And the word "review" is defined in the same dictionary as—

"Viewing again; a second consideration; revisement, reconsideration, re-examination to correct. If necessary, a previous examination."

And in the same dictionary a "court of review" is defined to mean—

"A court whose distinctive function is to pass upon (confirming or reversing) the final decisions of another or other courts."

And in Words and Phrases (vol. 7) the word "revise" is defined as follows:

"To revise is to review or reexamine for correction, and when applied to a statute contemplates the reexamination of the same subject matter contained in a prior statute and the substitution of a new and what is believed to be a still more perfect rule." Citing Casey v. Harned, 5 Iowa (5 Clerk), 1, 12.

"Revise as contained in the constitution, Article XV, section 11, providing that 'three persons learned in the law shall be appointed to revise and rearrange the statute laws of the State,' means to review, alter, and amend, and does not signify an act of absolute origination. It relates to something already in existence." Citing Visart v. Knopps (27 Ark., 266-272.)

"A law is revised when it is in whole or in part permitted to remain and something is added to or taken from it, or it is in some way changed or altered to make it more complete or perfect or to fit it better to accomplish the object or purpose for which it was made, or some other object or purpose." Citing Falconer v. Robinson (46 Ala., 340, 348.)

5. I find the word used in another Federal statute in quite an analogous way. Section 24 of the act of July 1, 1898, chapter 541, Thirtieth Statutes, 553 (bankruptcy law), provides in part as follows:

"The several circuit courts of appeal shall have jurisdiction in equity, either interlocutory or final, to superintend and revise in matters of law the proceedings of the several inferior courts of bankruptcy within that jurisdiction."

The word "revise" as used in the bankruptcy act is universally held to be something broader than the power to review by writ of error. In In re Cole (163 Fed., 180, 181; C. C. A., first circuit), a case typical of all, the court, after adverting to the usual limitations upon the power to review by way of writ of error, contracted that method with the statutory power to revise, as conferred by that act, saying—

"On a petition to revise like that before us we are not restricted as we would be on a writ of error, our outlook is much broadened, and we are authorized to search the opinions filed in the district court, although not a part of the record in the strict sense of the word, for the purpose of ascertaining at large what were in fact the issues which that court considered."

And the court then said:

"We feel safe to adopt the broader view, and it is our present opinion that it is our right so to do."

And concluded that, upon revision—

"We can revise any question of law as to which we may justly infer that the district court reached a conclusion, whether formally expressed or not and whether or not formally presented."

The language of that statute is the very language of this, except that the revision there is expressly limited to matters of law. Inasmuch as in the statute before us there is no such express limitation, it could hardly be held that the revisory power of this office is less than the revisory power conferred by the bankruptcy act. The word "revise," as used in the bankruptcy statute, has always been held to signify power to reexamine all matters of law imported by or into the proceedings of the case, and a very liberal view has been taken of what constitutes the record and proceedings of such matters. (See the many cases cited in Federal Reporter Digest, "Bankruptcy," vol. 5, from secs. 349 to 448). The revisory power there conferred is something broader than that invoked by writ of error, though, of course, not so broad as to justify a reexamination of mere controversies or questions of fact. Doubtless, in any view of the case, the question whether the evidence sustains the verdict—that is, whether there is any substantial evidence at all upon which the verdict may rest—is a question of law which may be reviewed under this power, and such at least must be the power of this office.

6. The history of the legislation, the early execution given it, its historic place in the body of the law of which it is a part, all clearly show that this must be the meaning assigned to the word "revise" in the present instance. It is not necessary now to say whether such revisory power existed in the judge advocate in the early days of our Army, though, especially in view of the English military law, this seems to have been so; nor to advert to the fact that after the War of 1812, and also after the Mexican War, the duty of the Corps of Judge Advocates seems to have been primarily that of military prosecutors. Nor is it necessary, except to indicate the proper setting, to say that military prosecution had ceased to be the primary function of the Corps of Judge Advocates at the beginning of the Civil War, if not before. Nor is it more than suggestive that the Judge Advocate General of the Army has always presided over both the Corps of Judge Advocates and the Bureau of Military Justice, and that this corps and this bureau were consolidated by the act of 1884 (23 Stats., 113) into what is now the Judge Advocate General's Department. It is important to note that Congress established the Bureau of Military Justice in the light of the necessities of the Civil War and expressly invested its head, the Judge Advocate General of the Army, with this revisory power; and it is important to note that Congress redeclared this power in 1864 (13 Stats., 145) and in 1866 (14 Stats., 334), and again in section 1199, Revised Statutes, of which the former acts were the antecedents. Now, taking up these antecedents, in the act of July 17, 1862 (12 Stats., 598), which was an act "calling forth the militia to execute the laws of the Union, to suppress insurrection," etc., it was provided—

"That the President shall appoint, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, a Judge Advocate General, with the rank, pay, and emoluments of a colonel of cavalry, to whose office shall be returned, for revision, all records and proceedings of all courts-martial and military commissions, and where a record shall be kept of all proceedings had thereupon."

This provision speaks very plainly. It not only directs the Judge Advocate General to revise the records and proceedings of courts-martial, but it further directs that officer to keep a record of "all proceedings had thereupon"; that is, upon the revision. It is clear that this intended something more than a perfunctory scrutiny of such records, and that it in fact vested this office with power to make any correction of errors of law found to be necessary in the administration of justice. The records of this office indicate that Judge Holt, the Judge Advocate General of the Army during the Civil War period, did revise proceedings in the sense here indicated.

The next legislative expression is found in the act of June 20, 1864 (13 Stat., 145), of which sections 5 and 6 are as follows:

"Sec. 5. There shall be attached to and made a part of the War Department, during the continuance of the present Rebellion, a bureau to be known as the Bureau of Military Justice, to which shall be returned for revision the records and proceedings of all the courts-martial, courts of inquiry, and military commissions of the Armies of the United States, and in which a record shall be kept of all proceedings had thereupon.

"Sec. 6. That the President shall appoint, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, as the head of said bureau, a Judge Advocate General with the rank, pay, and allowances of a brigadier general, and an Assistant Judge Advocate General with the rank, pay, and allowances of a colonel of cavalry. And the said Judge Advocate General and his assistant shall receive, revise, and have recorded all proceedings of courts-martial, courts of inquiry, and military commissions of the Armies of the United States, and perform such other duties as have heretofore been performed by the Judge Advocate General of the Armies of the United States."

Just as the title of the judge advocate is in itself significant in this connection, is the title of the bureau thus created—the Bureau of Military Justice. will be noticed that this act preserves all the requirements of the act of July 17, 1862, supra, concerning the duty of the Judge Advocate General in the matter of revising the records of general courts-martial, and keeping a record of “all proceedings had thereupon,” meaning, of course, proceedings on such records in revision. And at the close of the war, in the legislation looking to the peace establishment, Congress enacted the act of July 28, 1866 (1 Stat., 334), the same being “An act to increase and fix the military peace establishment of the United States,” in section 12 whereof it was provided—

“That the Bureau of Military Justice shall hereafter consist of one Judge Advocate General with the rank, pay, and emoluments of a brigadier general, and one Assistant Judge Advocate General with the rank, pay, and emoluments of a colonel of cavalry; and the said Judge Advocate General shall revise, revise, and have recorded the proceedings of all courts-martial, courts of inquiry, and military commissions, and shall perform such other duties as have been heretofore performed by the Judge Advocate General of the Army * * *.”

This act does not change the duties of the Judge Advocate General with reference to the revision of records of courts-martial. It omits the phrase used in the two acts immediately preceding to the effect that “a record shall be kept of all proceedings had thereupon,” but introduces for the first time the direction that in addition to revising and recording the proceedings on all courts-martial the Judge Advocate General shall “perform such other duties as have been performed heretofore by the Judge Advocate General of the Army.” It will be observed that this last cited expression, as carried into section 1199 of the Revised Statutes as quoted above, still remains the law on the subject.

In referring to the duties “heretofore performed by the Judge Advocate General of the Army,” the statute included, inter alia, the duties prescribed by the statute, for the presumption is that the duties thus prescribed were in fact performed. It follows that included within this direction is the mandate that a record be kept of all proceedings had in the revision of courts-martial proceedings in the office of the Judge Advocate General, and the force of this mandate must be added to the ordinary meaning of the word “revise” in determining the scope of the duties of the Judge Advocate General now defined by law.

The legislative history of all the antecedent acts, brought forward as 1199, Revised Statutes, shows that the word “revise” has the meaning here indicated. As to the act of 1862, see Congressional Globe, part 4, second session, Seventeenth Congress, pages 3320, 3321. This was especially true of the debates on the act of 1866, of which there was considerable, owing to the objection on the part of the legislative recognition contained in that bill of military commissions. An effort was made to strike out and otherwise defeat the entire provision for a bureau of military justice during peace, and the strongest argument made in support of its retention was found in the fact that it had, and had freely and satisfactorily exercised this revisory power. The whole tenor of the debate clearly shows what Congress understood had been the revisory power of the Judge Advocate General of the Army since the act of July 2, 1862. It is said by one Senator (Mr. Lane of Indiana):

“It is utterly impossible for the President in the multiplicity of his duties to look into all these cases; it is physically impossible for the Secretary of War to do so; and to facilitate the administration of criminal justice it was found necessary to establish this bureau.”

And another Senator (Mr. Hendricks) said:

“I am not prepared to vote to abolish the court of military justice. If that court be properly constituted and discharges its duties legitimately within its jurisdiction as the court was organized under the act of two or three years ago, it will be a blessing, and I will not vote to abolish the court because of such wrong decisions that it may have made.”

And further on the same Senator referred to the case of one officer in whom he was interested in which there had been an erroneous conviction. He said in that connection:

“I went with him to see the Judge Advocate General. The case was called before the Judge Advocate General and reviewed, and at once he decided that the testimony was not sufficient, and restored the young man to his position in the Army.”

Further on, referring to this power, the same Senator said:

"I think it is a protection to the military men of the country to have such a court. It will come to be, when the hour of passion to which my colleague has referred shall have passed away, a court deliberate in its proceedings, and, I hope and have no doubt, wise in its adjudication. Then it will be a blessing to the country and a protection to our military men. Necessarily, when our Army shall come to be 50,000 strong, there will be many military trials for military offenses of military men. There ought to be a court of appeal, and this is intended to be a court of appeal, a court in which the judgment of the courts-martial may be reviewed and if improper revised. Such a court, it seems to me, ought to be in the Army." (See Cong. Globe, pt. 4, 39th Cong., 1st sess., 1866, pp. 3672-3676, et passim.)

It was these legislative antecedents that were brought forward, without substantial change of language, as the existing law (sec. 1199, R. S.) now under discussion.

8. This office, while ignoring its right and duty to revise for prejudicial other than jurisdictional error, has with strange inconsistency been quick to assert its power to declare a judgment and sentence null and void on the ground that the proceedings were, in its judgment, coram non iudice. After the large armies of the Civil War had been demobilized and their activities were no longer a matter of immediate concern to this department, and the Army had become, in point of size, but a small national police force, this office, for reasons unexpressed and unknown, restricted itself to the correction of such jurisdictional error alone. The practice seems to have been adopted without thoughtful consideration of the law or policy involved or the resulting injustice. The opinions of this office, beginning with the early eighties, assume, without argument or reason, that the office was so limited. It can not fairly be said that upon this specific question the office has ever fairly and thoughtfully expressed itself. Extracts from two of the opinions, typical of all, will be sufficient to show the general character and nature of these holdings.

In an opinion under date of August 10, 1885, approved by the Secretary of War, the Acting Judge Advocate General Lieber held as follows:

"As the whole matter is understood to be recommitted to this office for examination, including the letter referred to, I beg to remark that in acting upon the sentence of a court-martial the reviewing authority acts partly in a judicial and partly in a ministerial capacity. He 'decides' and 'orders' (Army Regs., par. 918). Without his decision the sentence is incomplete. His decision is an exercise of judicial functions, and is as much beyond the control of other constituted authority as the findings of the court are beyond his. He can not be ordered to revoke it, and if it be adhered to, the sentence can be removed in no other way than by the President in the exercise of his pardoning power (or set aside by the President when void by reason of a want of jurisdiction)."

In the case of Lieut. J. N. Glass, tried by general court-martial, this office, in a review under date of July 20, 1886, signed by Acting Judge Advocate General Lieber, concluded as follows:

"The proceedings, findings, and sentence in this case having been approved by the reviewing officer in the exercise of his proper functions, they are beyond any power of revision on the part of higher authority, but the President by the virtue of his pardoning power may remit the unexecuted part of the sentence. The latter course is respectfully recommended by this office."

In the opinion first above cited, which is a fair example of the many that have followed, the then acting Judge Advocate General took the view that the proceedings of a general court-martial could be set aside for a want of jurisdiction. But whence came that power? In declaring it to be competent to declare the proceedings of a general court-martial void for want of jurisdiction he evidently overlooked the fact that in declaring a trial void for want of jurisdiction some functionary must sit in an appellate capacity for which there must be some statutory or common law authority. As a matter of fact, no statutory or other authority can be found for the exercise of the power to declare a trial void for want of jurisdiction unless it can be found in that provision of section 1199 which confers a general revisory power upon the Judge Advocate General. If the power to revise includes the power to declare proceedings void for want of jurisdiction, it must also by any fair construction include the power to declare a judgment wrong as a matter of law and reverse it. If this office has the one power it necessarily has the other, and if it has not the latter power, it has not the former. By the plain language of the statute this office has both.

9. Nor has the power here contended for ever been questioned by the civil courts or other civil authority. To be sure, there are many expressions in adjudicated cases to the effect that the duly approved sentence of a court-martial, when the court has proceeded within its jurisdiction and the rules governing its procedure is as final and unassailable as a decision of a civil court of last resort. But it must be remembered, of course, that in each of these cases the court was speaking of collateral attack in the civil courts on the proceedings of a court-martial and did not have in view the power of the department itself to correct court-martial judgment by way of direct revision of it. I have also examined many expressions of opinion by the Attorney General and find that these expressions have had to do generally with cases in which the final approval has been by the President himself and go only to the question of whether such cases can be reopened by the President or his successor for the purpose of undoing what he has once legally done. I have not found that any authority has ever questioned the revisory power of this office to correct errors of law in court-martial procedure when they amount to a denial of justice. And I may be permitted to say that should I find such holdings by any authority other than the highest court of the land, I should not hesitate to question the soundness of the decision.

In this connection, I may say that it was suggested to me by the present Judge Advocate General himself that the finality attributed by the article of war to the power of the several reviewing authorities might be thought to militate against or negative the view I advance. This could hardly be true. The statutory power of the Judge Advocate General of the Army conferred by 1199, Revised Statutes, stands unaffected by anything said in the law as to the power of appointing authorities. Indeed, the statutes are not in pari materia. They exist for entirely different purposes. They establish different functions, all of which have independent spheres. The general powers of correction conferred upon appointing authorities by the Articles of War existed prior to the enactment of the statutes now brought forward in 1199, Revised Statutes, and also concurrently with them, without thought of conflict. There is, of course, a field of operation for each. The concept of finality referred to is the finality within the system, the finality with which all lawyers are familiar, and which must exist in order that there may be a review at all. A judgment of an inferior court must be a final judgment before it can be subjected to review in an appellate court. The action of the appointing or confirming authority directly giving effect to the judgment of the court itself gives finality to that judgment, that is, that completeness and integrity without which there would be nothing for this or any other authority to review. Such judgments are operative as final until and unless revised upon review. This concept of finality is so familiar to lawyers as to require no further discussion.

10. Such is the law, and there is a pressing necessity at this time that we go back to it, revive it, and act under it. Daily this office reviews records which show that in the trial some substantial rights of persons standing before courts-martial accused of crime have been flagrantly violated or that convictions have been secured on wholly insufficient evidence. Others show that charges and specifications are sometimes laid under the ninety-sixth (the general) article of war for acts that are not properly to be regarded as military offenses at all. And quite as frequently cases are encountered in which men have been convicted of serious offenses where upon the evidence the offense committed was not the offense charged or for which they were tried. Officers of the Army, even of the Regular Army, are persons unlearned in the law, and, as fallible beings, may be expected from time to time to commit such errors in court-martial procedure as operate to deny the accused right and justice and result in his unlawful punishment, and such errors are even more to be expected now, as our Army is expanding and thousands of new officers are brought into the service who have had no military training and no familiarity with military law and the customs of the service. For this reason alone there should be the closest supervision.

But the situation may also be viewed from another aspect. As an American institution, our Army must be maintained under law. Our Army can never be the most successful Army it is capable of becoming except it have the highest regard for the rights of the enlisted men, as those rights are established by law. Indeed, the higher regard for those rights the greater will be the popular confidence in the Army. For the first time in the history of this country we have in fact a truly democratic and popular Army. It has come from the people. Tens of thousands of homes have been affected. In the welfare of the Army millions are concerned directly and the entire public interested generally. Expediency, in the highest sense of the term, as well as law, requires that the Army itself be quick to see that justice be maintained within it. The men now drafted from all walks of life and placed, whether they will or not, in the military service of the country are wholly without previous military training and it is only natural to expect many transgressions against discipline, certainly in the early days of their service. They are entitled to justice as established by law, and those who are giving them up to the service of the country have the right to feel, to know, that they will not be lightly charged with military offenses nor branded while in the service of their country as criminals except after a fair and impartial trial and on proof which can meet the legal test.

11. There is a revisory power here which must be exercised. It will, of course, be exercised with all due regard for the proceedings and strictly within the limitations of the law.

Memorandum for Gen. Ansell:

I hardly feel like giving an unqualified concurrence to your opinion of even date regarding the authority of the Judge Advocate General to revise proceedings of all courts-martial. While I am satisfied with the logic of the opinion and willing to agree that statutory power can hardly be lost by nonuse, yet I think settled procedure should be departed from only after due consideration. The legal questions in this case are fully considered in your opinion. But I feel that one reading the opinion might easily form the conclusion that errors of courts-martial leading to miscarriages of justice are rather frequent. It has been my experience that very little injustice has arisen heretofore in the service through our courts-martial procedure. It has been considered settled for some 30 or 40 years that the reviewing authority's action (a division or department commander) completely closes a case, with the exception that errors jurisdictional might be corrected; somewhat illogical reasoning, I must admit. Under the section of the Revised Statutes considered by you in this opinion, if the office of the Judge Advocate General had the machinery available to constitute itself a court of review, by which I mean a court of last resort, and the proper officers were available to constitute this court at all times, probably only beneficial results could arise from the office taking full revisory power. But I doubt if we can be continuously assured of that peculiar ability in our officers sufficient to constitute such a court of review. For it must be remembered that this court of review, even though it consists of the Judge Advocate General himself and some of the best-known officers, would be jealously regarded by department and division commanders, since they would consider that their disciplinary powers, now practically unlimited, were hampered by reference to central power. I apprehend, speaking more from the administrative standpoint than from the legal, that the destruction of a division commander's initiative in regard to the discipline of his command might lead to more disastrous results than an occasional miscarriage of justice, which in any instance will largely be individual in character. If it can be assured that this power is to be used by the Judge Advocate General, whoever he may be, only in the clearest cases, and that it will not become such an engine as to lead division commanders to believe that the ultimate power of discipline is removed from their hands, then, of course, there is little objection. Whether this can be done is, of course, not a matter of law, but a matter of administration. I desire to emphasize these points, since, as stated at the beginning of this brief memorandum, the disturbance of settled conditions should be decided upon only after a consideration of all points that may be brought forward by one familiar with the subject.

WAR DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE JUDGE ADVOCATE GENERAL,
Washington, November 27, 1917.

Memorandum for the Secretary of War:

On November 10, 1917, there was presented for your personal consideration by Gen. Ansell, Acting Judge Advocate General, a memorandum brief in support of his action on the trial and conviction for mutiny of 12 or 15 non-commissioned officers of Battery A of the Eighteenth Field Artillery. In the discussion of the record of the case itself Gen. Ansell had come to the conclusion that the evidence did not warrant a conviction of the offense of mutiny; that many errors of law appeared on the face of the record, and that, while the court had jurisdiction and "its judgment and sentence for that reason could not be pronounced null and void," errors in law and the unfairness of the trial "justify, upon revision, a reversal of that judgment." Gen. Ansell, first inviting attention to section 1199, Revised Statutes, providing that "the Judge Advocate General shall receive, revise, and cause to be recorded the proceedings of all courts-martial, courts of inquiry, and military commissions, and perform such other duties as have been performed heretofore by the Judge Advocate General of the Army," concludes his review of the case as follows:

"In the exercise of the power of revision conferred upon me by section 1199, Revised Statutes of the United States, I hereby set aside the judgment of conviction and the sentence in the case of each of these several defendants and recommend that the necessary orders be issued restoring each of them to duty."

I shall not address myself, for the present, to the merits of the case, or to the proper administrative action that should be taken in respect of it, but rather to the statement of Gen. Ansell in his memorandum brief that an ill-considered and erroneous change of attitude on the part of the Judge Advocate General's office that occurred within a score of years after the close of the Civil War has profoundly and adversely affected the administration of military justice in our Army; that "errors of law, appearing on the record, occurring in the procedure of courts-martial having jurisdiction, however grave and prejudicial such errors may be, are absolutely beyond all power of review"; that you and your immediate military advisers can never appreciate the full extent of injustice that has resulted to our soldiers through the operation of this rule; that a proper sense of the injustice can be felt only by those who exercise immediately the authority of the Judge Advocate General's office; and that even those thus experienced can gather a full impression of the wrong done only by complete mental inclusion of that vast number of cases where concededly corrective power ought to have been but was not exercised in each year of the past forty-odd years. Gen. Ansell adds:

"During the past three months, in scores, if not hundreds, of cases carrying sentence of dishonorable expulsion from the Army with the usual imprisonment, this office has emphatically remarked the most prejudicial error of law in the proceedings leading to the judgment of conviction, but impelled by the long-established practice, has been able to do no more than point out the error and recommend Executive clemency."

In handling the memorandum brief to me for my study you asked my attention to these statements and expressed your surprise that such a situation as is here depicted could have existed in the face of an express grant of power to the Judge Advocate General, which Gen. Ansell finds in section 1199, Revised Statutes, to modify or reverse the approved proceedings of courts-martial. You directed me to examine the brief and make a report thereon. I have had a limited time in which to do this, but the results of my study, which I think is complete enough to answer the main propositions, follow.

The logic of Gen. Ansell's brief converges to its conclusion in these distinct channels:

1. That the single word "revise," as used in section 1199, Revised Statutes, by ordinary construction so clear as to abate any precedent or accepted meaning, confers upon the Judge Advocate General not only the power to examine, analyze, and review courts-martial proceedings, but also invests the Judge Advocate General with the power to modify or reverse the same.

2. That the history of the legislation discloses that the statute was originally intended to confer this power upon the Judge Advocate General.

3. That the administrative history of the department discloses that the power was actually utilized during the Civil War period and apparently until the early eighties.

4. That the power has never been questioned by the civil courts or other civil authority.

5. That the power is, and for a long time has been, vested in the judge advocate general of the British Army.

Since the brief concededly purports to overturn the authorized practice of over one-third of a century and to advance a doctrine as to which there is little or no previous expression or any authority or opinion outside of the brief itself, it will be well to follow the outline of discussion upon which the brief is built and to address ourselves first to the contention that the word "revise," in section 1199, Revised Statutes, confers upon the Judge Advocate General the power to review and then to modify or reverse the approved proceedings and sentences of courts-martial.

1. MEANING OF THE WORD "REVISE."

Practically the whole fabric of Gen. Ansell's argument is built upon an interpretation of the meaning of this single word "revise." In support of the broad meaning which he gives this word, his brief collates definitions of the word by lexicographers and jurists. On the authority of the Standard Dictionary, which defines the word "revise" as:

"To go or look over or examine for the correction of errors, or for the purpose of suggesting or making amendments, additions, or changes; reexamine; review. Hence, to change or correct anything as for the better or by authority; alter or reform."

He classifies the word "review" as a synonym of the word "revise;" and upon this justification indiscriminate definitions of the words "revise" and "review" are quoted throughout the brief. I think the deductions he makes in this part of his brief are unauthorized.

In essential etymology the word "revise" means "to look over." It has acquired a special meaning going to the purpose of the "looking over," and imparts a purpose of suggesting, or making amendments. Thus a proof reader revises copy and suggests changes. But he does not effect changes. Special committees of men learned in the law revise statutes and codes by special legislative commission, but their revisions do not give legal life to the result of their labors. The legislature must enact the revision as a law. In the same sense the "looking over," the "reexamination" of the proceedings of an inferior tribunal by an appellate court is not the reversal or the modification of the judgment, albeit the revision is for the purpose of making such a change. All this is most significant, since in the statutory grant of so wide a power as that contended for we should expect, by all the analogies of grants of appellate power, to find something more than authority "to look over," or "to examine." Such brief survey of the field of statutes conferring appellate power on the various tribunals of the several States and of the United States as I have been able to make in the limited time I have had to prepare this paper, fails to disclose a single instance in which the power to modify or reverse the judgment of inferior courts is deduced from the words "review" or "revise," without the addition of apt words specifically conferring the power to reverse or modify.

Gen. Ansell's brief purports to find one such statute, which he describes as analogous with section 1199, Revised Statutes, granting the power to modify or reverse by the use of the single word revise. Gen. Ansell says, in part:

"I find the word used in another Federal statute in quite an analogous way. Section 24 of the act of July 1, 1898, chapter 541, 30 Statutes at Large, 553 (bankruptcy law), provides in part as follows:

"The several circuit courts of appeal shall have jurisdiction in equity, either interlocutory or final, to superintend and revise in matters of law the proceedings of the several inferior courts of bankruptcy within that jurisdiction."

Gen. Ansell's brief then proceeds to cite a case interpreting the bankruptcy statute (In re Cole, 163, Fed., 180, 181, C. C. A., 1st Circuit), which he describes as "a case typical of all," in which the court says:

"On a petition to revise like that before us we are not restricted as we would be on a writ of error, our outlook is much broadened, and we are authorized to search the opinions filed in the district court, although not a part of the record in the strict sense of the word, for the purpose of ascertaining at large what were in fact the issues which that court considered."

And from this quotation it is inferred that the court was finding in the word "revise" a broader power to "modify or reverse" the procedure of the lower court. This legislative precedent, as judicially applied, would, if it were properly and accurately set forth in the brief, be most persuasive, and for this reason I have had recourse to the statute itself. I find that the quotation of the bankruptcy act of July 1, 1898, in the brief is incomplete, being a quotation of only a portion of the section conferring appellate jurisdiction on the Supreme Court and the circuit courts of appeal and the supreme courts of the Territories. The portion quoted is from the latter part of the section, the earlier part of the section having conferred general appellate jurisdiction; the words quoted by Gen. Ansell, "shall have jurisdiction in equity, either interlocutory or final, to superintend and revise in matters of law," follow that part of the section which confers general appellate jurisdiction. In order that you may be fully advised in the premises, I quote the entire section:

"SEC. 24. Jurisdiction of appellate courts.—(a) The Supreme Court of the United States, the Circuit Court of Appeals of the United States, and the supreme courts of the Territories, in vacation in chambers and during their respective terms, as now or as they may be hereafter held, are hereby invested with appellate jurisdiction of controversies arising in bankruptcy proceedings from the courts of bankruptcy from which they have appellate jurisdiction in other cases. The Supreme Court of the United States shall exercise a like jurisdiction from courts of bankruptcy not within any organized circuit of the United States and from the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia.

"(b) The several circuit courts of appeal shall have jurisdiction in equity, either interlocutory or final, to superintend and revise in matter of law the proceedings of the several courts of bankruptcy within their jurisdiction. Such power shall be exercised on due notice and petition by any party aggrieved."

The concluding paragraph, marked "(b)," quoted by Gen. Ansell, follows the underscored language which invests the courts with appellate jurisdiction in express terms. There was no necessity for the court to deduce appellate power out of that part of the section designated above "(b)," for it had this appellate power by express grant. The discussion of the court in in re Cole should, I think, be so understood.

I do not think this part of the reply would be complete without some reference to the manner in which appellate jurisdiction has generally been conferred by statute, exemplified in the following:

(a) The act of February 9, 1893, establishing the court of appeals for the District of Columbia provides:

"SEC. 7. That any party aggrieved by any final order, judgment, or decree of the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia * * * may appeal therefrom to the court of appeals * * * and * * * the court of appeals shall review such order, judgment, or decree, and affirm, reverse, or modify the same as shall be just."

(b) The judicial code of March 3, 1911, provides for the exercise of appellate jurisdiction in the following sections:

"SEC. 128. The circuit court of appeals shall exercise appellate jurisdiction to review by appeal or writ of error decision in the District courts," etc.

"SEC. 130. The circuit courts of appeals shall have the appellate jurisdiction conferred upon them by the act entitled 'An act to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy, etc.'"

"SEC. 237. A final judgment or decree in any suit in the highest court of a State in which a decision could be had, where is drawn in question, etc., may be reexamined and reversed or affirmed in the Supreme Court upon a writ of error.

"SEC. 250. Any final judgment or decree of the Court of Appeals of the District of Columbia may be reexamined and affirmed, reversed, or modified by the Supreme Court of the United States, upon writ of error or appeal, in the following cases: * * *

"SEC. 252. The Supreme Court of the United States is hereby invested with appellate jurisdiction of controversies arising in bankruptcy, etc."

In the light of what has been said, I think it will be perfectly apparent to you that the court, in In re Cole, was in no sense discussing its power to give effect to its conclusion upon revision. It was discussing only the scope of the matters that could be inquired into upon the petition, and found the definition of that scope in the words "revise in matters of law the proceedings of the several inferior courts of bankruptcy." It becomes, therefore, quite impossible to follow the brief we are here reviewing in its assertion that—

"The language of that statute (bankruptcy act) is the very language of this (sec. 1199, R. S.), except that the revision there is expressly limited to matters of law."

There is not even a shadow of analogy between the words of the Federal bankruptcy act investing the circuit courts with specific appellate jurisdiction and the words of section 1199, Revised Statutes, relied upon to invest the Judge Advocate General with appellate jurisdiction.

But I can not conclude this part of the brief without inviting your attention to the definitions which are quoted from Words and Phrases, volume 7. It seems to me that not a single one of the definitions quoted in the brief was addressed to grants of appellate power to courts, but that all are addressed to grants of legislative power to revise statutes, or to the scope of the authority granted to special commissions to revise codes, where it goes without saying the power to revise confers no power whatever to give effect to the revision. There was, however, one definition of the word "revise" on that cited page of Words and Phrases that does go to the meaning of a grant of power carried to a court by the word "revise"; but I do not find that this definition is in Gen. Ansell's brief. It is as follows:

"Revision, as used in a statute authorizing the entering of an appeal, after the expiration of the time limited for such appeal, when the court is satisfied that justice required a revision of the decree appealed from, does not mean reversal or modification, but simply review, reexamination, or looking at again."

I may add, in closing this part of my memorandum, that a rather complete survey of statutes vesting appellate power in tribunals, administrative as well as judicial, fails to disclose a single case where the power to modify and reverse is left to be deduced from such an inapt and single word as the word "revise," without the addition of appellate power granted in specific and unequivocal terms.

2. HISTORY OF THE LEGISLATION.

Gen. Ansell's brief asserts that "the history of the legislation, the early execution given it, its historical place in the body of the law of which it is a part, all clearly show that this must be the meaning assigned to the word 'revise' in the present instance."

It is said that Congress established the Bureau of Military Justice in the light of the necessities of the Civil War, and expressly invested its head, the Judge Advocate General of the Army, with this revisory power. Gen. Ansell's reference here is to the original statute, the act of July 17, 1862 (12 Stats. 598), in which it was provided that:

"The President shall appoint, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, a Judge Advocate General, with rank, pay, and emoluments of a colonel of Cavalry, to whose office shall be returned, for revision, the records and proceedings of all courts-martial and military commissions, and where a record shall be kept of all proceedings had thereupon."

The same words were carried forward in the act of June 20, 1864, and no further grant of power is found in the later statute. In the act of July 28, 1866 (14 Stats., 324), the granting word is still "revise," the only change being the omission of the words found in the earlier statutes, "a record shall be kept of all proceedings had thereupon"; and so the same words were carried forward in section 1199, Revised Statutes, where they remain to base the ground of this contention.

I find nothing in the legislative development that is even worthy of remark in this connection. The word revise (or revision) is the only granting word now as it was in the beginning. There is precisely the same power, no greater and no less. If history is to be invoked, therefore, we must look to the administrative and not to the legislative history of the statute. And this brings us to—

3. ADMINISTRATIVE HISTORY OF THE DEPARTMENTAL PRACTICE.

This administrative history has been appealed to in Gen. Ansell's brief to the extent that it is asserted that "the records of this office indicate that Judge Holt, the Judge Advocate General of the Army during the Civil War period, did revise proceedings in the sense here indicated."

Judge Advocate Gen. Holt was Secretary of War before he was Judge Advocate General. His position at the bar of the United States was an enviable one. If this statement of his construction of the law is accurate it would be most persuasive upon me, as I think it would be upon you. Gen. Ansell, however, cites no instance from the records of the Judge Advocate General's office where Judge Holt has indicated such a view, and such examination of the records of Judge Holt's action upon courts-martial proceedings during the Civil War period as I have been able to make does not disclose a single instance of the kind mentioned. Candor compels me to state that in the limited time that I have had to prepare this memorandum no systematic search of the hundreds of records bearing the stamp of Judge Holt's action could be made, and therefore the positive assertion that there exists no single instance of this kind would not be warranted. However, there was revealed from these old and interesting books very significant circumstances most emphatically indicating that Judge Holt never contended for nor exercised the power that Gen. Ansell says was vested in him by the statute, exemplified in the following reference to Judge Holt's opinions:

(a) I find on page 269 of Volume II of the Records of the Bureau of Military Justice (Dec. 16, 1864) over Judge Holt's own signature a short review of the case of Pvt. Hiram Greenland, who was tried by a court-martial convened by Gen. Howe. The record failed to show the date of the trial or whether there was present a quorum of the court. If Judge Holt had been exercising an indigenous power, such as it is contended he could exercise, he would have taken the action attempted to be taken in the instant case that raises the present contention, and would have reversed the judgment. Instead of doing so, his indorsement "To the President" reads:

"There are fatal irregularities invalidating the whole proceedings and rendering the sentence inoperative, and it is recommended that it be so declared by the President."

(b) Again, I find Judge Holt writing to Col. W. N. Dunn, Assistant Judge Advocate General, under the caption, "Bureau of Military Justice," and under date December 27, 1864, in reference to the case of James Scott, corporal, Ninth Michigan Cavalry, in which the record was fatally irregular in that the arraignment of the prisoner and the reception of his plea had been accomplished prior to the administration of the oath to the court. Instead of reversing the judgment, as he of course would have done had he deemed that the power was in him to do so, he writes as follows:

"In similar cases returned from this office, to the officer charged with the duty of revision or executing of the sentence, it has been found advisable to direct his attention to the fact that a proper course to pursue with irregularities of proceedings which can not be corrected, rendering the sentence inoperative, is to revoke the order of execution and, if the parties are not liable to be subjected to another trial, to release them."

(c) In the case of W. H. Shipman, in which the charge had been drawn under the general article of war for an offense clearly cognizable under a specific article, Judge Holt expressed the opinion that such an irregularity rendered the sentence void, but instead of reversing the judgment or attempting to give inherent effect to his own opinion, he addressed the Secretary of War, under date December 22, 1864, in part as follows:

"If this opinion is concurred in, the pleadings in the case must be held to be fatally defective and the sentence inoperative."

In no single case of perhaps 100 consecutive cases examined by me has there been found an instance in which Judge Holt ever attempted to reverse the judgment of a court-martial. Other cases similar to those quoted from were found in abundance.

Gen. Ansell's brief asserts that the power contended for was utilized during the Civil War period and beyond the Civil War period until the early eighties, when it was abandoned without apparent cause, argument, or reason. A rather hasty examination of the records from 1864 to 1882 fails to disclose a single instance of the exercise of such power. I shall not prolong this brief by citing the cases that I have examined. They cover the administration of Judge Advocate General Dunn and Judge Advocate General Swaim.

4. RULINGS OF CIVIL COURTS.

This brings us to the culmination of the whole argument in a refutation of the statement in the brief that, "Nor has the power here contended for been questioned by the civil courts or other civil authority." This statement evinces a failure to make a thorough search of the records and precedents. In his Military Law and Precedents, the leading work on the subject, Winthrop, for many years in the office of the Judge Advocate General, and for a time Acting Judge Advocate General during the incumbency of Judge Holt in the Civil War period, and hence familiar with any course of procedure followed by him, says:

"The accused always has an appeal from the conviction and sentence by court-martial to the President (or Secretary of War), but, in entertaining and determining such appeal, he is assisted and advised by the Judge Advocate General of the Army. Thus, as the tribunal is an executive agency, the appeal therefrom is to a superior executive authority."

And a footnote on page 51 adds that—

"The Judge Advocate General, under the authority vested in him by section 1199, Revised Statutes, to receive, revise, etc., the proceedings of courts-martial has, of course, no power to reverse a finding and sentence, was held in Mason's case, United States Circuit Court, Northern District of New York, October, 1882."

Mason's case still stands as the undisturbed pronouncement of the Federal courts upon the precise point at issue. Mason, a sergeant, had been convicted by a general court-martial of discharging his musket with intent to kill Charles J. Guiteau, the assassin of President Garfield. The findings and sentence were approved by Maj. Gen. Hancock, the reviewing authority, and the Secretary of War designated as the place of confinement the Albany County Penitentiary. In his review of the case the Judge Advocate General came to the conclusion that the court was without jurisdiction and that the sentence was therefore void. It is important to note that in communicating this conclusion to the Secretary of War, the Judge Advocate General did not (as it is here contended that he had the power to do) reverse the decision of the court, but he recommended that the Secretary of War should revoke the order for execution of the sentence.

In this case, however, the Secretary of War declined so to do and apparently adhered to the opinion that the court was not without jurisdiction and the sentence was valid—an opinion that was substantiated by the decision of the United States Supreme Court on a writ of habeas corpus addressed to the jurisdiction of the court. The prisoner, it seems, was not at the end of his resources. After being delivered to the warden of the penitentiary he sued out a new writ of habeas corpus based on other grounds. His contention was precisely the contention made in Gen. Ansell's brief; that is, that the Judge Advocate General is vested with an appellate power and that his decision against the validity of the proceedings of a court-martial has the effect of reversing the judgment.

His petition alleged among other things:

"Fifth. That the Judge Advocate General of the Army recently reviewed the evidence adduced on the trial before said court-martial, and on or about August 28, 1882, transmitted to the Secretary of War his report on the said proceedings, in which he renders an opinion reversing the findings and sentence of said court on the grounds:

- "1. No jurisdiction in a court-martial.
- "2. Employment of the prisoner illegal.
- "3. No evidence of guilt, but, on the contrary, proof of innocence.

"Sixth. That under section 1199, Revised Statutes, it is the duty of the Judge Advocate General to 'receive, revise, and cause to be recorded the proceedings of all courts-martial; and that it was the intention of Congress thereby to invest in the Judge Advocate General an appellate judicial authority over courts-martial, and that the Judge Advocate General has the judicial power, under the law, to review, revise, or reverse or affirm the findings and sentences of all courts-martial, and that his decision is the ultimate judicial judgment in all such cases.'

"That by the judgment and decision of the Judge Advocate General, rendered as aforesaid, reversing the findings of said court-martial the further imprisonment of the petitioner is unlawful and wrongful.

"Further, that his conviction and sentence, and the orders carrying the same into execution, are, each and all, annulled and made to stand for naught by the said judicial judgment and decision of the Judge Advocate General reversing the findings and sentence of said court-martial."

In addressing itself to the contention thus made, the opinion of the court proceeds as follows:

"The second ground of the application is not tenable, because the alleged reversal by the Judge Advocate General of the findings of the court-martial is not a reversal at all and does not purport to be. It is merely an advisory report to the Secretary of War, giving the opinion of the Judge Advocate General upon the merits of the trial and sentence. We might rest our decision here, but as it has been strenuously contended by the counsel for the petitioner that Congress has conferred authority upon the Judge Advocate General to reverse the proceedings of courts-martial, it is proper that we should express our dissent from such a conclusion. It is urged that because the statute makes it the duty of that officer to 'receive, revise, and cause to be recorded the proceedings of all courts-martial,' that the power to reverse is to be implied. It is not reasonable to suppose that the exercise of such an important power would be conferred in vague and doubtful terms, or that it lurks behind the word 'revise.' Applying the rule 'noscitur a sociis,' the word 'revise' is to be read in connection with the words that precede and follow it, and thus read the duty it imposes is analogous to the duty of receiving and recording the proceedings. Had it been intended by the statute to introduce such a marked innovation into the preexisting functions of the officer, and to convert a staff officer or the head of a bureau into a judicial officer having the ultimate decision in all cases of military offenses, the power to affirm, reverse, or modify the proceedings of courts-martial would have been lodged in plain and explicit language. The language employed is more appropriate to indicate the discharge of clerical duties.

"It is not intended to intimate that it is not the province and the duty of the Judge Advocate General to revise the proceedings of courts-martial so far as may be necessary to rectify errors of form, and to point out errors of substance which, in his judgment, should be corrected by the proper authorities, nor is it doubted that as to all such topics as are within the purview of his official scrutiny, his opinion is entitled to that respectful consideration which is due to the dignity and importance of the position which he holds.

"The rule is discharged and the application for a writ of habeas corpus is denied."

I think this memorandum might well close here and with the statement that both civil and military opinion sustain the view that the appellate power in the Judge Advocate General contended for in Gen. Ansell's brief does not, in fact, exist. However, I have noted a further statement which constitutes part 5 of this memorandum, to wit:

5. THE APPELLATE POWER OF THE JUDGE ADVOCATE GENERAL OF THE BRITISH ARMY.

The jurisdiction of the judge advocate general of the British Army in such matters is so obscurely stated in the books which I have examined that I am not entirely clear that I understand his precise relation to the administration of military justice. It appears to be true from the authorities I have examined that under the British system this official has the power to reverse and modify the proceedings of courts-martial, but that he does not find that power in any specific statute, but rather in his relations as a member of the ministry of the British Government. Such authority as he exercises in this regard seems to be not a grant of executive authority to an administrative official, but to arise out of an executive power of the Sovereign himself, delegated in this instance to a member of the ministry.

You are aware, of course, of the power you have by statute law to grant upon proper application an honorable restoration to duty to each of the men convicted of mutiny, and I shall shortly prepare an order of this kind and place it before you. I shall continue my study of the general subject to see whether this power of appellate review can not be found in the President himself as the constitutional Commander in Chief; so that instead of issuing a simple order of restoration, you may by direction of the President modify or disapprove the findings and sentence. It will take some little time to do this. The essentials of the proposition one would have to maintain are that the court-martial jurisdiction is, and always has been, an attribute of command; that the President would have had this power in the absence of any statute law, and that such recognition as has been given to subordinate members of the military hierarchy in the matter of convening courts-martial and reviewing their proceedings has in no way divested him (the President) of the revisory power which is clearly his in the absence of statutory provision. Immediate relief, however, should not await the completion of a study of this kind, or the concurrence of the Attorney General, which, I think, you would wish in view of the consideration his office has heretofore given the general subject.

E. H. CROWDER,
Judge Advocate General.

NOVEMBER 27, 1917.

As a convenient mode of doing justice exists in the instant cases I shall be glad to act in reliance upon a usual power and leave this larger question for future consideration, informed by the further study which the Judge Advocate General is giving it. Ordinarily, however, the extraction of new and large grants of power by reinterpreting familiar statutes with settled practical construction is unwise. A frank appeal to the legislature for added power is wiser.

EXHIBIT 35.

DECEMBER 6, 1917.

Memorandum for the Secretary of War.

1. In a memorandum submitted to you under date of November 27, on the general subject of the revisory power of the Judge Advocate General under the authority of section 1199 Revised Statutes, I concluded as follows:

"I shall continue my studies of the general subject to see whether this power of appellate review can not be found in the President himself, as the constitutional Commander in Chief; so that, instead of issuing a simple order of restoration, you may, by direction of the President, modify or disprove the findings and sentence. It will take some little time to do this. The essentials of the proposition one would have to maintain are, that the court-martial jurisdiction is, and always has been, an attribute of command; that the President would have had this power in the absence of any statute law, and that such recognition as has been given subordinate members of the military hierarchy in the matter of convening courts-martial and reviewing their proceedings, has in no way divested him (the President) of the revisory power which is clearly his in the absence of statutory provision."

2. In passing upon that memorandum you indicated it as your opinion that it would be unwise at the present time to attempt to deduce too wide an authority from the provisions of section 1199 Revised Statutes, since the power in the broad extent which has now been proposed to assert it has never been used. You suggested, moreover, that in your opinion it would be better at this time to frankly ask for such new legislation as may be found necessary to vest in the President such revisory powers as are necessary in order to assure the correct and orderly administration of military justice. As a result of the special study I have made of this matter, I have reached the firm conclusion that no additional legislation is necessary, but that an ample grant of statutory power already exists for the immediate establishment of a system of military procedure, the practical results of which will be to obviate the objections which have heretofore been made to the errors and injustice which sometimes results from regarding the duly approved sentence of a court-martial as beyond the corrective power of any authority so long as the court acted with jurisdiction of the person and subject matter tried, and did not violate any statutory rules prescribed to govern its procedure.

3. Under the views which I now entertain it is unnecessary to study the entire military system for the purpose of deducing in the President, as Commander in Chief, the power of appellate review, since, as has been indicated, it will be shown that this power has been conferred by statutory grant and it will be necessary only, in so far as concerns the President, to recognize and distinguish the place in the military hierarchy which he occupies by reason of the fact that he is the Commander in Chief.

It will be noted as a significant fact that until 1830 the President was not specifically vested by the Articles of War with power to convene general courts-martial. As a matter of fact, however, this power has frequently been exercised by the various Presidents in important cases, upon the principle that although the Constitution has vested in Congress the power to legislate for the regulations and government of the Army, this provision can not rightly be regarded as per se militating against the exercise of an authority properly inhering in a function devolved by the same instrument upon the Executive, and which has been attached to that function by the previously existing law and by usage. Washington, for instance, as Commander in Chief, prior to the adoption of the Constitution, frequently convened general courts-martial, although his authority to do so was rested upon no express grant, but was apparently derived mainly by implication from the terms of his commission by which he was vested with "full power and authority to act as he should see fit for the good and welfare of the service," and enjoined to cause "strict discipline and order to be observed in the Army." The precedent thus established has been followed from time to time by them in peace and war down to the present, and some of the most important military cases, such as those of Brig. Gen. Hull, Maj. Gens. Wilkinson and Gaines, Gens. Talcott and Twiggs, and Brig. Gens. Hammond, Gordon, and Paine, were all convened by Presidents who ordered courts-martial by virtue of their power as Commanders in Chief and not by reason of any express statutory grant.

The power of the President in this matter was made the subject of a special investigation by the Senate Judiciary Committee in 1885, and that committee in Senate Report No. 1337, Forty-eighth Congress, second session, after reviewing the history of this power, made the following observation:

"In this state of the history of legislation and practice, and in consideration of the nature of the office of Commander in Chief of the Armies of the United States, the committee is of the opinion that the acts of Congress which have authorized the constitution of general courts-martial by an officer commanding an army, department, etc., are, instead of being restrictive of the power of the Commander in Chief, separate acts of legislation, and merely provide for the constitution of general courts-martial by officers subordinate to the Commander in Chief, and who, without such legislation, would not possess that power, and that they do not in any manner control or restrain the Commander in Chief of the Army from exercising the power which the committee think, in the absence of legislation expressly prohibitive, resides in him from the very nature of his office, and which, as has been stated, has always been exercised."

In the celebrated case of Swaim (formerly Judge Advocate General) versus the United States, Twenty-eighth Court of Claims, 173, it was contended that the President had no power to function in court-martial proceedings except as that power was especially conferred upon him by statute. The court which tried Gen. Swaim was ordered by the President, and in an effort to avoid its judgment, the plaintiff deemed it necessary to assert a lack of authority in him to appoint a general court-martial under the circumstances of that case. The matter was very ably considered in an opinion written by Judge Nott, from which the following extracts are taken:

"It seems evidence, then, to the court that as courts-martial are expressly authorized by law, and the authority to convene them is expressly granted to military officers, this power is necessarily vested in the President by statute, though it may not be inherent in his office. A military officer can not be invested with greater authority by Congress than the Commander in Chief and a power of command devolved by statute on an officer of the Army or Navy is necessarily shared by the President. The power to command depends upon discipline, and discipline depends upon the power to punish; and the power to punish can only be exercised in time of peace through the medium of a military tribunal. If the President has no authority in matters pertaining to military tribunals unless it be 'expressly' granted by Congress, then Congress, by the simple expedient of exclusively granting the authority to appoint courts-martial and approve sentence to a few officers of the Army and tacitly ignoring the President, and practically defeat the express declaration of the Constitution and strip the office of Commander in Chief of all real power of command." * * *. (P. 221.)

"There can be no standing Army without statutory authority. Congress may place the command of a regiment in a colonel, a lieutenant colonel, a major, or any other officer; but when Congress so enact they, without words to that effect, likewise place the command in the Commander in Chief. His name is to be understood as written in every statute which confers upon a military office military authority." (P. 224.)

This case was carried on appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States and the doctrines announced by Judge Nott were confirmed. The court considered and discussed many points that had been raised in the court below, but at the close of its opinion made the following statement:

"We have felt constrained to, at least briefly, consider the several propositions urged upon us with so much zeal and ability on behalf of the appellant, though we might well have contented ourselves with a reference to the able and elaborate opinion of the Court of Claims delivered by Justice Nott." (165 U. S., p. 566.)

It may then be taken as established law that the President as Commander in Chief exercises every statutory power conferred upon any subordinate commander, and indeed it will be seen on closer analysis that his power is more far-reaching and important than was indicated in the able opinion of Judge Nott, to which I have just referred. The eighth article of war as it now exists reads in part as follows:

"The President of the United States, the commanding officer of a territorial division or department, the Superintendent of the Military Academy, the commanding officer of an Army, an Army Corps, a division, or a separate brigade, and, when empowered by the President, the commanding officer of any district or of any force or body of troops, may appoint general courts-martial." * * *

This is the first time in the development of the Articles of War in which the President has been specially designated by the statute as one having authority to convene a general court-martial. As shown, however, by the statement of the Judge Advocate General before the House Military Committee at the time the present article was under consideration, the inclusion of the Commander in Chief as one having this authority was made only because the authority had been denied in the Swalm case, referred to above, although reference was made to the fact that the Supreme Court had decided that this authority was "inherent in the President as Commander in Chief, and that he could always convene a court-martial when necessary."

The command exercised by the President is all inclusive. It relates both to territorial and to tactical commands, while that of the other officers designated in the eighth article of war is in some cases territorial and in others tactical. In any case, however, the power to convene a court-martial is, strictly speaking, an attribute of "command" and not of rank or office. In our system as well as in the British, the prototype of our own, courts-martial have always been considered as "instrumentalities of the executive power." Winthrop, our best-known writer on military law, after so designating them, remarks that they are "provided by Congress for the President, as Commander in Chief, to aid him in properly commanding the Army and Navy and enforcing discipline therein, and utilized under his orders or those of his authorized military representatives" (vol. 1, p. 53), and he cites from Clode (2 M. F., 361), as follows:

"It must never be lost sight of that the only legitimate object of military tribunals is to aid the Crown to maintain the discipline and government of the army."

It can not be too forcibly emphasized that the eighth article of war, which designates the officers who may convene general courts-martial, does not of itself bring a single court-martial into existence or place a single officer designated therein, other than the President (unless it be the Superintendent of the Military Academy), in position where he may convene the court-martial. The President's power of command is derived from the Constitution, and, by virtue of the fact that he is the Commander in Chief, he has full authority, at all times and wherever the forces of the United States may be serving, either to convene courts-martial himself or by appropriate orders, creating "command" for subordinate officers, to place those who are made eligible under the eighth article of war in position to exercise the authority conferred upon them by statute. Before a commanding officer of a Territorial department can convene a court-martial a department must be created of which he is given command; and before the commanding officer of a division or army or army corps or separate brigade, or the commanding officer of any other forces or body of troops, when empowered by the President, can convene a court-martial, the designated tactical or other command must be organized and the commanding officer in question be placed at its head. It follows, therefore, that both in theory and in fact the exercise of military jurisdiction is vested in the President, who may under the authority of the statute regulate or control participation therein by the various officers authorized by the eighth article of war to convene courts-martial whenever the proper antecedent jurisdictional facts exist. It thus appears that the eighth article of war does not confer "command," and hence its attribute, the power to convene courts-martial, upon a single officer, with the exceptions noted above. In every case except that of the President, who derives his power of command from the Constitution, orders creating or conferring command must issue from the President, or under his authority, before these designated officers can be clothed with power to convene courts-martial. These orders may, in legal effect, therefore, be considered a delegation of a part of the President's power to use these "executive instrumentalities" for the enforcement of discipline in the particular command over which the officer is placed.

4. This being the general situation and an outline of the military hierarchy in so far as the enforcement of discipline is concerned, it is necessary now to inquire as to the particular limitations, if any, which exist upon the power of the President to participate in the proceedings of courts-martial which by proper orders conferring "command" he has authorized subordinate commanders to convene. As indicated in the brief prepared by Gen. Ansell on this subject under date of November 10, 1917, the President, upon the advice of the Judge Advocate General, has always asserted and exercised the right to declare the proceedings of a court-martial convened by a subordinate commander void for want of jurisdiction, although the power to correct procedural errors affecting the substantial rights of the accused has been denied. In that brief the statement was made that no clear authority exists for the exercise of the one power and the nonexercise of the other, and it was indicated that in any event some officer must sit in an appellate capacity to determine the existence or non-existence of jurisdiction on the part of the court-martial. The position of the department in this matter, I find on careful examination, has been determined under the advice of the Attorney General of the United States. As early as 1854 the then Attorney General—Mr. Cushing—laid down the following doctrine:

"The decision of the President of the United States, in cases of this sort, is that of the ultimate judge provided by the Constitution and laws. Like that of any other court in the last resort of law, it is final as to the subject matter. There is one, and but one, legal question which would be competent in this case after the final decision of the President upon it; namely, that of nullity of the proceedings, as being, for instance, coram non judice, or for other causes, absolutely void ab initio." (See 6 Op. Att. Gen., 370-371).

In the case just cited, the final decision was made by the President himself, but in later cases the doctrine there announced was followed and extended to cases in which the original confirmation had been by a commanding officer subordinate to the President. In the case of Capt. Howe, the court had been ordered and its proceedings confirmed by a commanding general and a memorial was later presented to the President, praying that Capt. Howe be restored "to his pay and emoluments, as captain of the Second Regiment of dragoons." The opinion of the Attorney General was requested upon the authority of the President to grant the relief prayed for in this case, and, among other things, it was held that—"The decision of the court-martial upon the case of Capt. Howe was within its proper jurisdiction and rightful cognizance; and even if the point had been erroneously decided, it would have been an erroneous decision only, not a void judgment. The error would have been subject to be reviewed and corrected only by the commanding general. As the general in command affirmed the sentence, and it has been carried into execution, there is no longer any power competent to review and reverse that sentence."

This decision is dated June 3, 1854. (See 6, Op. Att. Gen., p. 514).

In Ryan's case (10 Op. Att. Gen., p. 66) Attorney General Bates, after discussing the rule that a case which had been finally acted upon could not be later reversed or set aside, remarked as follows:

"Nor is the rule confined to cases in which, by the Articles of War, the sentence of the court is required to be approved by the President, for in Maj.

Howe's case (6 Op., 514), where the sentence was approved by the commanding officer, as in the present case, Attorney General Cushing held that having been approved and executed by the President, a succeeding President could not revise it. He says (and here follows the quotation from Attorney General Cushing, 6 Op. Att. Gen., 371, supra). This opinion then proceeds:

"These authorities are certainly conclusive against your power to grant the prayer of the petitioner, unless indeed the record should show that from some cause the proceedings are absolutely null and void; for, in Devlin's case (6 Op., 371), and in the case of Capt. Downing (7 Op., 98), Mr. Cushing suggests that the only ground on which the President could interfere, would be, that of a nullity of proceedings, as being for instance, coram non judice, or, for other cause, absolutely void ab initio."

This opinion was rendered in June, 1861, and it will be noticed that it, like preceding opinions in which it has been held that the President had no power of revision, was decided prior to the passage of the act, the provisions of which are now embodied in section 1199, Revised Statutes. But even subsequent to the enactment of this statute, I find the doctrine first announced by Attorney General Cushing followed, and repeated it in the opinions of the Attorney General, in which no reference is made, however, to the revisory power conferred by section 1199. Thus, in the case of Fitz John Porter, decided in March, 1882, I find Attorney General Brewster, after referring to the preceding opinion, holding as follows:

"These opinions of my predecessors and of the Supreme Court, and also the decisions last above mentioned, all go to establish this proposition: That where the sentence of a legally constituted court-martial in a case within its jurisdiction has been approved by the reviewing authority and carried into execution, it can not afterwards, under the present state of the law, be revised and set aside. The proceedings are then at an end, and the action thus had upon the sentence is in contemplation of the law final * * *. It follows from this view that the President can confer the applicant no relief through a revision of the sentence in his case. That sentence involved immediate dismissal from the Army and disability to hold office thereafter. The dismissal is an accomplished fact and so far the sentence is completely executed." * * * (See 17, Op. Att. Gen., 303.)

The opinion of the Attorney General was to the same effect in the case of Maj. Benjamin F. Runkle, decided in 1877. (See 15 Op. Att. Gen., p. 290.)

In an early case (decided in 1 Op., 234) the following doctrine was announced:

"By the Constitution, the President is made Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy of the United States. But, in a Government limited like ours, it would not be safe to draw from this provision inferential powers by a forced analogy to other governments differently constituted. Let us draw from it, therefore, no other inference than that, under the Constitution the President is the National and proper depository of the final appellate power, in all judicial matters touching the police of the Army; but let us not claim this power for him, unless it has been communicated to him by some specific grant from Congress, the fountain of all law under the Constitution."

THE POWER OF THE PRESIDENT UNDER EXISTING LAW.

5. Having thus surveyed the situation with reference to the place and power of the President in the military hierarchy, I now proceed to show that under existing law the President has ample authority, through the office of the Judge Advocate General, to make any revision of the proceedings of courts-martial which may be necessary to accomplish the correct and orderly administration of justice.

The thirty-eighth article of war reads:

"The President may prescribe rules.—The President may by regulations, which he may modify from time to time, prescribe the procedure, including modes of proof, in cases before courts-martial, courts of inquiry, military commissions, and other military tribunals: Provided, That nothing contrary to or inconsistent with these articles shall be so prescribed: Provided further, That all rules made in pursuance with this article shall be laid before the Congress annually."

This article was introduced into the revision contained in the act of August 29, 1916 (39 Stat., 650-670). It was the subject of some discussion before the Committee on Military Affairs of the Senate, from which the following is quoted:

"Gen. CROWDER. I come now to two articles which I think will claim the special attention of the committee. They are new. Article 38 deals with rules to be prescribed by the President regulating the mode of proof and the procedure of courts-martial. I have followed section 862 of the Revised Statutes in drafting that article, which provides that 'the mode of proof in cases of equity, of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction shall be according to rules now or hereafter prescribed by the Supreme Court except as herein specially provided.' The President is our supreme court in trials by courts-martial, and I have undertaken to paraphrase that and give him the corresponding power in respect to courts-martial."

The discussion which followed indicated clearly that the purpose of article 38 was to confer upon the President of the United States the same broad power with respect to making rules of procedure for cases tried by courts-martial as is possessed and exercised by the Supreme Court of the United States in cases of equity and admiralty.

Rules of procedure may be described as those rules which direct and control the conduct of a case from its beginning until its termination, including the review, satisfaction, or enforcement of any judgment rendered. The following is quoted from Clark's Criminal Procedure, pages 1 and 2:

"Criminal procedure is a method fixed by law for the apprehension and prosecution of a person who is supposed to have committed a crime, and for his punishment if convicted. * * * It is that division of legal things under which are regulated steps by which a legal right is vindicated or a wrong punished. The term 'criminal procedure' includes pleading, evidence, and practice. * * * The term 'practice' is usually employed as excluding both pleading and evidence, and the designating of all the incidental acts and steps in the course of bringing matters pleaded to trial and proof, and procuring and enforcing judgments on them. As applied to criminal procedure, the term includes the rules which direct the course of procedure by which the accused is brought before the court, the conduct of the court, and the proceedings after trial."

Mr. Bishop defines procedure thus (1 Bishop Cr. Pro., sec. 1):

"In the nature of things there is a difference between a right and the means by which it is enforced; an obligation and the legal steps by which the delinquent is made to atone for its violation; the law defining the crime and the course of the court in punishing it. Out of this distinction grows the law of judicial procedure. It is that division of legal things under which are regulated the steps by which a legal right is vindicated or a wrong punished."

The following definition is quoted from Bouviers Law Dictionary, page 2729, third revision:

"The methods of conducting litigation and judicial proceedings.—'Practice,' like 'Procedure,' which is used in the judicature acts, denotes the mode of proceeding by which a legal act is enforced, as distinguished from the law which gives or defines the right, and which by means of the proceeding the court is administered; the machinery as distinguished from its product."

The Supreme Court of the United States in Kring v. Missouri (107 U. S., 231) state:

"The word 'procedure' as a law term is not well understood, and is not found at all in Bouviers Law Dictionary, the best work of the kind in this country. Fortunately a distinguished writer on criminal law in America has adopted it as the title to a work of two volumes, Bishop on Criminal Procedure. In his first chapter he undertakes to define what is meant by procedure. He says (sec. 2): 'The term "procedure" is so broad in its significance that it is seldom used in our books as a term of art. It includes in its meaning whatever is embraced by the three technical terms pleading, evidence, and practice.' In defining practice in this sense he says, 'The word means those legal rules which direct the course of proceeding to bring parties into the court, and in the course of the court after they are brought in.' An evidence, he says, as part of the procedure 'signifies those rules of law whereby we determine what evidence is to be admitted and what rejected in each case and what is the weight to be given to the testimony admitted.'"

It may be interesting to note that the revision of Bouviers Law Dictionary, following this opinion, adopted the definition of procedure contained in Bishop's Criminal Procedure, and in the foregoing excerpt from the Supreme Court. In Thirty-second Cyclopaedia, page 405, procedure is stated to be—

"A general term, including pleading, process, evidence, and practice—in fact, every step that may be taken from the beginning to the end of a case." All law writers, speaking of the question, agree that procedure is a much broader term than practice and includes the latter. In Thirty-first Encyclopedia, page 1153, practice is stated to be "the mode of proceedings by means of which a legal right is enforced; that which regulates the formal steps in an action or other judicial proceeding; the course of procedure in courts; the form, manner, and order in which proceedings have been and are accustomed to be had; the form, manner, and order of conducting and carrying on suits or prosecutions in the courts through their various stages, etc."

See also State v. Caruthers, 98 Pacific, 478 (Okla.); Downs v. Board of County Commissioners, 124 Pacific, 383 (Colo.); Morris v. City of Newark, 62 Atlantic, 1005-1006 (N. J.); Clark v. Baxter, 108 Northwestern, 838 (Minn.).

Attention has been called to the fact, in the discussion of the thirty-eighth article of war before the Senate Military Committee, the powers sought to be conferred on the President were likened to those exercised by the Supreme Court in prescribing rules of procedure for the courts of the United States in causes in equity and admiralty. The whole course of proceedings in such causes is prescribed by rules promulgated by the Supreme Court. These rules have all the force of law, and they control and direct the proceedings in the cause from its beginning up to and including the trial and thereafter.

The case of Bremena v. Card, 38 Federal, 144, illustrates the extent to which such rules may go. Under the early admiralty rules a person might be imprisoned for debt on process issued in an admiralty cause. Later on the forty-seventh rule abolished imprisonment for debt on admiralty process in all cases where, by law of the State where the court is held, imprisonment for debt has been abolished in similar cases. Thus it will be seen that by a rule of procedure prescribed by the Supreme Court a person might be imprisoned for debt in an admiralty cause. Prior to the decision referred to this modification of the rules had been accomplished and rule 2 promulgated, dealing in a measure with the same subject. The court said:

"It will be noted that these rules of practice are made by the Supreme Court under the authority of the act of Congress 8th May, 1792 (1 Stat. L., 276), and that they have the force of law; that rule 2 makes provisions for a warrant of arrest of a person and is the authority for issuing such a warrant; that it deals with this subject only; and that in so dealing with it it provides for an attachment in the case of the issuance of the warrant of arrest and the inability to serve it because the defendant can not be found. In other words, the attachment calls for this predicate, the issuance of the warrant for arrest, and the failure to find the defendant."

In Bailey v. Sundberg, 49 Federal, 583-585, decision by the circuit court of appeals, second circuit, it was said:

"The Supreme Court, by authority of the laws of the United States, prescribes and regulates the mode of procedure in suits in admiralty by promulgating rules therefor." (R. S. U. S., secs. 913, 917.)

Admiralty rule 9 requires process in admiralty to be served not only by arresting the property, but by giving notice by publication of the arrest, of the time assigned for the return of the process and the hearing of the cause. Under this rule the notice is as indispensable as the order to confer jurisdiction upon the court to adjudicate upon the right of those interested in the property, and those who do not appear are not bound by the decree. (Cooley Const. Lin., 403.) The rule has the force of a law of Congress, and in effect declares that publication as well as seizure is as essential to constructive notice of the proceedings to all those who have the right to be heard.

It follows that the power of the President conferred by the thirty-eighth article of war, considered in connection with the provisions of section 1199, Revised Statutes, is broad enough to establish a system of revision and correction which would reach all errors affecting the substantial rights of military defendants.

6. Section 1199, Revised Statutes, reads:

"The Judge Advocate General shall receive, revise, and cause to be recorded the proceedings of all courts-martial, courts of inquiry, and military commissions, and perform such other duties as have been performed heretofore by the Judge Advocate General of the Army."

This statute when enacted contemplated the revision of the proceedings of all courts-martial, courts of inquiry, and military commissions, and did in effect provide for a statutory appeal of all such cases. These provisions and the articles of war relate to the same subject matter, and must be construed together. Article of war 83 requires each general court-martial to keep a separate record of its proceedings in the trial of each case, and such record shall be authenticated by the signatures of the president and the judge advocate.

Article of war 34 requires each special court-martial and each summary court-martial to keep a record of its proceedings, which shall contain such matter and be authenticated in such manner as may be required by regulations prescribed by the President. Article of war 35 provides that the judge advocate of each general court-martial shall forward the original trial record to the appointing authority or his successor in command, and when the appointing authority or the officer commanding for the time being has acted upon the record it shall be transmitted to the Judge Advocate General of the Army. Article of war 36 provides that the record of each special court-martial or summary court-martial shall be transmitted to such general headquarters as the President may designate by regulation, there to be filed in the office of the Judge Advocate.

The evident legislative intent was to limit the automatic statutory appeal to general courts-martial trials. The mandate of article of war 35 that all records of the proceedings of general courts-martial, after being acted upon by the appointing authority, shall be transmitted to the Judge Advocate General of the Army, is a complement to section 1199, Revised Statutes, and at the same time a limitation upon the cases which, by force of the statute, go to the Judge Advocate General for revision. General courts-martial or military courts of general jurisdiction having power to try all claims of military offenses and to impose any degree of punishment up to and including death. Special and summary courts are limited in their jurisdiction as to persons, offenses, and the punishments that may be inflicted. In the main, they deal with minor offenses and bear somewhat the same relation to the military judicial system as justice courts and municipal courts bear to the civil system. With respect to all cases tried by general court-martial, the right of revision is protected by statute and can not be taken away or impaired by any regulation. As to cases tried by special or summary courts the provisions of the Articles of War so far modify section 1199 that these cases are no longer automatically transmitted to the Judge Advocate General for revision. The right of appeal is not annexed to cases of minor consequence. This is in harmony with the tendency in the States generally to limit the right of appeal on controversies in the civil courts, or rather to deny the right of appeal in respect to trivial cases, both civil and criminal. In most of the States it is provided that there shall be no right of appeal in civil cases where the judgment does not exceed a specified amount, or in criminal cases where the fine does not exceed a certain amount, or the imprisonment is not more than a certain number of days—with this exception generally recognized, that if the case involves the assertion of some constitutional right, or the consideration of some tax statute, or other question in which the public is concerned, jurisdiction may be taken by the appellate court upon application. The argument by which this limitation of the right to appeal is sustained is that society is interested in having controversies settled and that it is better for the individual member of society to occasionally suffer some slight injustice, resulting from a denial of the right to appeal, than that society should be put to the expense, trouble, and confusion which the animosities of a multitude of trivial cases would cause. Now, in the present Articles of War the statutory right of appeal is limited to cases tried by general courts-martial. In this we see an analogy with the growing practice in the civil courts. The analogy may be carried further. The President may make regulations designating the headquarters where record of special and summary courts may be filed. Under the authority to make rules of procedure the President has authority to provide that any or all of these records of these courts shall be transmitted and filed with the Judge Advocate General, in which event they would fall within the revisory powers conferred by section 1199, Revised Statutes. Thus provision may be made by regulations to be established by the President to bring before the Judge Advocate General for revision such cases tried by a special or summary court as the Commander in Chief should deem it expedient should be so revised, just as upon application the appellate court in the civil judicial structure may hear such cases as the public interest requires it should hear, even from among those cases concerning which the right of appeal is denied. Of course, as to cases tried before a general court-martial the statutory right of appeal remains unimpaired, as the President has no authority to prescribe a rule of procedure in direct conflict with the statute.

It follows, I think, that existing legislation affords the means of establishing a complete and orderly system for the disposition of a trial by courts-martial from its beginning up to the final termination thereof, including suspension of the execution of sentence until revision by the Judge Advocate General, and the final steps necessary to make effective the law as declared by the Judge Advocate General. When a sentence of a court-martial has been approved by the appointing authority, or the officer in command for the time being, it is ripe for revision. The Articles of War do not provide for the suspension of the execution of sentences pending revision, and a revision which resulted in the setting aside of a sentence would be more or less ineffective in any case where the sentence had been wholly executed before revision. The question is, May the President, under the authority of the thirty-eighth article of war, establish a rule of procedure that would suspend the execution of a sentence of general court-martial until the case had been revised and action taken upon such revision, affirming or setting aside the sentence? There is no prohibition in the Articles of War against such rule, although it may be argued that article 46, by implication, denies to the President the power to make such rule. This article reads:

"No sentence of a court-martial shall be carried into execution until the same shall have been approved by the officer appointing the court, or by the officer commanding for the time being."

The utmost effect of this article is to negative the power to carry any sentence into effect until approved by the appointing authority. There is, of course, a finality about the sentence of a court-martial when approved by the convening authority. There would be no completed judgment of conviction without this element of finality. It is a final judgment so far as that court or that department of the military judicial system is concerned. Until there is a judgment having the element of finality, there is nothing to execute. Clearly this article can not mean that a sentence once approved by the appointing authority must be executed, and that it is not subject to review or revision by any other authority. It may be helpful to draw an analogy from the civil judicial structure commonly found among the States, as well as in the Nation. When a case is tried in a nisi prius court, if it be an action at law, it is usually tried by jury in a court presided over by a judge. The verdict of the jury in a civil case fixes the amount of recovery; or in a criminal case, the guilt or innocence of the accused. There is no final judgment in the case until the verdict has been crystalized into a judgment pronounced and entered by the court, which, for the purposes of that court and that trial, is the officer having authority to approve, or in a proper case to disapprove, the findings of the jury. It would be wholly accurate to say that no verdict or sentence of a nisi prius court shall be carried into execution until approved by the presiding judge and the entry of final judgment. The judgment of any civil tribunal is final so far as that tribunal is concerned, and that judgment may be carried into execution unless set aside upon appeal. Indeed, the judgments of subordinate civil courts possess such a degree of finality that they may be pleaded in bar as a former adjudication in any other litigation, notwithstanding an appeal is pending. Likewise, they may be carried into execution during pendency of an appeal, unless some statute or rule of procedure suspends the right of enforcement until an appeal, if one be taken, has been heard and disposed of. The findings or judgment of a court-martial do not possess any unusual or extraordinary attributes simply because the court is the judge of both the law and fact, or because in addition to passing upon the guilt or innocence of the accused it fixes the punishment upon conviction. Indeed, there are analogies in the civil courts. For a great many years in some States in certain classes of cases, notably libel, juries were judges of both law and fact. At the present time, among the States generally juries called in the justice of the peace courts are judges both of the law and fact, the justice of the peace not being authorized to instruct them as to the law. In a number of States juries in certain classes of criminal cases are empowered to fix the punishment upon verdict of guilty. As, for instance, in North Dakota. And in Federal courts juries have always been authorized to fix the punishment upon conviction of murder in the first degree, that is to say, whether the punishment should be death or life imprisonment. In all these cases there is no final judgment in the trial courts until the verdict, whatever it may be, has been approved by the presiding judge, and formal judgment entered. But it has never been contended that such judgments possessed such finality that they could not be revised upon appeal.

There is no difficulty in reaching the conclusion that it was the intention of Congress to provide for a complete and orderly system for the administration of military justice, and that there will be found within existing law all that is necessary to give full effect to the power of revision vested in the Judge Advocate General. By rules of procedure the President may suspend the execution of sentences by general courts-martial until they have been revised by the Judge Advocate General and direct the disposition of such cases after revision. In the event the sentence is found to be lawful and is approved, it would be carried into execution as of course, and in the event it was found to be unlawful and set aside upon revision, a rule of procedure could provide that an order as of course would issue making such disposition of the case as was consonant with the principles of law. Should it be advisable to revise certain classes of cases tried by special or summary courts, rules of procedure could bring those cases to the Judge Advocate General for revision and make provision for their disposition when revision had been accomplished.

7. If it is desired to rely upon the authority here outlined, the revisory power of the President can be fully and satisfactorily exercised through the establishment of certain rules of procedure. Time has not been taken to draw these rules with that definiteness and accuracy which they must possess before they are placed in practical operation. It is sufficient to state for present purposes that the most important provision of these rules of procedure would be one requiring all reviewing authorities, before executing a sentence of death, dismissal of an officer, or dishonorable discharge of an enlisted man, to withhold publication of action until the record of the case had been reviewed in the Office of the Judge Advocate General and the reviewing authority advised of the legality of the proposed action, as based upon the record in question. All other sentences could be treated exactly as at present, since it is only in cases where one of the sentences I have indicated is imposed that injustice is sometimes done which now seems beyond the corrective power of the President. The procedure here indicated would require the reviewing officer to change his proposed action whenever the same had been held to be illegal because of errors shown by the record. But even this would involve no departure from established principles, inasmuch as it has been held that the action of a reviewing officer does not become final until the same is actually published to his command. So long as he retains within his control an order which he contemplates issuing his action has not assumed that finality which places it beyond his power to change or correct.

8. It should be frankly stated that one very serious objection to the plan here proposed is the delay that would result, particularly in time of war, in the execution of sentences of courts-martial. It is desirable, as a general rule, that these should be swift and summary and not involved in such delays as characterize the trial of cases in the civil courts. In time of peace this objection would not be of great moment, except in those departments such as the Philippine Department, far removed from the seat of government. The actual delay in the execution of sentences occasioned by the installation of this system would not ordinarily exceed 30 days at the most. It may well be, however, that this matter is of sufficient moment to make it advisable to refrain from exercising the authority here outlined and to seek instead such a clear grant of legislative authority as will make the President, acting through the Office of the Judge Advocate General, a supreme court of review in all military cases, with ample authority to revise, reverse, modify, or set aside any finding or sentence of a court-martial whenever such action may be found necessary to accomplish the ends of justice. I am accordingly submitting in a separate memorandum an alternative plan, in which is outlined a proposed amendment to section 1199, Revised Statutes, which, if enacted by Congress, will remove all difficulties and confer upon the President a power which he should undoubtedly be authorized to exercise.

DECEMBER 11, 1917.

Memorandum for Gen. Crowder.

1. Here is my brief, which, with his verbal permission, I file with the Secretary of War, and which I hope you will place before him at your convenience.

2. It has been prepared under circumstances which militate against literal accuracy, but it, together with the opinion, substantially and with sufficient accuracy expresses my views.

3. The subject, as I conceive it, is one of tremendous importance. I am quite sure that if the department could change its view of the law and come to concur with me a practical scheme for the exercise of such power could be established, to the great benefit of the administration of military justice.

4. I fear that this office, under the prevailing practice, is exercising too little supervisory power over courts-martial. I cite in my brief, as I mentioned to you the other day, that in the Civil War an Assistant Judge Advocate General was established independently of military command, so that as a representative of the reviewing power of this office he could pass preliminarily on proceedings and thus prevent the execution of illegal sentences. I apprehend that something like this will have to be done again.

5. If you and the Secretary of War, upon thorough reconsideration, can not accept my view of the law, and if it should be thought advisable to seek legislation establishing this power in the department, I hope its exercise will not be subjected to General Staff supervision. Such supervision, it seems to me, would necessarily destroy the judicial character of the power.

S. T. ANSELL.

EXHIBIT 37.

WAR DEPARTMENT.

OFFICE OF THE JUDGE ADVOCATE GENERAL,
Washington, December 17, 1917.

MY DEAR MR. SECRETARY: Herewith is Gen. Ansell's reply brief on the question of whether or not appellate power to revise, modify and affirm findings and sentences of courts-martial is, by the terms of section 1190, Revised Statutes, vested in the Judge Advocate General of the Army.

You will recall that on November 10 Gen. Ansell submitted, for your personal consideration, a brief which purported to find in said section this appellate power in the Judge Advocate General. His conclusion was reached on five main points of argument:

(1) That the legislative history of the statute shows that the intent of Congress was to vest the Judge Advocate General with this power:

(2) That the administrative history of the statute disclosed that the power had been actually exercised by Judge Advocates General of the Army during the Civil War, and until about 1882;

(3) That the word "revise" (which was the only word that could be considered as such a grant), as used in other statutes, specifically in the Federal bankruptcy statute, had been discussed by a United States court as having sufficient amplitude to convey appellate power;

(4) That the courts of the United States had never passed upon the power; and

(5) That the judge advocate general of the British Army is vested with an analogous power.

You passed Gen. Ansell's brief to me and asked me to submit to you my views.

I replied to each one of the foregoing propositions, in substance, as follows:

(1) That the legislative history of the statute was without significant incident.

(2) That the records of the Judge Advocate General's Office showed no exercise of this power by Judge Advocates General; but, on the contrary, disclosed many instances where such power, if it existed, would have inevitably been exercised had it been contended for, but which was not exercised.

(3) That Mr. John Tweedale, chief clerk of the War Department in 1882, had made an affidavit for use in the case of In re Mason, to the effect that he, as chief clerk, knew of no instance where the Judge Advocate General of the Army had in any official communication or report relative to the proceedings of general courts-martial, proceeded to act as an appellate judicial authority; but that his action was only to revise; in other words, to examine and make recommendations, either to the General of the Army, when that officer had appointed the court, or otherwise to the Secretary of War.

(4) That the word "revise" was not relied upon in the Federal bankruptcy act to confer appellate power, which power was granted in express terms elsewhere in the same section cited in Gen. Ansell's brief, and that in its commonly accepted definition the word "revise" did not import such a grant.

(5) That the United States Circuit Court for the Northern District of New York had considered the question almost in the precise terms in which it was presented for your consideration, and had explicitly denied that section 1190, Revised Statutes, granted any such power to the Judge Advocate General.

(6) Finally, that a study of the organization of the British Army disclosed that the judge advocate general of his majesty's forces had not exercised such power.

Gen. Ansell now submits to you, through me, a second brief, still contending for the same proposition. He first addresses himself to the evils he would remedy. He shows that a great number of officers, not familiar with court-martial procedure, have lately been included in the Army, and that there is danger of grave error in court-martial proceedings, even when reviewed by judge advocates and approved by duly constituted reviewing authorities. He shows that the exercise of the pardoning power is often not sufficient to restore an officer or a soldier, who has been wrongfully convicted, to his full rights. He argues very strongly from these premises that it is both expedient and necessary that some corrective power should exist which shall have the effect of nullifying even approved findings and sentences of courts-martial, and that we should not be remitted solely to the pardoning power to correct fatal errors of courts-martial and reviewing authorities. He cites again the mutiny case, to which your attention has heretofore been called, as an example, and says, I think justly, that there are other cases, happening particularly since the outbreak of war, which demand the exercise of such corrective power; and down to this point I follow him with substantial concurrence without, however, being able to concur with him that this power has been granted to the Judge Advocate General by section 1199, Revised Statutes.

Gen. Ansell's argument presents about as strongly as it could be presented the necessity for an appellate power. But this question is not a new one. Whether such a power should be created and whether the service would gain or lose by such provision has been discussed in service literature since 1885, but never, so far as I can inform myself, has it been suggested in this prior discussion that this appellate power could be deduced from section 1199, Revised Statutes.

The lawyer's mind is not particularly shocked by the fact that there exists in military jurisprudence no court of appeal. The Supreme Court of the United States has held too often, and too clearly to require citation of authorities, that it is no objection to a grant of jurisdiction that the grant is original and also final; also that there is no constitutional or necessary right of appeal. There is, therefore, no fundamental reason why court-martial jurisdiction, as at present constituted, should be disturbed. The argument which has heretofore prevailed is that there are substantial reasons of expediency and good administration why it should not be disturbed. War is an emergency condition requiring a far more arbitrary control than peace. The fittest field of application for our penal code is the camp. Court-martial procedure, if it attain its primary end, discipline, must be simple, informal and prompt. If, for example, all the findings and sentences of courts-martial in France must await finality until the records be sent to Washington, we shall create a situation very embarrassing to the success of our Armies. Such a proposition could hardly be seriously advanced, and it would be very difficult to defend on principle legislation providing appeal in some cases and denying it in others. Yet if we legislate at all on this subject we shall be driven to the necessity of doing that very thing.

You have recently issued orders which will be corrective of some of the embarrassments referred to by Gen. Ansell, and I shall shortly submit for your consideration further orders which will, I think, carry corrective action still further and perhaps afford the measure of relief called for.

4. I fear that this office, under the prevailing practice, is exercising too little supervisory power over courts-martial. I cite in my brief, as I mentioned to you the other day, that in the Civil War an Assistant Judge Advocate General was established independently of military command, so that as a representative of the reviewing power of this office he could pass preliminarily on proceedings and thus prevent the execution of illegal sentences. I apprehend that something like this will have to be done again.

5. If you and the Secretary of War, upon thorough reconsideration, can not accept my view of the law, and if it should be thought advisable to seek legislation establishing this power in the department, I hope its exercise will not be subjected to General Staff supervision. Such supervision, it seems to me, would necessarily destroy the judicial character of the power.

EXHIBIT 37.

WAR DEPARTMENT.

OFFICE OF THE JUDGE ADVOCATE GENERAL,

Washington, December 17, 1917.

MY DEAR MR. SECRETARY: Herewith is Gen. Ansell's reply brief on the question of whether or not appellate power to revise, modify and affirm findings and sentences of courts-martial is, by the terms of section 1199, Revised Statutes, vested in the Judge Advocate General of the Army.

You will recall that on November 10 Gen. Ansell submitted, for your personal consideration, a brief which purported to find in said section this appellate power in the Judge Advocate General. His conclusion was reached on five main points of argument:

(1) That the legislative history of the statute shows that the intent of Congress was to vest the Judge Advocate General with this power:

(2) That the administrative history of the statute disclosed that the power had been actually exercised by Judge Advocates General of the Army during the Civil War, and until about 1882;

(3) That the word "revise" (which was the only word that could be considered as such a grant), as used in other statutes, specifically in the Federal bankruptcy statute, had been discussed by a United States court as having sufficient amplitude to convey appellate power;

(4) That the courts of the United States had never passed upon the power; and

(5) That the judge advocate general of the British Army is vested with an analogous power.

You passed Gen. Ansell's brief to me and asked me to submit to you my views.

I replied to each one of the foregoing propositions, in substance, as follows:

(1) That the legislative history of the statute was without significant incident.

(2) That the records of the Judge Advocate General's Office showed no exercise of this power by Judge Advocates General; but, on the contrary, disclosed many instances where such power, if it existed, would have inevitably been exercised had it been contended for, but which was not exercised.

(3) That Mr. John Tweedale, chief clerk of the War Department in 1882, had made an affidavit for use in the case of In re Mason, to the effect that he, as chief clerk, knew of no instance where the Judge Advocate General of the Army had in any official communication or report relative to the proceedings of general courts-martial, proceeded to act as an appellate judicial authority; but that his action was only to revise; in other words, to examine and make recommendations, either to the General of the Army, when that officer had appointed the court, or otherwise to the Secretary of War.

(4) That the word "revise" was not relied upon in the Federal bankruptcy act to confer appellate power, which power was granted in express terms elsewhere in the same section cited in Gen. Ansell's brief, and that in its commonly accepted definition the word "revise" did not import such a grant.

(5) That the United States Circuit Court for the Northern District of New York had considered the question almost in the precise terms in which it was presented for your consideration, and had explicitly denied that section 1199, Revised Statutes, granted any such power to the Judge Advocate General.

(6) Finally, that a study of the organization of the British Army disclosed that the judge advocate general of his majesty's forces had not exercised such power.

Gen. Ansell now submits to you, through me, a second brief, still contending for the same proposition. He first addresses himself to the evils he would remedy. He shows that a great number of officers, not familiar with court-martial procedure, have lately been included in the Army, and that there is danger of grave error in court-martial proceedings, even when reviewed by judge advocates and approved by duly constituted reviewing authorities. He shows that the exercise of the pardoning power is often not sufficient to restore an officer or a soldier, who has been wrongfully convicted, to his full rights. He argues very strongly from these premises that it is both expedient and necessary that some corrective power should exist which shall have the effect of nullifying even approved findings and sentences of courts-martial, and that we should not be remitted solely to the pardoning power to correct fatal errors of courts-martial and reviewing authorities. He cites again the mutiny case, to which your attention has heretofore been called, as an example, and says, I think justly, that there are other cases, happening particularly since the outbreak of war, which demand the exercise of such corrective power; and down to this point I follow him with substantial concurrence without, however, being able to concur with him that this power has been granted to the Judge Advocate General by section 1199, Revised Statutes.

Gen. Ansell's argument presents about as strongly as it could be presented the necessity for an appellate power. But this question is not a new one. Whether such a power should be created and whether the service would gain or lose by such provision has been discussed in service literature since 1895, but never, so far as I can inform myself, has it been suggested in this prior discussion that this appellate power could be deduced from section 1199, Revised Statutes.

The lawyer's mind is not particularly shocked by the fact that there exists in military jurisprudence no court of appeal. The Supreme Court of the United States has held too often, and too clearly to require citation of authorities, that it is no objection to a grant of jurisdiction that the grant is original and also final; also that there is no constitutional or necessary right of appeal. There is, therefore, no fundamental reason why court-martial jurisdiction, as at present constituted, should be disturbed. The argument which has heretofore prevailed is that there are substantial reasons of expediency and good administration why it should not be disturbed. War is an emergency condition requiring a far more arbitrary control than peace. The fittest field of application for our penal code is the camp. Court-martial procedure, if it attain its primary end, discipline, must be simple, informal and prompt. If, for example, all the findings and sentences of courts-martial in France must await finality until the records be sent to Washington, we shall create a situation very embarrassing to the success of our Armies. Such a proposition could hardly be seriously advanced, and it would be very difficult to defend on principle legislation providing appeal in some cases and denying it in others. Yet if we legislate at all on this subject we shall be driven to the necessity of doing that very thing.

You have recently issued orders which will be corrective of some of the embarrassments referred to by Gen. Ansell, and I shall shortly submit for your consideration further orders which will, I think, carry corrective action still further and perhaps afford the measure of relief called for.

EXHIBIT 38.

BRIEF FILED BY PERMISSION OF THE SECRETARY OF WAR IN SUPPORT OF MY RECENT OPINION CONCERNING THE REVISORY POWER OF THE JUDGE ADVOCATE GENERAL OF THE ARMY OVER JUDGMENTS OF MILITARY COURTS.

Before the Secretary of War.

STATEMENT,

From my earliest interest in military law and the administration of military justice, and especially during my service in the office of the Judge Advocate General, I have seen the evident embarrassment of the department and its cases according to established legal principles. The errors imposed by the view and practice of this court had jurisdiction, no matter how flagrant, no matter how bad its judgment and sentence. According to legal principles, no corrective power existed in this court. From time to time the officers of this court, since its creation, have turned their minds to the question of section 1199 of the Revised Statutes in the exercise of necessary remedial authority. But since the Army has been so long in the cases calling for such revision therefore have the officers of this court felt an urgent need for such a revisory power has not been sufficiently manifested to make the question an all-impelling one. They have accepted the practice, dissatisfied with it, but unwilling to go to its bottom and overturn it. I should have been on duty in this office with me and I should have been on duty in the statement of this attitude.

For these reasons, the revision of the proceedings of military justice is based on an importance which it did not heretofore possess. The administration of this office can be transcended. It is to be found, at least while this large office is in the supervision over these proceedings; that is to say, the administration of military justice throughout the Army. It should be a revision for gross errors, not for those that make a conviction bad, as well as for those that make a conviction good. It should be done with such thoroughness as to secure the respect of the Army and the people. It should be so expeditiously done as to make any great measure of unlawful punishment.

It is to merit no allusion, our new Army must be more crudely than did our small peace-time Army. My experience in this office thus far has been true. Many cases already have been reviewed. Major Davis, in charge of the Military Justice, was admitted of no doubt whatever but that the judgments and sentences were revised and set aside if the power were many of these that were illegal were many of these that were illegal. My associates in an endeavor to discontinue the judgments whereby in consonance with the judgment might be modified by wrongful conviction, to their passing upon such cases which were of revision in this office. We were considered, with a seriousness of the proper construction of the statute. My associates concluded, with the statute does adequately confer upon the Army this very just and necessary to indicate the urgent need of such a revision. The so-called mutiny was the so-called mutiny of the views and conclusion which the alleged mutiny of the non-commissioned officers of Field Artillery. The errors of the proceedings in this case, it is difficult for me to see how any fair-minded officer could have failed to remedy the error and injustice. These errors were the result of a capricious officer was responsible for the errors. He was guilty of tyrannical and oppressive conduct. The charges were preferred, not against him for his conduct, but against the Army. The charges were referred to the proper officer, a high rank, who ordered the court for the trial of these men. A court was convened and convicted them and sentenced them to imprisonment. The reviewing officer approved the conviction and sentence. Where such chain of action as this can occur there is left no room for the surprise that I otherwise should have felt at the failure of the proper authorities to court-martial the young officer himself. I frankly confess my fear that such a failure of justice as this, under such circumstances, involving so many officers whose concern it was to see that justice was done, is symptomatic of more general deficiencies that are the usual concomitants of that institutional formalism which, in my judgment, so hinders our military development.

It was to correct such errors that the entire force of this office, including able and distinguished lawyers recently coming to us from civil life, devoted itself to a thorough study and consideration, extending over a period of more than three weeks, and reached the conclusion that the statute clearly confers upon this office revisory power necessary to do justice in such cases. Accordingly, convinced of the legality of that course and apprehending that no just objection could be taken thereto, I set aside the judgment of conviction in this and other pending cases and recommended that orders issue restoring these innocent men to their places in the Army.

Inasmuch, however, as this action was a reversal of an administrative practice in this office which had never before been thoroughly considered or examined, so far as I knew, I sent to the Secretary of War for his personal consideration a copy of the opinion, scarcely doubting that the action taken by me would merit his entire approval as well as that of the Judge Advocate General, so necessary and expedient was the authority, so clear the law, and so humane and righteous its application.

The Secretary of War having sought his advice, the Judge Advocate General has disagreed with me and finds no such power. Upon his advice, therefore, the judgment of conviction in this case is to stand, though it is proper to add quite a number of other instances in which I likewise set aside erroneous judgments have been, due to administrative methods, approved by the department and action taken accordingly.

Believing that our people who are giving up their sons to the national cause could not be content with, if they were apprised of, a system of military justice that is admittedly without power to correct conceded wrong and injustice to the most sacred rights of man and soldier; conceiving that the question is fundamental and far-reaching in its import; convinced that existing law places us in no such humiliating position, and that the action of the department was wrong beyond all question and can be shown convincingly and almost to the point of demonstration to be so; and mindful that undue deference to past peace-time views and administrative practices will defer the adoption of better methods and prove highly harmful to our new Army, in an earnest desire to be helpful to the extent of my ability and use whatever of strength I have to aid in the establishment of an adequate and efficient administration of military justice, I file, with the permission of the Secretary of War, this brief of my views:

First, as to the action taken in the Mutiny case.

I. The action taken by the Secretary of War on the advice of the Judge Advocate General has been taken under very evident misapprehension. Such action is predicated upon the correctness of conviction; and the acceptance of such an act of grace by these innocent men necessary implies a confession of guilt of a crime which, upon well-established principles of law and justice, they never committed. Justice is a matter of law and not of executive favor.

The Judge Advocate General, advising the Secretary of War, said:

"You are aware, of course, of the power you have by statute law to grant, upon proper application, an honorable restoration to duty to each of the men convicted of mutiny, and I shall shortly prepare an order of this kind and place it before you."

And immediately thereupon the Secretary wrote, adopting the suggested action as follows:

"As a convenient mode of doing justice exists in the instant cases, I shall be glad to act in reliance upon a usual power and leave this larger question for future consideration, informed by the further study which the Judge Advocate General is giving it."

This action can not be "a convenient means of doing justice." The Secretary, for the moment, has failed to distinguish between executive action, in the nature of a partial pardon, and judicial action, which goes to the erroneous judgment of conviction itself and modifies it, reverses it, or sets it aside. The statute under which the proposed action is to be taken is to be found in the statutes relating to the military prison and the prisoners therein, and is as follows:

"SEC. 1352, Revised Statutes. The commandant (that is, of the military prison) shall take note and make record of the good conduct of the convicts, and shall shorten the daily time of hard labor for those who, by their obedience, honesty, industry, or general good conduct, earn such favors; and the Secretary of War is authorized and directed to remit, in part, the sentences of such convicts, and to give them an honorable restoration to duty in case the same is merited."

And the modifying act of March 4, 1915 (38 Stat., 1074), as following:

"Whenever he shall deem such action merited the Secretary of War may remit the unexecuted portions of the sentences of offenders sent to the United States disciplinary barracks for confinement and detention therein, and in addition to such remission may grant those who have not been discharged from the Army an honorable restoration to duty, and may authorize the reenlistment of those who have been discharged or upon their written application to that end, order their restoration to the Army to complete their respective terms of enlistment, and such application and order of restoration shall be effective to revive the enlistment contract for a period equal to the one not served under said contract. (Par. 7, sec. 2.)

And—

"The authority now vested in the Secretary of War to give an honorable restoration to duty, in case the same is merited, to general prisoners confined in the United States disciplinary barracks and its branches shall be extended so that such restoration may be given to general prisoners confined elsewhere, and the Secretary of War, shall be, and he is hereby, authorized to establish a system of parole for prisoners confined in said barracks and its branches, the terms and conditions of such parole to be such as the Secretary of War may prescribe."

The action thus authorized was never intended to apply in cases of an unlawful conviction, and this the terms of the statute clearly indicate. It expressly applies to convicts and general prisoners dishonorably discharged from the service. It was enacted by Congress under its power to make rules and regulations for the government of the Army, and to prescribe the eligibility of those who enter or are in the Army and the conditions under which they serve. Looking at it from the Executive viewpoint, it is but Executive favor. As I pointed out in my former opinion, in cases of such restoration the conviction stands. The restoration itself is predicated upon a lawful conviction and a dishonorable expulsion from the Army in consequence of it. It can be taken only upon the application of him who has been thus expelled. An Executive action partaking of the nature of a pardon is not the proper remedy in a case where a man concededly has been unlawfully convicted if there be other means of doing justice. A pardon does not proceed upon the theory of justice but of mercy. The man who seeks a pardon does so upon an express or implied admission of guilt. The pardon itself conclusively implies guilt. A pardon is no remedy for wrong done the innocent.

Speaking to the present cases, these noncommissioned officers, soldiers of excellent record, were, when judged by universally recognized legal principles, erroneously unjustly condemned; they stand convicted of an offense than which none, in a soldier, can be more heinous. Restoration to the Army does not change the judgment of conviction. Restored to the Army they ought to be; not, however, as an act of grace and mercy, but as an act of right and justice. Such a restoration is but an attempt to forgive these men for an offense which none of them ever committed; and, notwithstanding such restoration, the record against them is made, and there it stands. They have been expelled from the Army; unless the judgment be reversed, they have been out of the Army since the day the sentence was executed. All rights and honors incident to their service they have lost—their records as soldiers largely ruined. In such a case the right thing to do is to set aside the conviction; to reverse the judgment of the court; to declare that these men had never been lawfully convicted; and that they have never been lawfully out of the service—a service which they had never dishonored. The power to do the right thing is, to my mind, unmistakably found in the section to be discussed. I hope and request that final action differing from that here prayed will not be taken until after this brief shall have been given the consideration which the subject of which it treats well merits.

The Secretary then continued to express the following general view with respect to the power to be deduced out of this statute:

"Ordinarily, however, the extraction of new and large grants of power by reinterpreting familiar statutes, with settled and practical construction, is unwise. A frank appeal to the legislature for added power is wiser."

I think it will be shown by this brief that the well-established general principle here enunciated has no proper application to the action taken by me under this statute. It can have no application where the statute never has been interpreted by the courts; where the practical construction is not settled, but palpably inconsistent and confused; where there is such overwhelming necessity for an exercise of the jurisdiction. That these things are so can be shown quite convincingly.

II. It is as regrettable as it is obvious that those who oppose my views do not vision in the administration of military justice what the new Army of America will require, nor do they even see what the present is revealing; they are looking backward, and taking counsel of a reactionary past whose guidance will prove harmful, if not fatal.

(1) The views of the Assistant Chief of Staff and the Inspector General savor of professional absolutism.

The opposing arguments follow administrative practice blindly and, for the most part, are but mere professional absolutisms developed under the conditions obtaining in our country since the broadening activities of the Civil War period passed away. I poignantly regret the concurrence of the Judge Advocate General, who habitually and constitutionally entertains far more progressive views. The reasoning that comes from the office of the Chief of Staff and Inspector General is but the apprehension of those who are counseled by their fears and who mistrust all that disturbs an absolute order of things. Opposition of that kind has manifested itself against every suggestion of progress throughout the development of institutions. Such argument proceeding on narrow military principle is adduced to the support of power, rather than to the human individual rights offended by an abuse of it. In its essentials it is this: The battery commander was a commissioned officer with the power of discipline over his battery; he exercises his power under an amenability to his superiors in the hierarchy, and they all, tacitly at least, approved of what he did; military justice was appealed to to vindicate his power through a court composed of excellent officers of experience and rank, and the court did vindicate him; all these officials were wise, experienced, and just, and therefore their judgment must not be impeached. The whole structure of government recognizes the fallibility of human administration and endeavors to minimize its evil effect by placing upon it the check to be found in the thoughtful and well-considered review of those who have been trained to the detection of these fallacies. It is only the mind of the extreme professionalist that fails to see that a man's judgment may be impeached without reflecting upon his integrity. In this case the gross misconduct of this commanding officer is conceded, and yet it is said these these men, subjects of his misconduct, must have their cases determined without reference to his oppressive and tyrannous action. The legal mind, trained to a consideration of the elements of every offense, and appreciating that mutiny must consist of an opposition to lawful authority with an intent to subvert it, could not have failed to perceive that this was not a case of opposition at all in the sense that makes mutiny, nor was there any evidence of the necessary intention to overcome and depose constituted authority. My own sense of right and justice and discipline would have impelled me to court-martial not the men but the officer himself, and I still think that that should be done. The human error that marked this case, judged according to established principles known to every lawyer, has marked, and is daily marking, others.

Army officers, acting on a mistaken sense of loyalty and zeal, are accustomed to say, somewhat invidiously, that "courts-martial are the fairest courts in the world." The public has never shared that view. In any event, it is difficult to maintain that the judgment of this, the crudest of all courts, exercising such an extent of jurisdiction, is entitled to greater deference than those of the civil tribunals, the review of which, to insure correction, is fundamental in our law. So much as there is of summaries in courts-martial procedure is solely attributable to military necessities. But this Government should never take the life of any soldier or apply to him extreme penalties without the certainty of the correctness of judgment. If the judgment be sound and the punishment certain, nothing more should be demanded. This case in itself is of comparative little importance, but the questions raised and to be determined by it are fundamental in the administration of military justice.

(2) The opposing legal views are anachronistic. They are given a backward slant through undue deference to the theory of an illustrious text writer as to the nature of courts-martial, a theory which civil jurisprudence has never adopted, but distinctly denied.

The Judge Advocate General deduces out of the power of revision which belongs to his office no substantial meaning whatever. Obviously he is led to this restrictive, indeed extinguishing, interpretation because of his fear of obtruding judicial functions within a field of authority that, in his judgment, properly belongs to the power of command. He would prefer to believe that such revisory power does not exist; otherwise this office must sit in revision upon the judgments of convening and reviewing authorities based upon their power to command on one hand and, in turn, be controlled by the power of command of the Secretary of War and Chief of Staff upon the other. In my judgment, it is too clear for argument that, courts-martial having once been brought into being, their proceedings and judgments when properly completed, and all that is incident thereto, are not bases upon, but indeed are independent of, the power of command as such. Winthrop thought otherwise, and he has been followed blindly ever since by the War Department, though more recent decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States have exposed the fallacy of his views.

(a) Winthrop's theory was wrong in reason.

Winthrop, in a double-leaded heading in his work on Military Law, says that a court-martial is "not a part of the judiciary, but an agency of the executive department." This is the beginning and the cause of the difficulty. The only authority he quotes in connection with the assertion is a statement from Clode to the effect that in the British Army the power of courts-martial comes from the Crown, where, of course, differing from here, the King in theory is the fountain of justice. His text continues:

"Not belonging to the judicial branch of the Government, it follows that courts-martial must pertain to the executive department; and they are in fact simply instrumentalities of the Executive power provided by Congress for the President, as Commander in Chief, to aid him in properly commanding the Army and Navy and enforcing discipline therein, and utilized under his orders or those of his authorized military representatives."

The non sequitur here is absolute and obvious. "Not belonging to the judicial branch of the Government," he says, then courts-martial must necessarily belong to the executive department, are merely instrumentalities of Executive power and utilized under his orders. Since the days of Winthrop this has been the height of orthodoxy; and we have all been steeped in the teachings that follow upon that illogical and fallacious syllogism.

It is rather surprising that an unsupported text-book statement, sustained by so little logic, should have gone so long unexamined by those in military authority, even if judicial decisions had not exposed the fallacy. To be sure, courts-martial are not part of the judicial system referred to as such in the Constitution, but this does not place them under the Executive power. They are courts all the same, with their bases deep down in the Constitution. The courts of the several Territories have never been courts of the United States in the constitutional sense, nor have they ever had any other constitutional basis than the power of Congress to make rules for the Government and disposition of the Territory of the United States.

But who would contend that they are under the Executive power? The courts, both Federal and local, of Porto Rico and Hawaii and the courts of Alaska and the Philippines, indeed the courts of the District of Columbia, the United States Courts of Customs Appeals, and the Court of Claims, are not constitutional courts of the United States in the strict sense, inasmuch as in them is deposited no part of the judicial power as defined in the Constitution; they constitute the courts, however, provided for by Congress under other grants of power. But no lawyer would contend for that reason that such courts are subject to Executive power.

(b) Winthrop's theory was wrong on principle and precedent.

Courts-martial as a means of military adjudication long antedated the Constitution. They are recognized in the fifth amendment in the exception there made as to cases arising in the land and naval forces, and elsewhere in the Constitution. As they exist to-day in our land and as they have ever existed here they have been creatures of legislative enactment under the power of Congress to make rules and regulations for the government of the Army and Navy. The king as a fountain of justice, military and otherwise, finds no counterpart here in our Chief Executive except to the extent that supreme powers are conferred upon him by the Constitution. Here the fountain of justice, indeed all prerogative of sovereignty, is in the people, except where conferred by them on their representatives. Except for the pardon power, Congress here is rather the fountain of military justice. Courts-martial are authorized by Congress. The powers that bring them into being are designated and authorized thereto by Congress. The offenses which they may try and the law which they apply are prescribed and enacted by Congress. Their procedure is regulated under the law of Congress. Their sentences and judgments must be in accordance with the law of Congress. All this has been said too frequently by the Supreme Court of the United States to be doubted. They are then tribunals created by Congress, administering the law of Congress and responsible to that law alone. It is established by an unbroken line of decisions of the Supreme Court that a court-martial is the creature of Congress, and as a tribunal it must be convened and constituted in entire conformity with the provisions of the statutes or else it is without jurisdiction. (Dynes v. Hoover, 20 How. 82; Keys v. United States, 109 U. S. 340; McClaghry v. Deming, 186 U. S. 62.)

(3) The teachings which followed upon the premise that courts-martial are executive agencies have all been disproved by the Supreme Court of the United States, though this department still clings to them.

Those teachings were:

(a) That courts-martial were not courts at all in any proper sense of the term;

(b) That therefore they tried an act in its military aspects alone and not the full resultant crime recognized as such by general public law;

(c) That therefore judgments of courts-martial could not be pleaded by a soldier in bar of trial by a Federal court; and

(d) Being executive agencies they are subject to the power of command.

Those teachings are all wrong, and the sooner we abandon them the better.

(a) Courts-martial are courts created by Congress, sanctioned by the Constitution, and their judgments are entitled to respect as such. (Runkle v. United States, 122 U. S. 542, 555; McCloughry v. Deming, 186 U. S. 49, 68; Ex parte Reed, 100 U. S. 13, 21; Swaim v. United States, 165 U. S. 558; Keyes v. United States, 109 U. S. 336, 340; Grafton v. United States, 206 U. S. 333, 348; Smith v. Whitney, 116 U. S. 167, 178.)

(b) Courts-martial do not try simply for the crime in its military aspects, but for the full and complete offense as recognized by the law of the land. (Ex parte Mason, 105 U. S. 696; Carter v. Roberts, 177 U. S. 496; Carter v. McCloughry, 163 U. S. 365; Grafton v. United States, 333, 348.)

(c) The judgment of a court-martial being a complete adjudication by a competent tribunal of the offense as known to the law of the land is a bar against a second trial in any court of the United States. (Grafton v. United States, 206 U. S., 333, 348.)

These cases prove conclusively that a court-martial is a judicial tribunal of vast powers, whose jurisdiction extends to all who may belong to or are retained in our forces, affecting the life and liberty at the present time of millions; and that this jurisdiction extends to all conduct of such persons, without distinction between civil and military aspects. This office and the Army prior to the Grafton case had regarded it as settled law and justice and sternly opposed the contrary view that a soldier, though tried and punished by courts-martial, could again be tried and punished by Federal civil courts without infringing his constitutional rights and its rights to justice.

(d) The functions of courts-martial are inherently and exclusively judicial and therefore are not subject to the power of command as such, but only to judicial supervision established by Congress.

It has been said that the President has the power to establish a system of courts-martial, and that in deference to that power, therefore, courts-martial are subject to his control. This I deny. I do not say that if the Constitution had not spoken the power and necessity of the Commander in Chief to maintain discipline in the Army would have been sufficient to authorize some system of military adjudication, and it may be that if Congress had not spoken under its power to make rules of government for the Army the President could have filled the void. But when Congress does speak out of its power the President may not speak within the same field. He may not array himself in opposition to the legislative rules governing the administration of military justice. Congress has designated what commanders subordinate to the President may convene courts-martial, and the President can not say otherwise. Congress has said what law they shall apply, and the President may not prescribe another. Congress has regulated the punishment, and the President can not prescribe different penalties. The most that can be said is, inasmuch as Congress has not endeavored to deprive, even if it could deprive, the Commander in Chief of his power as a convening authority, the President may himself still convene a court-martial, and his name may, therefore, be added to that list of convening authorities designated by Congress. But that power is limited to him; he may convene courts-martial, but when convened they will be subject to all the law of Congress; he can not, by reason of that power, control courts-martial convened by others.

As was said in a report by the Judiciary Committee of the Senate, quoted with approval by the Supreme Court in Swain v. United States (165 U. S. 558), with respect to the acts of Congress authorizing the constitution of general courts-martial by officers subordinate to the President, such acts are not restrictive of the power of the Commander in Chief, but—

“ * * * Merely provide for the constitution of general courts-martial by officers subordinate to the Commander in Chief, and who without such legislation would not possess that power, and that they do not in any manner control or restrain the Commander in Chief from exercising the power which the committee think in the absence of legislation expressly prohibitive resides in him from the very nature of his office, and which, as has been stated, has always been exercised.”

His power of control over the judgments of courts-martial not convened by him comes itself from Congress, and on principle he can add nothing to it.

It is fallacious reasoning to say that Congress, under its power to make rules and regulations for the government of the Army, may not confer any authority upon a subordinate official without conferring it upon the President as Commander in Chief, especially when the power conferred is inherently judicial. Such an argument was advanced by the Court of Claims, but it is to be observed that the Supreme Court did not adopt that view. On the other hand, it quoted with approval the report of the Senate Judiciary Committee, which was to the effect (1) that the subordinate authorities would not have had such judicial power without the authority of Congress, and (2) that the President did not have the power to convene a court in the absence of legislation to the contrary.

(e) Court-martial procedure being judicial from the beginning to the end (Runkle's Case, 122 U. S. 588, and all subsequent cases cited) the power of revision, if it exists, is also judicial and therefore not subject to the power of command.

It is a maxim of the law that judicial power can not be restrained; which means to say, it can be controlled by no power except by superior judicial authority drawing its power from the same source. This source of the judicial power of courts-martial is Congress; and only by Congress alone, or by some authority appointed by Congress, can a court-martial be controlled. A supervisory judicial authority Congress conferred upon the Judge Advocate General by the section discussed. The fact that the Judge Advocate General is in a military hierarchy and in an executive department does not subject his judicial or quasi judicial functions to the power of command. It is established by the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States that an officer of an executive department charged by Congress with judicial or quasi judicial duty is not subject in the performance of such duty to any executive authority. Thus, the decisions of the Commissioner of Patents stand as the final judgment of the executive departments beyond the control of the Secretary of the Interior. (Butterworth v. United States, 112 U. S. 50.)

The supervision which a superior in an executive department may have over an officer in the same department who performs judicial or quasi judicial functions is on principle limited to administrative and executive functions, and does not relate to the quasi judicial. It may be that the legal relation between the head of the department and the officer performing judicial functions is such as to make the decisions of the latter subject to the former's judicial review, but certainly not to the review of another and nonjudicial bureau of the same department.

(f) Such judicial revision is not subject, therefore, to the usual General Staff supervision.

The practice which obtains in the General Staff of passing upon the opinions of this office in such matters of pure law, is obviously, as hurtful to proper administration as it is inconsistent with legal principles. From the common sense point of view alone, how futile it is to direct the attention of the General Staff, military experts presumably knowing nothing of technical law, to the control and supervision of the judicial functioning of the Judge Advocate General who presumably is thoroughly skilled in matters of law and trained to judicial functions. I can conceive a large field in the realm of military conduct and policy—not of detailed administration—in which, as I see it, the General Staff was created to function and in which good results will be achieved only when they are thus confined and devoted to larger tasks. I address myself to a situation and not to sporadic instances of such administrations. Considerable time of that great body and also of this office is consumed in conferences and discussions required by reason of such assumed power of supervision of the decisions of the office in matters of technical law and judicial duty. I can recall distinctly my inability to get a General Staff officer to grasp the usual technical significance and the propriety of applying the legal principles usually expressed in damnum absque injuria; res inter alios acta: generalia specialibus non derogant, and like technical concepts. I can recall a recent instance of a plain case of a lack of jurisdiction in which the Chief of Staff personally functioned for a considerable part of three days in an endeavor to make up his mind whether the error was jurisdictional, rendering the judgment null and void, or was an error of law, simply requiring a reversal in my judgment. No war of any consequence can properly be conducted with such General Staff administration.

III. The whole argument on the other side is found in the contention that the word "revise" has no substantial meaning, but has reference only to clerical corrections.

One single fact exposes the utter fallacy of that contention, and had it been considered must have prevented an expression of that view.

The fact is this: The word "revise" is an organic word, which solely creates and defines the duties of an entire bureau. Congress went to the great length of creating an independent bureau in the War Department for the sole and declared purpose of having it "revise" the proceedings of all military courts, and made that duty of revision the sole duty of that bureau.

It is true that the word "revise," as descriptive of the duty of the Judge Advocate General, is found associated in the Revised Statutes with other words that are not of an organic nature. But in construing the Revised Statutes, if there be doubt enough to justify construction, as there is not in this case, the antecedent legislation may and should be examined; and when examined it can be seen that there can be no application of the doctrine of noscitur a sociis here; indeed, because of the established meaning of the word "revise," there could have been no application of the doctrine under any circumstances.

The act of July 17, 1862 (12 Stat., 598), was an act establishing anew the office of the Judge Advocate General, and no functions were established for that office other than that enjoining that—

"To his office shall be returned for revision all record and proceedings of all courts-martial and military commissions, and where a record shall be kept of all proceedings had thereupon."

The declared purpose of having the records returned to this office was that the Judge Advocate General should revise them and make a record of his proceedings in revision.

Again, the act of 1864 (13 Stat., 145) created a separate bureau of the War Department for this special purpose in the following language:

"SEC. 5. There shall be attached to and made a part of the War Department during the continuance of the present rebellion a bureau, to be known as the Bureau of Military Justice, to which shall be returned for revision the records and proceedings of all courts-martial, courts of inquiry, and military commissions of the armies of the United States, and in which a record shall be kept of all proceedings had thereupon."

And in the following section, descriptive of the duties of the Judge Advocate General, the statute uses the words, "He shall receive, revise, and have recorded all proceedings of courts-martial," etc. These words describe his duties, but the extent of revision is, of course, to be found in the fact that it was the sole and single purpose of the creation of the bureau. The duties established for that bureau in its origin are still included within those of the office of the Judge Advocate General. Is it not opposed to common sense and reason to say that the Congress of the United States went to the great length of creating a separate bureau of this War Department for no purpose at all, or, at most, in order that some inconsequential clerical change might be made upon the record?

It is to be observed that the unreported decision in the Masons case, a case which I have been familiar with since 1902, and which for the moment and perhaps because of its utter lack of authority I had forgot, holds that upon the doctrine of noscitur a sociis the word "revise" imports but clerical duties.

All that that judge said was said without evidence of any study of the statute and without reference to antecedent legislation; and furthermore, it was the most patent dictum.

But there is another reason why the word "review" can not be applied to any substantial clerical change in the record. The record is made by the court; it can not be changed except by the court. The record can not be made elsewhere. There is, then, no field for any clerical revision.

To be guided by this line of argument would be to hold that Congress created an entire bureau whose sole duty should be to dot the "i's" that had not been dotted and cross the "t's" that had not been crossed and correct errors of spelling and perhaps of grammar, and to substitute one's personal view of correct punctuation for that which the court reporter had adopted. In other words, Congress went to the ridiculous length of establishing a bureau of the War Department where sole objection was to correct the clerical inaccuracies of a court reporter.

But Winthrop accepted this dictum without examination, and we are engaged to-day in nodding acquiescence to a proposition which, had it come less well sponsored, would have been greeted with impatience.

IV. "Revise," in its every sense—ordinary, legal, and technical military sense—means to correct, to alter, and amend.

The Judge Advocate General's brief, though concurring in the argument that the word "revise" represents purely clerical duties, does in a rather incidental and delicate way suggest that the word "revise" as here used may mean a review for the purpose of correction. If that were the acceptable view of the statute, then Congress must have contemplated that the power of correction existed somewhere. But he does not follow that definition up or rely upon it to locate the power of revision. The Judge Advocate General, so far as I can find, has no real authority for any such definition. His own illustrations fail completely. If a proof reader revises a copy, he himself changes it so as to make it conform to some standard. The committee who report a proposed revision of the law to Congress do not revise the law; Congress does it. Those were the practical examples the Judge Advocate General chose to rely upon.

(a) The ordinary meaning of the word "revise" is not to review for the purpose of corrections, but to perform the act of correction. Look up the word in the ordinary dictionary; look around your library at the "revised editions"; look at the "Revised Statutes" or "Revised Codes," and no doubt whatever can be entertained of its meaning. It is an active, decisive power that results in a change in modifications of the proceedings revised. Ordinarily, "revise" is a broader word than "review," especially so in the literary sense; and the two may be distinguished in that the former is active and decisive, the latter passive, informatory, and advisory. In a legal sense, "revise," while less commonly used in Anglo-American law than "review" as establishing supervising or appellate power, seems to be synonymous with it.

(b) In its legal sense the meaning of the word, as evidenced by a multitude of examples of its use, is unmistakable; and if the single example heretofore given of its significance when used in statutes were "persuasive" at all, those to be given now should prove absolutely convincing.

The Judge Advocate General says that such examination as he has been able to make of legislative precedents "fails to disclose a single instance in which the power to modify or reverse the judgments of inferior courts is deduced from the word 'revise' without the addition of apt words specifically conferring the power to reverse or modify." And then, after referring to the use of the word in the bankruptcy statute cited by me, he said:

"This legislative precedent as judicially applied would, if it were properly and accurately set forth in the brief, be most persuasive."

My reference and reliance upon the word "revise" as used in the bankruptcy statute was quite justified as showing that the word "revise" as there used means exactly what is here contended for—changing the proceedings of the civil inferior courts of bankruptcy so that they shall conform to law. And the appellate power thereinbefore conferred in the statute was not what challenged the attention of the court as a measure of their power over inferior proceedings, but it was the word "revise."

But I submit the following, which ought to be conclusive:

(a) The word "revise" is the sole word used in the constitution of Oregon to confer full appellate jurisdiction upon the supreme court of that State, and that court has given the word a fulsome meaning, even in the fact of legislation evidently designed to limit it.

(b) The word "review" is used by the constitution of North Carolina as the sole word for conferring full appellate power upon the supreme court of that State.

(c) The word "review" is used by the constitution of New York to confer full appellate power upon the Court of Appeals of that State.

(d) Randolph's plan for the Supreme Court of the United States was contained in the following resolution:

"Resolved, That the Executive and a convenient number of the national judiciary ought to compose a council of revision, with authority to examine every act of the National Legislature before it shall operate." (Madison's Journal of Federal Convention, p. 62.)

(e) Section 24 of the constitution of Illinois, 1818, provided "that the general assembly may authorize judgments of inferior courts to be removed for revision, directly to the supreme court." This language is peculiarly similar to the language here discussed and none other was needed to confer appellate power upon the supreme court of that State.

(f) "Revise" has a meaning here contended for in constitution of California (Art. X, 1849, 1879), constitution of Alabama (sec. 3, 1819, and Art. IX, 1865), constitution of Florida (Art. XIV, 1838 and 1865).

(g) The Court of Customs Appeals has final appellate jurisdiction over decisions of the Board of General Appraisers, all of which is deducible out of the word "review." (Judicial Code, sec. 195.) The word as there used includes the usual appellate powers, including the reversal of the Board of General Appraisers when the court is satisfied that the findings is wholly without evidence or clearly contrary to the weight of evidence. (See United States v. Riebe, 1 Customs App. 19; Holbrook v. United States, 1 Customs App. 263; Carson v. United States, 2 Customs App. 105; In re Gerdau, 54 Fed. 143.)

(h) The decisions of the Comptroller of the Treasury over settlement of accounts by the decisions of auditors is described by the statute (act of July 31, 1894, 28 Stat., 207), as "a revision" and his decisions are referred to as "decisions upon such revision."

(i) Section 271, Revised Statutes, defining the power of the First Comptroller, provides as follows:

"The First Comptroller, in every case where, in his opinion, further delays would be injurious to the United States, shall direct the First and Fifth Auditors of the Treasury forthwith to audit and settle any particular account which such officers may be authorized to audit and to report such settlement for revision and final decision by the First Comptroller."

(j) Section 482, Revised Statutes, defined the powers and duties of examiners in chief in the Patent Office and provided as follows:

"The examiners in chief shall be persons of competent legal knowledge and scientific ability, whose duty it shall be, on the written petition of the appellant to revise and determine upon the validity of the adverse decisions of examiners upon applications for patents, and for reissue of patents, and in interference cases; and, when required by the commissioner, they shall hear and report upon claims for extensions, and perform such other like duties as he may assign them."

(k) Section 4914, Revised States, defining the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia, provides:

"The court, on petition, shall hear and determine such appeal, and revise the decision appealed from in a summary way on the evidence produced before the commissioner, at such early and convenient time as the court may appoint; and the revision shall be confined to the points set forth in the reasons of appeal. * * *

(l) "Review" is the sole appellate word used in section 330 of the Code of Arizona establishing jurisdiction upon the supreme court of that State.

(m) "Review" is used also to confer appellate jurisdiction upon the supreme court in section 4824, Code of Idaho.

(n) "Review" is thus used in section 7096, Code of Montana.

(o) "Review" is so used in section 654, Code of Utah.

(p) In State v. Towery (39 So. 309, Ala.), the question was as to the meaning of the word "revision" as used in a clause of the constitution requiring the legislature periodically to make provision for the revision of the statutes. The court there construes the word in the usual sense of review, alter, or amend, and said with reference to the meaning of the word, "Such changes as are admissible are within the purview of the section."

(q) In State v. King County (37 Pac. 489, 491, Wash.), the court deduced its authority to review by way of certiorari an inferior court's decision out of the word "revisory." Even the dissenting justice in that case admitted that the word "revision" included the power here contended for, but held that in this case it had reference only to those judgments which were already within the jurisdiction of the court by virtue of some other appellate power.

(r) The word is, apparently, habitually used as defining the power of courts over municipal corporations, taxation boards, and insolvency proceedings. (34 Cyc. 1723; and the word is used, in that publication, as indicating a revisory power over criminal sentences. 12 Cyc. 783.)

(s) The supreme court frequently alludes to its power "to revise judgments" of inferior courts. (See, e. g., the Dred Scott decision, 19 Horn 452, 453.)

Of course, the fact that appellate power is frequently conferred with great particularity in such terms as "revise, reverse, remand, alter, amend, and set aside" places no logical or legal restriction upon the word "revise," certainly not when it is used alone.

Eleven of the State constitutions confer full appellate power in one or two words, using none of those enumerated.

The term "revise," and "revision of proceedings" having this general significance, has been known to military law and procedure from time immemorial.

It was known to the early mutiny acts prescribing that no proceedings should be returned to be revised by the court more than twice.

In Tytler's Military Law (1806, p. 173) it is said, with reference to British military law that the King has no power of revision, but that that function belongs to the courts of justice. He further says:

"All, therefore, that it is competent for his majesty to do, if the sentence of a court-martial shall not meet with his approbation, is to order the court to review their proceedings, and even this power, as above stated, is limited, for the mutiny act declares 'That no sentence given by any court-martial and signed by the president thereof shall be liable to be revised more than once.'"

It is to be observed that even in English law the power of revision of courts martial proceedings and sentences is clearly distinguished from the Crown's power of pardon.

"Revision of proceedings" and "proceedings in revision" are terms well known to the Anglo-American military law with reference to the power of courts to reconsider and correct their own proceedings, judgments, and sentences.

In 6 Opinions of the Attorney General (203), Attorney General Cushing discussed this power of revision with great thoroughness, saying in that connection:

"It is laid down as a thing not open to controversy in all the books of military law that the superior authority may order a court-martial to reassemble to revise its proceedings and its sentence;"

citing for that authority Hough on Courts-martial (p. 29), McArthur on Courts-martial (p. 136), Griffith's Notes (p. 90), Kennedy on Courts-martial (p. 229, 290), Anon., Observations on Courts-martial (p. 38-65), Tytler's Military Law (p. 170-338), James's Collection (p. 556), Simmons's Practice (p. 339), De Hart on Courts-Martial (p. 203), O'Brien's Military Laws (chap. 23).

This procedure, with the word "revise" as descriptive of it, is an established part of our own military procedure, which occurs in daily practice, is treated of in all texts and is recognized by that name by all our courts.

See Macomb (1809), Duane's Military Dictionary (1810), Scott's Military Dictionary (1864), Benet's Military Law under "revision"; also all military texts.

V. The word "revised" as a matter of fact is in no sense ambiguous, and there is no room for construing it. It would have made no difference, therefore, what the administrative practice was or is. The quality of law is not impaired by non-use. As a matter of fact, Judge Holt did, in form at least, pronounce sentences invalid and did not content himself simply with recommending that pronouncement was by superior authority. His views as to the validity of proceedings were expressed in terms that savor of judicial pronouncement, and the orders of the War Department so far as examined seem to respect that quality by confirmance.

The meaning of the word is not fairly questionable. Furthermore, Senators in debate referred to the power conferred as that of a court of review. Congress seems to have had no doubt about it. In such a case, practice can not govern.

In writing the opinion I went through the record books of a part of 1863, and my notes of that search reveal that Judge Holt's reviews very frequently terminated with a declaration which, by its form and tenor, indicated, so far as his office was concerned, judicial finality. It was common to conclude with the statements: "Therefore the sentence is inoperative," "Therefore this fatal defect must prevent a confirmation of the record," "The sentence is fatally defective," "For error of law committed by the reviewing authority the sentence is inoperative, notwithstanding the confirmation of Maj. Gen. Hooker," "The sentence as it stands is inoperative," "The sentence is invalid and should not be enforced," "The sentence rested upon such a record should not be carried into execution," and such like expressions.

"Sentence is therefore inoperative" occurs 8 times; record is fatally defective and sentence should not, or can not, or must not, be enforced, or carried into execution, or confirmed, 16 times. The record shows that, in the administration of those days, the Judge Advocate General was regarded both by the President and the Secretary of War as the law adviser upon matters of military administration and justice, and at least no power of command stood between him and those supreme authorities. It also shows that the Judge Advocate General very frequently, indeed, one might say, habitually, returned the record direct to the reviewing authorities with instructions as to errors of law and pointing out the necessity for correction where correction could be made in order that the sentence be held operative. That the examination, if not revision, of the records might be the more expeditiously made an Assistant Judge Advocate General, representing preliminarily the Judge Advocate General, and his power, and not connected with any commander's staff, was stationed in a central situation with duty, as to proceedings, "to call for such as are not forwarded in due season, to examine them, to return for correction such as are incomplete, and to give immediate notice of fatal defects to the proper commanders, that sentence may not be illegally executed." (G. O. 230, A. G. O., Aug. 16, 1864.)

VI. The judge advocate general of England certainly did have this power of revision. (I am not advised of his present authority.)

Clode (1869), volume 2, pages 359, 364, 360. While his letters patent do not clearly define his duties, it was prescribed therein:

"He exercises the powers of a supreme court of review, as regards the proceedings of all district, garrison, and general courts-martial, whatsoever and whensoever."

The following is quoted from Jones's Military Law (1882, p. 94):

"The Judge Advocate General and his deputy are always civilian lawyers, while the deputy judge advocates, who in England attend at B. C. M., are always military men.

"The judge advocate general's department forms a final court of appeals and has the power of upsetting or "quashing," as it is called, all proceedings of courts-martial and it therefore takes no part in the actual preparation, conduct, or management of prosecutions.

"The judge advocate general is a member of the privy council. He is generally chosen from among barristers who are members of Parliament, and they stand or fall with the government to which they are attached.

"All the proceedings of general courts-martial which at home must be confirmed by the sovereign are sent to the judge advocate general, and the sovereign confirms on his responsibility as a minister of the crown, and acts on his recommendation.

"The judge advocate general is responsible to Parliament, hence a prisoner, if wronged can appeal at law against him, for 'the sovereign can do no wrong.'

"The duties of the judge advocate general are confined to the examination of the proceedings as to their legality, whether the sentences are within statute laws, etc. The expediency of carrying out the sentences, or as to remission, etc., is not his province, the C. in C. advises the crown on these points." (Pp. 94-95.)

It must be remembered, too, that the civil courts of England exercise a far larger power over the judgments of courts-martial than do our own.

VII. Whence comes the established power to declare proceedings null and void for jurisdictional error? And why should not the larger power include the lesser radical one of correction of legal error?

Nobody essays an answer. Doubtless, a reviewing authority, by statute, may "disapprove" a sentence because it is null and void, or because it is bad for prejudicial error of law; and I think that frequently it is said in our texts and in our practice that a sentence is "invalid" though not for jurisdictional error. The larger power, in practice, is exercised here in the department. It is extremely difficult for me to comprehend any reason that concedes to this department the larger power but denies to it the lesser one.

VIII. The necessity, in the name of justice, of locating this power in this department and preferably in this office, where logically and I think legally it belongs, must be apparent to all who are familiar with the administration of military justice.

In the first half of November, while I was in charge of the office, I set aside the judgments and sentences in the cases of 19 enlisted men, because of prejudicial other than jurisdictional error invalidating the judgment. The number in which on established principles such reviewing power should be invoked should be expected largely to increase.

Courts-martial are courts dealing with the right of life and liberty of all who are subject to their jurisdiction, a number already beyond a million, doubtless soon to pass into many millions of our citizens. They are courts of law administering the law of this land, in accordance with the law of the land, for a great national purpose. Their judgments are judgments of law. Can it be said that their judgments are beyond all legal inquiry; that though they may be arrived at in contravention of all law, if the court according to the usual narrow jurisdictional tests had jurisdiction, the judgment, though concededly wrong for error of law, is beyond all correction?

There is to-day as never before an urgent, impelling necessity for such revisory power; if not here, then elsewhere. It will not do to say that such errors of law, affecting the proceedings to the great prejudice of the accused and rendering the judgment bad because thereof, are rare and for that reason may be ignored. That doubtless was the reason why the power was permitted to remain not fully used or to drop into desuetude. But this day finds the Army increased tenfold. A few more months hence it will have been increased twentyfold, and obviously a year hence the Army of the United States must necessarily, if we are to take the part in this war that this Nation purposes to take, consist of 3,000,000 of men. The officers of that Army must necessarily be largely untrained officers, conscious, of course, of their great power, required necessarily to exercise it, and exercising it necessarily without the most enlightened judgment or consideration. It will consist of men just come from the shops, the factories, and the farms, unused to Army life with its peculiar customs and its rigorous duties, willing but uninformed. With such elements errors upon the part of the officer on the one hand exercising disciplinary authority, and on the part of the enlisted man on the other subjected to such authority, must be exceedingly numerous, and resort to the disciplinary actions through the agencies of the court-martial frequent. The triers of the case will be officers of the same class and so frequently will be the reviewing and approving authorities. Opportunity for resort to court-martial and opportunity for error in the courts-martial proceedings themselves will be largely multiplied over those that obtain in normal peace conditions. There is chance for grave error in the most enlightened legal system, but still greater chance in a legal system which necessarily must be administered by men uninformed in the law, and an immeasurably greater chance in the case of such an Army as ours must necessarily be. I must assume that no man with the interest of the Army and the country at heart and with the ordinary conception of the necessity of maintaining justice in our institutions could doubt the advisability and the necessity of establishing here or elsewhere such revisory power.

I have no shame in confessing that I feel strongly about this, and not in any contentious way. I am not impelled to file this brief because the Judge Advocate General of the Army disagrees with me, nor the Chief of Staff, nor other authority. I am entirely out of the field of contention. I feel strongly about it as a matter between a man and his fellow men, between an officer and the men whom he should protect, between a man and the Army in which he serves, between a soldier and his nation. What happened to these men can happen to me. A soldier has nothing but his service. He is honored by his professional reputation or dishonored by the lack of it. Society has established certain rules which are its law, and by which human conduct is tested. All lawyers at least understand the methods of applying those tests. If the test be not applied in accordance with the law, there has been no test. It is not sufficient to say that a system of administration of criminal justice may not be a fair and just system, though it provide for an appeal, though the fact remains that no enlightened system has ever permitted a judgment to remain as final when reached in contravention of the rules of law. The question here is whether or not, when, according to the well-understood principles of law and justice, a judgment is concededly and palpably wrong, it must remain and persist as the law of the land in condemnation of an individual while it is concededly wrong. It seems to me that a soldier, before suffering the extreme penalty of death or other serious punishment, should, on principle, be entitled to have the proceedings of his trial examined, not solely by the commander convening the court in the field, but by a separate and independent authority, who, skilled in the law, properly circumstanced, can, with the necessary deliberation and considerate-ness, pronounce the trial free from prejudicial error. Even in the absence of statute it would be the duty of the department to endeavor to discover or provide a means whereby such a wrong could be righted. In the case that it could invoke a doubtful statute, it would be the duty of the department on all principle to resolve the doubt in favor of its jurisdiction to apply such remedy. Surely there can be no excuse for the department's not taking the remedial action which the statute clearly authorizes, indeed I think requires it to take.

Conclusion.—This revisory power should exist; and I doubt not that when exercised with judicial wisdom and discretion, as it must be if it is a judicial power at all, under proper rules and regulations, it will prove a great help, and never a hindrance, to safe and sound administration, and place military justice upon a plane that will cause it to merit and receive, more than it ever has heretofore received, the approval of the American people. I earnestly ask that this matter may be conceived to be, as doubtless it is, one of prime and fundamental importance to our Army. It is a matter affecting the relation of the Nation to its soldiery; it is a matter at the very base of military justice as an institution; it is a matter affecting justice under the law to the individual soldier. Justice under law is as necessary to the American Army as it is to any other American institution.

EXHIBIT 39.

WAR DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE JUDGE ADVOCATE GENERAL,
Washington, December 22, 1917.

Memorandum for the Judge Advocate General.

Subject: Certain administrative measures affecting justice and discipline in the Army.

1. It is my judgment that you should give immediate consideration to the following matters:

(a) Regardless of your views or mine upon the question of the revisory power of this office, orderly administration as well as justice requires that sentences of death and sentences resulting, if executed, in immediate expulsion from the Army should not be executed until the proceedings may be reviewed for prejudicial error by an officer of and representing this bureau, and not of the administrative staff and representing the officer ordering the court and his power. In order that there might be no delay in such review of proceedings, reviewing authorities should be instructed to forward to the reviewing officer of this bureau all proceedings without a moment of delay.

(b) The above consideration would require the establishment in France of such a reviewing officer with duties as indicated. This administrative method would involve nothing of inhibited delegation of power. Assuming, as I have held, that the revisory power is in the Judge Advocate General of the Army, it is not necessary as a matter of law, as, indeed, it is not practicable as a matter of fact, that that officer function personally in each case. The function is a function of office; the statute originally establishing the Bureau of Military Justice clearly so indicated, provided for assistants, and empowered them, in effect, to perform the duty under the general supervision, of course, of the head of the office.

2. Another important matter is to be found in the most expeditious and at the same time lawful and just method of ridding the Army of inefficient officers. Among the large number of officers in our Army, considering the methods of selection and the inadequate knowledge of them upon the part of the appointing authority, must be many who ought to be eliminated, and the sooner and with the least disturbance to normal functioning the better. The number of cases involving the trial of officers is very large already and is rapidly increasing. In the great majority of cases the sentence awarded on conviction is limited to dismissal from the service. In view of the great time necessarily consumed in court-martial trial, the preparation for trial, serious question whether an officer shall be tried by court-martial when it is reasonably evident from all the circumstances that the judicial method will result only in a separation of the officer from the Army. My own view is that the summary Executive power of removal ought to be applied in such cases, and I think consideration should be given now to establishing the respective executive and military judicial domains in such matters. Our commanding generals ought to be advised of the extent of jurisdiction which the Executive is to assume, in order that they may determine whether it is preferable to bring an officer to court-martial or submit the case for Executive action.

3. Another matter: You mentioned yesterday the question of promotion of officers below general rank in the additional forces. This office has given some consideration to that question, but apparently it was upon an informal submission, or it may be upon no submission at all. We did conclude, however, that the President might institute a system whereby he might exercise his power through selections made by subordinate commanders in accordance with the method by him established, and that resultant appointments would be beyond judicial inquiry or just criticism. It is my judgment that it would be highly injurious to the Army, large as it is and operating as it is, to hold that the Executive function must be exercised in each individual case by the Chief Executive in person. As Government grows, constitutional functions can not be thus personally exercised. Law must conform to such evident necessities.

4. There are other matters of policy that I shall take up with you whenever I shall have had time to formulate them.

WAR DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE JUDGE ADVOCATE GENERAL,
Washington, January 9, 1918.

Memorandum for Gen. Crowder.

Subject: Revision of court-martial proceedings.

1. I have just been advised of the step taken by the Secretary of War to prevent the execution of possibly illegal death sentences in the United States by requiring that the record be transmitted to the department and reviewed here, that its legal correctness may be assured before execution. While a step in the right direction, I deem it my duty to say that in my judgment it falls short of the requisite degree of remediality in that it is not applicable generally, nor to all those sentences which, unless stayed, mean separation of a man from the Army and placing him, in a practical sense, beyond the reach of remedial power subsequently exerted.

2. I see no reason why the same measures of relief should not be extended to dismissal and dishonorable discharge; nor do I see any reason why it should not be made applicable to our forces in France, as well as elsewhere; all of which could, with the establishment of a proper and practical system of revision, be done without evil administrative result and to the advantage of law and justice.

3. This would require the establishment in France of an office representing the functions of the Judge Advocate General, the duties of which would be practically those defined in General Order No. 230, July 16, 1864, establishing such reviewing office in Louisville. For your information, I quote that order:

"I. Col. William M. Dunn, Assistant Judge Advocate General, will take post at Louisville, Ky., at which place the office of Assistant Judge Advocate General is hereby established.

"All records or courts-martial and military commissions, which are required by regulations to be forwarded to the Judge Advocate General, will be sent, by officers ordering such courts of commissions, within the Military Departments of the Ohio, the Tennessee, the Cumberland, the Missouri, Arkansas, and Kansas, to the Assistant Judge Advocate General, at Louisville.

"With reference to records of courts and commissions, it will be the duty of the Assistant Judge Advocate General to call for such as are not forwarded in due season, to examine them, to return for correction such as are incomplete, and to give immediate notice of fatal defects to the proper commander that sentences may not be illegally executed. He will forward all complete records to the Judge Advocate General, but will not be expected to prepare reports on them unless specially instructed to that effect by the Judge Advocate General.

"II. The Assistant Judge Advocate General will be allowed the number of rooms as office and fuel therefor assigned to an Assistant Quartermaster General in paragraph 1068, General Regulations.

"By order of the Secretary of War:

"E. D. TOWNSEND,
"Assistant Adjutant General."

Such an office, located conveniently to our general headquarters could give that thorough, disinterested, and judicial review of such sentences necessary to assure their correctness without considerable or injurious delay.

4. The review of all cases, including those which carry sentences separating a man entirely from the service, should be expeditious—not so much that punishment shall be swift as that injustice be not suffered. The power of revision should not be limited to approval or disapproval, but should include all powers possessed by reviewing authorities. When I wrote the original opinion upon the subject I had several of the assistants suggest regulations to govern the exercise of such power, and it was then generally agreed that—

“1. The power of revision shall not include the power to deal with the case before the officer appointing the tribunal has finally dealt with it nor the power to admit new evidence or otherwise retry the facts.

“2. It shall be confined to a review of errors of law injuriously affecting the substantial rights of the accused, and as thus confined and for the limited purpose of correcting such errors of law it shall include—

“(a) The power to declare a proceeding, finding, or sentence void for want of jurisdiction.

“(b) To disapprove a finding and to approve only so much of a finding of guilty of a particular offense as involves a finding of guilty of a lesser included offense when the evidence of record requires a finding of only the lesser degree of guilt.

“(c) To disapprove the whole or any part of any sentence.

“(d) Such other revisory power, not exceeding the general scope and purpose herein prescribed, as may be found necessary for the correction of such errors.

“3. In a case in which such power is inadequate for the correction of such errors the power shall include the right to return the record to the proper authority that the tribunal may make the necessary revision, or to transmit it to the Secretary of War with a recommendation for a proper exercise of the pardoning power.”

5. I think no doubt need be entertained but that such a system of revision would be workable, nor is it of more than academic interest to determine whether the power finds its source in the inherent relation of the President to the Army, or in the statutory donation of article 38, or in the revisory functions of the Judge Advocate General established by section 1199, Revised Statutes, though, of course, I think it is clearly established in the latter section and not otherwise.

S. T. ANSELL.

EXHIBIT 41.

JANUARY 10, 1918.

Memorandum for the Secretary of War:

1. In your memorandum of December 28, 1917, relating generally to the power of revision of sentences of courts-martial, you state, after outlining to some extent your own views:

“I would be glad to have your views upon the two questions suggested here: (1) With regard to the coexistence of the power of summary execution with the power of revision in 1862 and 1864; and (2) the sort of appellate procedure involved in the power to revise, according to the views accepted by Gen. Ansell and his associates.”

2. Your first suggestion may be answered briefly with the statement that at the date of the enactment of the act of July 7, 1862, and of the similar act of 1864—the acts which are the antecedents of what is now section 1199 of the Revised Statutes—the Articles of War, in so far as they relate to the power of reviewing authorities to confirm and execute sentences of general courts-martial, were the same as now. The Articles of War recently adopted made no change in this particular.

3. With reference to your second suggestion, it is my belief—in which I have no doubt Gen. Ansell fully shares—that there is no necessity whatever for an appellate review with authority to direct a trial de novo. The real need of revisory action is limited to a class of cases in which the action of the court and the reviewing authority has become final before the error or defect in the proceedings of the court has been discovered, and it is then too late to do full justice to the accused—ordinarily because of the finality of his separation from the service. It is obvious that any remedy afforded by a pardon, mitigation, restoration to service, or authorization for reenlistment is not sufficient to reach a case where the accused has been illegally tried or erroneously convicted; and it is further obvious that the real problem before the department is to apply corrective action before it is too late.

There are three classes of cases in which this revisory action is necessary, namely: Cases involving a sentence of death, dismissal of an officer, or dishonorable discharge of an enlisted man. The number of cases in which such action will be found necessary will be a very small percentage of the aggregate tried, probably less than 5 per cent. The question to be disposed of resolves itself, therefore, into one of preventing sentences of death, dismissal of an officer, or dishonorable discharge of an enlisted man, from being executed before final review of the record of trial in this office. The scope of the difficulty is very much reduced by the fact that, in the great majority of cases where dishonorable discharge is a part of the sentence, the execution of the dishonorable discharge is suspended by the reviewing authority until the soldier is released from confinement under the authority contained in the fifty-second article of war. Where this is done the correction of injustice is easy of accomplishment.

I have reached the conclusion that the problem may be easily solved by establishing rules of procedure which may be prescribed under the authority of existing legislation. The President, as Commander in Chief, has a certain power of control, through the establishment of rules of procedure, which may be deduced from the whole body of the Articles of War, but which is specifically stated in article 38, which is as follows:

"The President may by regulations, which he may modify from time to time, prescribe the procedure, including modes of proof, in cases before courts-martial, courts of inquiry, military commissions, and other military tribunals: Provided, That nothing contrary to or inconsistent with these articles shall be so prescribed: Provided further, That all rules made in pursuance of this article shall be laid before the Congress annually."

Rules of procedure comprise pleading, evidence, and practice. They are such rules as control and direct the whole conduct of a judicial proceeding, from its inception up to and including trial and judgment. This is settled by many decisions of the courts. Under this authority to prescribe rules of procedure the action of reviewing authorities can be so controlled that, while we will not detract in any manner from the independence or finality of their action, we will suspend the execution of sentences in certain cases until the records of trial in those cases have been reviewed and the legality of the findings and sentences determined.

I recommend, therefore, that the rule of procedure heretofore authorized by you, and which has been published to the service, be revoked, and the following substituted therefor:

(1) Whenever, in time of war, the commanding general of a territorial department or a territorial division confirms a sentence of death, or one of dismissal of an officer, he will enter in the record of trial his action thereon, but will not direct the execution of the sentence. His action will conclude with a recital that the execution of the sentence will be directed in orders after the record of trial has been reviewed in the office of the Judge Advocate General, or a branch thereof, and its legality there determined, and that jurisdiction is retained to take any additional or corrective action, prior to or at the time of the publication of the general court-martial order in the case, that may be found necessary. Nothing contained in this rule is intended to apply to any action which a reviewing authority may desire to take under the fifty-first article of war.

(2) Whenever, in time of peace or war, any officer having authority to review a trial by general court-martial, approves a sentence imposed by such court which includes dishonorable discharge, and such officer does not intend to suspend such dishonorable discharge until the soldier's release from confinement, as provided in the fifty-second article of war, the said officer will enter in the record of trial his action thereon, but will not direct the execution of the sentence. His action will conclude with the recital specified in rule 1. This rule will not apply to a commanding general in the field except as provided in rule 5.

(3) When a record of trial in a case covered by rules 1 or 2 is reviewed in the office of the Judge Advocate General, or any branch thereof, and is found to be legally sufficient to sustain the findings and sentence of the court, the reviewing authority will be so informed by letter, if the usual time of mail delivery between the two points does not exceed six days, otherwise by telegram or cable, and the reviewing authority will then complete the case by publishing his orders thereon and directing the execution of the sentence. If it is found, upon review, that the record is not sufficient to sustain the findings and sentence of the court, the record of trial will be returned to the reviewing authority with a clear statement of the error, omission or defect which has been found. If such error, omission or defect admits of correction, the reviewing authority will be advised to reconvene the court for such correction; otherwise, he will be advised of the action proper for him to take by way of approval or disapproval of the findings or sentence of the court, remission of the sentence in whole or in part, retrial of the case, or such other action as may be appropriate in the premises.

(4) Any delay in the execution of any sentence by reason of the procedure prescribed in rules 1, 2, or 3 will be credited upon any term of confinement or imprisonment imposed. The general court-martial order directing the execution of the sentence will recite that the sentence of confinement or imprisonment will commence to run from a specified date, which date, in any given case, will be the date of original action by the reviewing authority.

(5) The procedure prescribed in rules 1 and 2 shall apply to any commanding general in the field whenever the Secretary of War shall so decide and shall direct such commanding general to send records of courts-martial involving the class of cases and the character of punishment covered by the said rules either to the Office of the Judge Advocate General, at Washington, D. C., or to any branch thereof which the Secretary of War may establish, for final review before the sentence shall be finally executed.

(6) Whenever, in the judgment of the Secretary of War, the expeditious review of trials by general courts-martial occurring in certain commands requires the establishment of a branch of the Judge Advocate General's Office at some convenient point near the said commands, he may establish such branch office and direct the sending of general court-martial records thereto. Such branch office, when so established, shall be wholly detached from the command of any commanding general in the field, or of any territorial, department, or division commander, and shall be responsible for the performance of its duties directly to the Judge Advocate General.

It may be argued that the procedure here proposed will be more cumbersome than that at present in force, and will result in unnecessary delays in the execution of sentences. It is obvious, however, that such a contention is without real merit. But few officers or soldiers are sentenced to death; but few officers, considered in the aggregate, are sentenced to dismissal; and, in a majority of cases at the present time where a soldier is sentenced to dishonorable discharge the execution thereof is suspended by the reviewing authority under the fifty-second article of war. There may be cases where the execution of a sentence of death should be prompt, but there will be no case outside of the actual field of military operations where a prompt execution of a sentence is so imperative that time can not be taken for a careful review of the case in the Office of the Judge Advocate General; and in the case of a death sentence in the zone of actual military operations a branch of the Judge Advocate General's Office could review the case with such expedition that execution of the sentence need not be deferred more than a week at most. In cases where the death penalty is to be imposed the certainty that the proposed action is both just and legal, which will be assured by the existence of these rules, will more than compensate for the brief delay involved. In cases sent to this office for review, it is not anticipated that the delay in execution of a sentence involving dishonorable discharge need exceed 60 days from points outside the continental limits of the United States, and need not exceed 30 days from any point within such limits. Ordinarily it will be much less; and the establishment of a branch of this office in France would result in the expeditious review of all cases originating there. Cases are now reviewed promptly in this office, and it is expected that the office force will be increased as necessary so as not to permit this very important work to lag behind during the continuance of the war. The delay which would result in cases of enlisted men sentenced to dishonorable discharge is not important, because a sentence of dishonorable discharge is usually accompanied by a sentence of forfeiture of pay and allowances due or to become due. The Government will thus be protected from loss, while the man will be protected from injustice by the rule which provides that the time so lost in obtaining a final review of the case shall be credited upon his term of confinement.

What is believed to be a particular merit of the plan here proposed is to be found in the fact that when a record is discovered to be insufficient, or to be tinged with such error or illegality that the finding and sentence of the court can not in justice be allowed to stand, these rules make it possible for corrective action to be taken by the reviewing authority when the errors are called to his attention. It can not be doubted that this officer is the one contemplated by the Articles of War as the proper officer to take the corrective action which the record of trial may disclose as necessary. A precedent for the procedure involved in obtaining a review of the case by the Judge Advocate General before the reviewing authority finally disposes of the case, is found in the rule which has been in operation for some time to the effect that reviewing authorities shall not send men to a penitentiary for confinement until this office has reviewed the records of trial and determined that penitentiary confinement is legal. Moreover, I have no doubt that the establishment of these rules will result in greater care being exercised in the disposition of cases by reviewing authorities and their judge advocates, and thus the existence of this revisory system will tend to prevent the occurrence of the errors it is designed to correct.

Finally, I may state that the revisory action which the Judge Advocate General would take under these rules of procedure would give full force and effect to the donation of power contained in section 1199 of the Revised Statutes, without detracting from the authority conferred by any of the Articles of War upon any other officer; and would assure, the need of which was suggested by you at the conclusion of your memorandum, the establishment of "such processes as will throw around every man in the Army, whether private or officer, the surest safeguards and protection which can be devised against either error of law, or passion, or mistake of judgment at the hands of those who try him for offenses involving either his property, his honor, or his life."

WAR DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE JUDGE ADVOCATE GENERAL.
Washington, January 12, 1918.

Memorandum for Gen. Crowder:

1. You want my views upon Maj. Davis's proposed rule of procedure.

(a) It is, if legally correct, a step—though a weak and uncertain step—in the right direction, in that it gives large partial recognition to the existence of a power somewhere which will prove helpful and salutary.

(b) It is faulty as a definition of revisory power in that it regards that power as having application only to that very limited number of cases in which sentences should be stayed.

(c) Above all, however, it is, I regret to say, fundamentally wrong as a matter of law. The theory is for the reviewing authority to approve the judgment but suspend its execution until he can be advised of the correctness of the judgment itself, and if advised of its incorrectness then to revise it himself. Having once approved the judgment, it passes beyond his power to amend, and such power of amendment, if it exists, must be found elsewhere. On the other hand, if the stay of execution affects the judgment itself and makes it conditional, or holds it in gremio legis, as it were, awaiting further action by the reviewing authority, then it is not final and can not be revised here at all. If the reviewing authority does not take final action, there is nothing for this department to revise. If he does take final action, then the judgment passes beyond his power to revise. Take those sentences revised in this office in due course and without stay, which will constitute the great majority of cases: In such cases the action of the reviewing authority is unquestionably final, and if there is to be revision of the judgment at all it concededly must be done by some authority other than the reviewing authority. In such cases surely the department would have to exercise the power. Viewed from whatever angle, it is perfectly apparent that the source of the authority is in this department and must be exercised by this department, if exercised at all. No system can be devised whereby the convening authority revises his own judgment at the mere suggestion of this department.

(d) The rule, even if it were unquestioned as a matter of law, is contrary to all administrative principle. The corrections to be made are corrections of errors of law discovered upon review here. What reason can there be to require this office to review for errors of law, and then be denied the power of correction? In any system of law jurisdictions must be defined. Powers must be located, and they must be powers, not requests. If left undefined, or resting upon mere comity, the system is not likely to stand. The test would come sooner or later, after perhaps a multitude of disagreements. It adds to the administrative burden and the time required to finalize a judgment.

2. I wish I could give concurrence to something which, though less than the full power, would be satisfactory to you and the Secretary of War, and would serve, at the same time, as a partial remedy. I can not. I may be permitted to say, however, that the limitations which the rule seeks to place upon the exercise of revisory power doubtless have their origin in a fear of the consequence of a full exercise of that power. Not sharing that fear, I can not sympathize with the limitation. Even if I could agree, as I can not, that such a limitation has a basis in law, the power, if it exists at all, should be exercised in full. Otherwise it should be entirely denied. Safety lies in taking one course or the other, and not in a compromise.

3. I have given this question of revisory power the best that is in me. I see no reason whatever to hesitate at the adoption of that definition of revisory jurisdiction which is found in my recent memorandum and which was adopted after most thorough consideration upon the part of many of the assistants of this office as to what the law requires. I do not believe, as much as I should like to believe, that what Maj. Davis proposed is sound in law or will prove safe in practice. I regret, therefore, that I can not advise you to adopt it.

Memorandum for the Secretary of War:

The attached papers will claim your special consideration. They are responsive to your direction of December 28 in respect of the power of revision of court-martial proceedings by the appellate procedure suggested for your consideration by Gen. Ansell.

I think the new rule of procedure issued under new article 38 will enable us to act remedially on the class of cases as to which you share with this office the view that revisory action is necessary. It could be made immediately available by your approval of these regulations; but in order that there may be no delay in the theater of war it will be necessary for you to issue the general order which you will find attached to this memorandum and which follows a Civil War precedent in establishing a branch office of the Judge Advocate General at Gen. Pershing's headquarters.

Please consider in connection with this matter a proposed amendment of section 1199, Revised Statutes, vesting in the President of the United States the revisory power which Gen. Ansell was inclined to find already vested in the Judge Advocate General by said section of the Revised Statutes. If you approve of this draft I would request to have it brought to the attention of the chairman of the two military committees, with a request for its enactment.

From: The Office of the Judge Advocate General.

To: The Adjutant General of the Army.

Subject: General order establishing rules of procedure for courts-martial and a branch of the office of Judge Advocate General in France.

1. I transmit herewith a draft of a general order relating to the above subject, which should be published as promptly as possible, and approximately in the form indicated. The substance of this order has received the personal consideration and approval of the Secretary of War, who has directed that the same be put in course of promulgation as promptly as possible. To the end that the contents of this order may be communicated to all officers competent to convene general courts-martial before the date set for the order to take effect, I suggest that action be expedited, and that the order be transmitted by telegram or cable where this may be necessary. The order itself indicates that it is to become effective on February 1, 1918.

General Orders, No. 7.

WAR DEPARTMENT.

Washington, January , 1918.

I. General Orders, No. 169, War Department, Washington, December 29, 1917, are hereby revoked, and the following rules of procedure prescribed by the President are substituted therefor. This order will be effective from and after February 1, 1918:

(1) Whenever, in time of war, the commanding general of a territorial department or a territorial division confirms a sentence of death, or one of dismissal of an officer, he will enter in the record of trial his action thereon, but will not direct the execution of the sentence. His action will conclude with a recital that the execution of the sentence will be directed in orders after the record of trial has been reviewed in the office of the Judge Advocate General, or a branch thereof, and its legality there determined, and that jurisdiction is retained to take any additional or corrective action, prior to or at the time of the publication of the general court-martial order in the case, that may be found necessary. Nothing contained in this rule is intended to apply to any action which a reviewing authority may desire to take under the fifty-first article of war.

(2) Whenever, in time of peace or war, any officer having authority to review a trial by general court-martial, approves a sentence imposed by such court which includes dishonorable discharge, and such officer does not intend to suspend such dishonorable discharge until the soldier's release from confinement, as provided in the fifty-second article of war, the said officer will enter in the record of trial his action thereon, but will not direct the execution of the sentence. His action will conclude with the recital specified in rule 1. This rule will not apply to a commanding general in the field, except as provided in rule 5.

(3) When a record of trial in a case covered by rules 1 or 2 is reviewed in the office of the Judge Advocate General, or any branch thereof, and is found to be legally sufficient to sustain the findings and sentence of the court, the reviewing authority will be so informed by letter, if the usual time of mail delivery between the two points does not exceed six days, otherwise by telegram or cable, and the reviewing authority will then complete the case by publishing his orders thereon and directing the execution of the sentence. If it is found, upon review, that the record is not sufficient to sustain the findings and sentence of the court, the record of trial will be returned to the reviewing authority with a clear statement of the error, omission, or defect which has been found. If such error, omission, or defect admits of correction, the reviewing authority will be advised to reconvene the court for such correction; otherwise, he will be advised of the action proper for him to take by way of approval or disapproval of the findings or sentence of the court, remission of the sentence in whole or in part, retrial of the case, or such other action as may be appropriate in the premises.

(4) Any delay in the execution of any sentence by reason of the procedure prescribed in rules 1, 2, or 3 will be credited upon any term of confinement or imprisonment imposed. The general court-martial order directing the execution of the sentence will recite that the sentence of confinement or imprisonment will commence to run from a specified date, which date, in any given case, will be the date of original action by the reviewing authority.

(5) The procedure prescribed in rules 1 and 2 shall apply to any commanding general in the field whenever the Secretary of War shall so decide and shall direct such commanding general to send records of courts-martial involving the class of cases and the character of punishment covered by the said rules, either to the office of the Judge Advocate General at Washington, D. C., or to any branch thereof which the Secretary of War may establish, for final review, before the sentence shall be finally executed.

(6) Whenever, in the judgment of the Secretary of War, the expeditious review of trials by general courts-martial occurring in certain commands requires the establishment of a branch of the Judge Advocate General's office at some convenient point near the said commands, he may establish such branch office and direct the sending of general court-martial records thereto. Such branch office when so established shall be wholly detached from the command of any commanding general in the field, or of any territorial, department, or division commander, and shall be responsible for the performance of its duties to the Judge Advocate General.

II. There is hereby established, in aid of the revisory power conferred on the Judge Advocate General of the Army by section 1199, Revised Statutes, a branch of the office of the Judge Advocate General at Paris, France, or at some other point convenient to the headquarters of the American Expeditionary Forces in France, to be selected by the officer detailed as the head of such branch office, after conference with the commanding general of the American Expeditionary Forces in France. The officer so detailed shall be the Acting Judge Advocate General of the American Expeditionary Forces in Europe, and shall report to and be controlled in the performance of his duties by the Judge Advocate General of the Army.

The records of all general courts-martial in which is imposed a sentence of death, dismissal, or dishonorable discharge, and of all military commissions originating in the said Expeditionary Forces will be forwarded to the said branch office for review, and it shall be the duty of the said Acting Judge Advocate General to examine and review such records, to return to the proper commanding officer for correction such as are incomplete, and to report to the proper officer any defect or irregularity which renders the findings or sentences invalid or void, in whole or in part, to the end that any part thereof so found to be invalid or void shall not be carried into effect. The said Acting Judge Advocate General will forward all records in which action is complete, together with his review thereof and all proceedings thereon, to the Judge Advocate General of the Army for permanent file.

Subject: Detail of an officer of this department to act as the representative of this office in the revision of cases by general courts-martial originating in our Expeditionary Forces in Europe.

1. I am handing you herewith a request for the prompt publication of a general order which has received the personal approval of the Secretary of War, who has directed that it be put in course of promulgation as promptly as possible. This order is to become effective February 1, 1918, and, of course, it will be necessary to transmit it by cable to certain of our more distant court-martial jurisdictions. It will be necessary, I assume, to so transmit it to Gen. Pershing in France, and I should like a special order issued and transmitted by cable to Gen. Pershing at the time of the transmission of the general order referred to, which special order should be phrased substantially as follows:

Until further orders Brig. Gen. Walter A. Hon. GEORGE E. CHAMBERLAIN,

Chairman Senate Committee on Military Affairs,Washington, D. C.

My DEAR SENATOR: I am inclosing herewith a draft of a proposal amendment of section 1199, Revised Statutes, which has my complete approval. I hope that it will likewise meet with the approval of your committee and that an opportunity may be found of securing its early enactment into law.

The general purpose of the proposed legislation is to vest in the President revisory powers in respect to sentences of courts-martial and other military tribunals. It has been the subject of thoughtful consideration by the Judge Advocate General, and in the light of the new conditions which now confront us, it is believed to be both wise and necessary.

The proposed amendment involves three propositions, viz, (a) vesting in the President the power to disapprove, modify, vacate, or set aside either in whole or in part, any finding or sentence, and to direct the execution of such part of any sentence as has not been vacated or set aside; (b) the power to suspend execution of sentences in such classes of cases as he may designate until there has been opportunity to consider and act thereon; and (c) the power to return any trial record to the court through the reviewing authority for reconsideration or correction.

The first proposition finds its analogy in the civil courts, in the appellate power lodged in a supreme court. The second is a related power to suspend execution of a judgment pending appellate review, in order, when deemed advisable, to preserve the status quo. The third is to enlarge the power now exercised by the President so as to embrace cases coming to him for consideration under the provisions of the proposed amendment. At the present time the President exercises the power of returning to the court, through the reviewing authority, the record of any trial which has been forwarded to him for confirmation.

I believe that it would be wise public policy to lodge these powers in the President. He is the Commander in Chief of the Army, the supreme military authority, and bears to the Military Establishment, and to the administration of military justice, a relation analogous to that occupied by the supreme court in the structure of a civil judiciary. Upon him devolves the duty of securing efficiency and maintaining discipline in the military forces, and at the same time so to adjust the operation of the machinery of the military courts that, so far as possible, instances of injustice to the individual soldier will be reduced to a minimum.

The present Articles of War authorize any officer, competent to convene a general court-martial, to approve and carry into execution any sentence affecting an enlisted man, including noncommissioned officers, excepting the death sentence; and in addition, the commanding general of a Territorial department, or Territorial division, or of any army in the field, in time of war, as the present, may approve and carry into execution a sentence of death in certain enumerated cases, or the dismissal of an officer below the grade of brigadier general (articles 46-48). In these cases no confirmation seems to be authorized or contemplated by the President, although the officer approving the sentence may, if he sees fit, suspend execution until the pleasure of the President is known (fifty-first article of war). In these respects the present Articles of War do not differ essentially from the prior compilations of 1806 and 1874, although in 1862, during the Civil War, it was provided by independent legislation that a sentence of death, or of imprisonment in a penitentiary, should not be carried into execution until approved by the President (sec. 5, act of July 17, 1862, 12 Stat., 598). The legislation which is now found in section 1199, Revised Statutes, originated in 1862 and thereafter went through sundry changes without affecting its essential characteristics (sec. 5, act of July 17, 1862, 12 Stat., 598; sec. 5, act of June 20, 1864, 13 Stat., 145). Throughout the whole period that this legislation has been in effect, it has been the practice for the Judge Advocate General of the Army to examine the records of trial by general courts-martial and other military courts primarily with the view of determining whether the proceedings were regular and valid, and to make report thereon through the Secretary of War to the President. During that whole time, it has been the settled construction and practice of the War Department, and its law officers, to regard as final, and beyond appellate or corrective action, the judgments of courts-martial when approved by the reviewing authority, except in cases where the proceedings were coram non judice or for other cause void ab initio. Thus it has been held by the Judge Advocate General in many cases that a sentence pronounced by a court-martial and approved by the proper convening authority, was final and could not be revoked or set aside by the President or by any department of the Government, unless the court was without jurisdiction, or the proceedings were invalid, and that relief could be had only through the exercise of the executive power to pardon.

We are now assembling a large Army. Our young men are being drawn from the homes of the Nation and placed in military service, both in the ranks and as officers. A very large percentage of the officers of the new Army are of necessity drawn from civil life, and it is no reflection upon them to say that they have had little, if any, opportunity to acquaint themselves with the history, usages, or principles of military law, or the practice of military tribunals. In our new Army, more than ever before, it is not at all unlikely that sentences may be imposed by courts-martial and approved by the reviewing authorities which, if carried into execution, will work great injustice to the individual soldier. In practice and under existing legislation the trial records now come to the office of the Judge Advocate General for review. In that office cases may be examined with deliberation far removed from the immediate atmosphere of apparent military exigency. It is the purpose of the proposed legislation, when it appears, after such examination, that the substantial rights of the accused were disregarded upon the trial, or the evidence is insufficient, or an unnecessarily severe sentence has been imposed, or for other cause the sentence should be modified or set aside, to vest in the President clear statutory authority to disapprove, modify, vacate, or set aside any finding or sentence, in whole or in part. In order that he may have an opportunity to exercise this revisory power, it is proposed to give him authority to suspend execution of such sentences until opportunity has been had for review by the Judge Advocate General and a report thereon to him. With this power conferred and this practice established, a person found to have been erroneously convicted, or upon whom too severe a sentence has been imposed, may, in the one case, have his innocence adjudged, and, in the other, the proper sentence imposed, and not, as now, be remitted for relief to the pardoning power of the Executive, which leaves the question of guilt untouched and operates only by way of Executive clemency.

It will be noted that the proposed legislation authorizes the President to designate the classes of cases in which sentence shall be suspended until the case has been reviewed by the Judge Advocate General, and report made to the President. In a great majority of cases tried by court-martial there will be no necessity for the application of the new legislation; for instance, special and summary courts deal with minor military offenses. These courts have but a limited jurisdiction as to the sentences which may be imposed, and as to such sentences it is believed that there is no good reason why final action may not be taken by the officer appointing the court. The classes of cases intended to be reached are those which involve a sentence of death, dishonorable discharge, or dismissal. By leaving to the President the power of designating the classes of cases in which execution of sentence may be suspended, pending his action thereon, the practice to be followed may be adjusted from time to time to meet changing conditions in the military situation.

Under the ninety-sixth article of war, courts-martial are given jurisdiction to try persons subject to military law for "all crimes or offenses not capital." Under this grant of jurisdiction persons in the military service are now frequently tried for the commission of civil crimes, and it is obvious that the trial of these offenses by military courts, unlearned in the law, adds an element of uncertainty as to the legality of the outcome which serves forcibly to emphasize the need of the revisory powers herein suggested for the protection of persons accused of crime and to safeguard the administration of military justice.

When the existing Articles of War were revised in 1916 there was introduced as new matter the thirty-eighth article of war, which authorizes the President to prescribe rules of procedure in cases before courts-martial and other military courts. Under this grant of power the President has promulgated certain rules of procedure suspending the execution of sentences of dishonorable discharge, death, and dismissal until the records of trial in such cases have been reviewed in the office of the Judge Advocate General, but it is clear, for the reasons heretofore pointed out, that the exercise of this power does not meet all the requirements of the situation. In order to place the whole matter where it will be beyond cavil or dispute, and by a clear grant of statutory power to vest in the President an authority which he should, beyond all question, be authorized to exercise, the legislation requested should be enacted into law, since its whole purpose is to protect the rights of men on trial, and to remove the possibility of being compelled to say in any case that an injustice has been done for which the statutes provide no clear or adequate remedy.

I am sure the Judge Advocate General will be glad to appear in person or by representative before your committee, should any further explanation of the proposed legislation be desired.

Very respectfully,

_____
Secretary of War.

PROPOSED AMENDMENT OF SECTION 1190, REVISED STATUTES.

The Judge Advocate General shall receive, revise, and cause to be recorded the proceedings of all courts-martial, courts of inquiry, and military commissions, and report thereon to the President, who shall have power to disapprove, vacate, or set aside any finding, in whole or in part, to modify, vacate, or set aside any sentence, in whole or in part, and to direct the execution of such part only of any sentence as has not been vacated or set aside. The President may suspend the execution of sentence in such classes of cases as may be designated by him until acted upon as herein provided and may return any record through the reviewing authority to the court for reconsideration or correction. In addition to the duties herein enumerated to be performed by the Judge Advocate General, he shall perform such other duties as have been heretofore performed by the Judge Advocate General of the Army.

JANUARY 19, 1918.

Hon. S. HUBERT DENT, JR.,

Chairman House Military Affairs Committee.Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. DENT: I am inclosing herewith a draft of a proposed amendment of section 1199, Revised Statutes, which has my complete approval. I hope that it will likewise meet with the approval of your committee and that an opportunity may be found of securing its early enactment into law.

The general purpose of the proposed legislation is to vest in the President revisory powers in respect to sentences of courts-martial and other military tribunals. It has been the subject of thoughtful consideration by the Judge Advocate General, and in the light of the new conditions which now confront us, it is believed to be both wise and necessary.

The proposed amendment involves three propositions, viz: (a) Vesting in the President the power to disapprove, modify, vacate, or set aside, either in whole or in part, any finding or sentence, and to direct the execution of such part of any sentence as has not been vacated or set aside; (b) the power to suspend execution of sentences in such classes of cases as he may designate until there has been opportunity to consider and act thereon; and (c) the power to return any trial record to the court through the reviewing authority for reconsideration or correction.

The first proposition finds its analogy in the civil court in the appellate power lodged in a supreme court. The second is a related power to suspend execution of a judgment pending appellate review, in order, when deemed advisable, to preserve the status quo. The third is to enlarge the power now exercised by the President so as to embrace cases coming to him for consideration under the provisions of the proposed amendment. At the present time the President exercises the power of returning to the court, through the reviewing authority, the record of any trial which has been forwarded to him for confirmation.

I believe that it would be wise public policy to lodge these powers in the President. He is the Commander in Chief of the Army, the supreme military authority, and bears to the Military Establishment, and to the administration of military justice, a relation analogous to that occupied by the Supreme Court in the structure of a civil judiciary. Upon him devolves the duty of securing efficiency and maintaining discipline in the military forces, and at the same time so to adjust the operation of the machinery of the military courts that, so far as possible, instances of injustice to the individual soldier will be reduced to a minimum.

The present Articles of War authorize any officer, competent to convene a general court-martial, to approve and carry into execution any sentence affecting an enlisted man, including noncommissioned officers, excepting the death sentence; and in addition, the commanding general of a Territorial department, or Territorial division, or of any army in the field, in time of war, as the present, may approve and carry into execution a sentence of death in certain enumerated cases, or the dismissal of any officer below the grade of brigadier general (articles 46-48). In these cases no confirmation seems to be authorized or contemplated by the President, although the officer approving the sentence may, if he sees fit, suspend execution until the pleasure of the President is known (fifty-first article of war). In these respects the present Articles of War do not differ essentially from the prior compilations of 1806 and 1874, although in 1862, during the Civil War, it was provided by independent legislation that a sentence of death, or of imprisonment in a penitentiary, should not be carried into execution until approved by the President (sec. 5, act of July 17, 1862, 12 Stat., 598). The legislation which is now found in section 1199, Revised Statutes, originated in 1862, and thereafter went through sundry changes without affecting its essential characteristics (sec. 5, act of July 17, 1862, 12 Stat., 598; sec. 5, act of June 20, 1864, 13 Stat., 145). Throughout the whole period that this legislation has been in effect, it has been the practice for the Judge Advocate General of the Army to examine the records of trial by general courts-martial and other military courts primarily with the view of determining whether the proceedings were regular and valid, and to make report thereon through the Secretary of War to the President. During that whole time it has been the settled construction and practice of the War Department and its law officers to regard as final, and beyond appellate or corrective action, the judgments of courts-martial when approved by the reviewing authority, except in cases where the proceedings were coram non iudice or for other cause void ab initio. Thus it has been held by the Judge Advocate General in many cases that a sentence pronounced by a court-martial and approved by the proper convening authority was final and could not be revoked or set aside by the President or by any department of the Government, unless the court was without jurisdiction or the proceedings were invalid, and that relief could be had only through the exercise of the Executive power to pardon.

We are now assembling a large Army. Our young men are being drawn from the homes of the Nation and placed in military service, both in the ranks and as officers. A very large percentage of the officers of the new Army are of necessity drawn from civil life, and it is no reflection upon them to say that they have had little, if any, opportunity to acquaint themselves with the history, usages, or principles of military law, or the practice of military tribunals. In our new Army, more than ever before, it is not at all unlikely that sentences may be imposed by courts-martial and approved by the reviewing authorities which, if carried into execution, will work great injustice to the individual soldier. In practice and under existing legislation the trial records now come to the office of the Judge Advocate General for review. In that office cases may be examined with deliberation far removed from the immediate atmosphere of apparent military exigency. It is the purpose of the proposed legislation, when it appears, after such examination, that the substantial rights of the accused were disregarded upon the trial, or the evidence is insufficient, or an unnecessarily severe sentence has been imposed, or for other cause the sentence should be modified or set aside, to vest in the President clear statutory authority to disapprove, modify, vacate, or set aside any finding or sentence, in whole or in part. In order that he may have an opportunity to exercise this revisory power, it is proposed to give him authority to suspend execution of such sentences until opportunity has been had for review by the Judge Advocate General and a report thereon to him. With this power conferred and this practice established, a person found to have been erroneously convicted, or upon whom too severe a sentence has been imposed, may, in the one case, have his innocence adjudged, and in the other the proper sentence imposed, and not, as now, be remitted for relief to the pardoning power of the Executive, which leaves the question of guilt untouched and operates only by way of Executive clemency.

It will be noted that the proposed legislation authorizes the President to designate the classes of cases in which sentence shall be suspended until the case has been reviewed by the Judge Advocate General and report made to the President. In a great majority of cases tried by courts-martial there will be no necessity for the application of the new legislation—for instance, special and summary courts deal with minor military offenses. These courts have but a limited jurisdiction as to the sentences which may be imposed, and as to such sentences it is believed that there is no good reason why final action may not be taken by the officer appointing the court. The classes of cases intended to be reached are those which involve a sentence of death, dishonorable discharge, or dismissal. By leaving to the President the power of designating the classes of cases in which execution of sentence may be suspended, pending his action thereon, the practice to be followed may be adjusted from time to time to meet changing conditions in the military situation.

Under the ninety-sixth article of war courts-martial are given jurisdiction to try persons subject to military law for "all crimes or offenses not capital." Under the grant of jurisdiction persons in the military service are now frequently tried for the commission of civil crimes, and it is obvious that the trial of these offenses by military courts, unlearned in the law, adds an element of uncertainty as to the legality of the outcome which serves forcibly to emphasize the need of the revisory powers herein suggested for the protection of persons accused of crime and to safeguard the administration of military justice.

When the existing Articles of War were revised in 1916 there was introduced as new matter the thirty-eighth article of war, which authorizes the President to prescribe rules of procedure in cases before courts-martial and other military courts. Under this grant of power the President has promulgated certain rules of procedure suspending the execution of sentences of dishonorable discharge, death, and dismissal until the records of trial in such cases have been reviewed in the office of the Judge Advocate General; but it is clear, for the reasons heretofore pointed out, that the exercise of this power does not meet all the requirements of the situation. In order to place the whole matter where it will be beyond cavil or dispute, and by a clear grant of statutory power to vest in the President authority which he should, beyond all question, be authorized to exercise, the legislation requested should be enacted into law, since its whole purpose is to protect the rights of men on trial and to remove the possibility of being compelled to say in any case that an injustice has been done for which the statutes provide no clear or adequate remedy.

I am sure the Judge Advocate General will be glad to appear in person, or by representative, before your committee should any further explanation of the proposed legislation be desired.

Very respectfully,

_____
Secretary of War.

PROPOSED AMENDMENT OF SECTION 1199, REVISED STATUTES.

The Judge Advocate General shall receive, revise, and cause to be recorded the proceedings of all courts-martial, courts of inquiry, and military commissions, and report thereon to the President, who shall have power to disapprove, vacate, or set aside any finding, in whole or in part, to modify, vacate, or set aside any sentence, in whole or in part, and to direct the execution of such part only of any sentence as has not been vacated or set aside. The President may suspend the execution of sentences in such classes of cases as may be designated by him until acted upon as herein provided and may return any record through the reviewing authority to the court for reconsideration or correction. In addition to the duties herein enumerated to be performed by the Judge Advocate General, he shall perform such other duties as have been heretofore performed by the Judge Advocate General of the Army.

DECEMBER 28, 1917.

Memorandum for Maj. Gen. Enoch H. Crowder.

I have read with interest and close attention the vigorous brief of Gen. Ansell on the question as to whether or not appellate power to revise, modify, and affirm findings and sentences of courts-martial is conferred upon the Judge Advocate General of the Army by section 1199 of the Revised Statutes.

It is impossible not to admire the earnestness and eloquence with which Gen. Ansel presents his view. For the most part, however, the argument runs to the necessity of the power rather than to its existence. It may very well be that this power should exist, either in the Judge Advocate General or in the Secretary of War, advised by the Judge Advocate General; but if I were asking Congress at this time to give that power, I should feel the necessity of so limiting the language of the donation as not to paralyze the disciplinary power of the commander in chief of the American Expeditionary Forces, who, it seems to me, is in a situation where grave consequences might be entailed by inconclusive action on his part.

Generally the administration of justice is a compromise between speed and certainty. The close cases and majority-of-one decisions of our supreme courts would justify the belief that if there were other courts more supreme in many of these cases different results might finally be obtained; and yet somewhere there has to be an end to litigation, and to that end, therefore, finality is always a question of judgment, resting in legislative discretion. There is nothing intrinsically abhorrent in the idea of finality in judgments of courts-martial approved by the reviewing authority. Whether or not, however, injustices are likely to arise from such a course which would outweigh in gravity the delays necessary to perfect a complete review on appeal is a question about which differences of opinion may well exist.

These considerations have little to do with the immediate question, which is, whether or not the use of the word "revise" is legally a donation of appellate jurisdiction. Gen. Ansell cites the act of July 17, 1862 (12 Stat. 598, p. 20 Ansell brief), as directing the return of records of courts-martial to the office of the Judge Advocate General for purposes of revision. On page 21 of his brief he cites the act of 1864 (13 Stat., 145) generally to the same effect. It would be interesting to know whether summary execution of judgments of courts-martial was at that time also contained in the laws of war. Obviously, if such summary executions were authorized, the subsequent return of the record for revision could not be held to be for appellate review, since it would be a vain thing to review the record after the execution of judgment.

If the word "revise" is to be held to confer appellate jurisdiction, as distinguished from jurisdiction in error, what provision has been made for a retrial or trial de novo, for the summoning of witnesses, and for doing what justice may require in the case. For instance, a report may come to the Judge Advocate General's Office which contains radical errors of law. Has the Judge Advocate General the right to set aside the proceedings and direct a new trial to be had before the same or a different court, or may he summon the parties before him with the necessary witnesses and become himself a court-martial, or is he remitted to a quashing of the whole proceedings and restoration of the defendants to their original status protected from subsequent prosecution by the bar of former jeopardy? In other words, just what procedure is contemplated in the cases which Gen. Ansell has in mind?

I have not the facts in the mutiny cases in my mind, but as I recall it Gen. Ansell ordered the discharge of those convicted of this mutiny, and I assume he felt himself without power to direct the trial of the officer whose misconduct caused the offense. I presume he felt equally without power to examine into such minor derelictions as may have attended the conduct of the men tried for the mutiny, who, even though they may have been guiltless of mutiny, may yet have been derelict in other ways with regard to that incident which a complete administration of justice could be in a position to take notice of.

I would be glad to have your views upon the two questions suggested here: (1) With regard to the coexistence of the power of summary execution with the power of revision in 1862 and 1864, and (2) the sort of appellate procedure involved in the power to revise, according to the view accepted by Gen. Ansell and his associates.

I am not undertaking to decide this question at this time, but I would be glad to have the further orders to which your memorandum of December 17 refers brought to my attention as early as possible, with your own recommendations as to how far we should go in this matter by Executive order, and to what extent legislative redress should be sought.

I am sure that you and I both sympathize with Gen. Ansell's main purpose, which is to establish such processes as will throw around every man in the Army, whether private or officer, the surest safeguards and protections which can be devised against either error of law or passion or mistake of judgment at the hands of those who try him for offenses involving either his property, his honor, or his life.

Cordially, yours,

NEWTON D. BAKER,
Secretary of War.

General Orders, No. 169.

WAR DEPARTMENT,
Washington, December 29, 1917.

I.—Whenever, in time of war, the commanding general of a territorial department or a territorial division confirms a sentence of death, the execution of such sentence shall be deferred until the record of trial has been reviewed in the office of the Judge Advocate General and the reviewing authority has been informed by the Judge Advocate General that such review has been made and that there is no legal objection to carrying the sentence into execution. The general court-martial order publishing the result of the trial shall recite that the date for the execution of the sentence will be hereafter fixed and published in general orders; and the fixing of the date of execution and the publication thereof shall follow the receipt of advice from the Judge Advocate General that there is no legal objection to the execution of the sentence. This rule of procedure does not relate to such action as a reviewing authority may desire to take under the fifty-first article of war.

[250.47 A. G. O.]

II--1. Whenever an officer of the Regular Army holding an appointment in any other force of the Army of the United States is considered by his division or higher commander as unfit to hold such temporary commission, the division or higher commander will order the officer concerned before a board of officers, to be appointed in the same manner as is provided in section 9, act of Congress approved May 18, 1917 (Bulletin 32, W. D., 1917). Final decision in each such case will be made by the War Department.

2. The board in each case will examine into and report upon the capacity, qualification, conduct, and efficiency of the particular officer ordered before it. In case the required number of officers senior to the officer considered unfit be not available within the division, the division commander will notify the next higher commander, who will order the necessary officers to report to the division commander for this duty. In each case the board will be composed of officers of the regular service and will, as far as practicable, be composed of officers of the arm of the service to which the officer considered unfit belongs. In cases where the approved proceedings of the board of officers find the officer examined unfit in the arm of the service in which he is holding a temporary commission, such officer will be held as unfit for temporary promotion in the Regular Army from the date of the termination of such prior temporary commission in the Army of the United States, and any vacancy to which such officer may become entitled will be filled by the promotion of the appropriate officer junior to the officer found unfit.

Just prior to the expiration of a period of six months from the date of termination of the officer's temporary commission his commanding officer will be directed to report to the War Department whether or not he has demonstrated his fitness for temporary advancement to the next higher grade in the Regular Army.

3. Paragraphs 1 and 2 of this order will not apply to officers serving with the American Expeditionary Forces, the commanding general of which will continue, under the authority heretofore granted him, to discharge, by order of the President, inefficient officers of all branches of the service below the grade of brigadier general, except those holding permanent commissions in the Regular Army or those given temporary promotion in the Regular Army.

[210.2, A. G. O.]

III--General Orders, No. 110, War Department, 1917, are rescinded and the following is substituted therefor:

1. In each National Army camp there shall be established one camp exchange, and additional exchanges will be organized by the camp commander for the organizations pertaining to the camp on the basis generally of one exchange to each regiment, or the approximate equivalent thereof, but where local conditions warrant it the camp commander may determine the number and location of the exchanges in his camp, and will assign to the exchanges organized the organizations which are to participate therein.

2. There shall be in each camp a camp exchange council, consisting of the camp exchange officer and one representative for each exchange, selected by the camp commander from the organizations participating therein. It shall be the duty of the camp exchange council to regulate the general policy and management of the exchanges in the camp.

The camp exchange council shall select from among its members an executive committee of five members, who shall carry out the policy of the camp exchange council, supervise and direct the management of the exchanges by the camp exchange officer, and assure itself by frequent inspections of the efficient and satisfactory conduct of all the exchanges within the camp.

3. In each National Army camp there shall be a camp exchange officer, who shall be attached to the staff of the division commander, and whose duties shall be as follows:

(a) To establish and operate the camp exchange.

(b) To establish and supervise all of the exchanges pertaining to the camp.

(c) To establish and supervise the maintenance in each exchange of a uniform system of accounting which shall conform to the regulations pertaining to that exchange.

(d) To have charge of the purchase of all stock and equipment for all of the exchanges pertaining to the camp, such purchases, other than those required for the initial establishment of the exchanges, to be based on requisitions from each exchange and to be delivered to the exchanges at cost.

(e) Under the specific direction of the executive committee of the camp exchange council, to regulate the prices in all exchanges pertaining to the camp, with a view to establishing and maintaining a uniform price for the same article in all the exchanges.

4. There shall be appointed by the camp commander for each exchange in the camp an exchange officer, selected from an organization participating therein, who shall manage, under the supervision of the camp exchange officer, the exchange to which he pertains.

5. The purchase of initial stock and fixtures will be made on such credit terms and in such quantities as will permit a settlement in full within 60 days, after which each exchange will be conducted on a strictly cash basis.

6. The expenses of the office of the camp exchange officer shall be paid entirely from the receipts of the camp exchange.

7. The net profits of the camp exchange shall be distributed as dividends as follows: To the division headquarters fund, 10 per cent; to each brigade headquarters fund, 2½ per cent; and the remainder of any dividend declared to be distributed pro rata to organizations in the camp on the basis of their authorized strengths.

8. The camp commander shall detail one lieutenant as assistant to the camp exchange officer and such other officers and enlisted men as, in his opinion, are required for duty in the camp exchange.

9. An organization shall share in the profits of no exchange other than the camp exchange and the one in which it is participating. In each exchange dividends will be declared only upon the recommendation of the camp exchange council, approved by the camp commander. The net profits of any one of these exchanges, except the camp exchange, shall be distributed among the different organizations participating therein in proportion to their authorized strengths.

10. An organization ordered away from a camp where it has an interest in an exchange shall be paid for said interest, the value thereof being determined by a board of disinterested parties, one of whom shall be the camp exchange officer. When any body of troops is ordered relieved from duty at a camp, the procedure will depend upon whether or not such body of troops is to be replaced by other troops. If it is, the exchanges will be sold to the relieving troops at prices determined by a board of disinterested officers, one of whom shall be the camp exchange officer, who shall remain in the camp as a member of the staff of the camp commander. If it is intended not to replace the troops ordered away, and the camp is to be abandoned, then it shall be the duty of the camp exchange officer to have the business of the exchanges closed up, to sell the stock and fixtures, and to distribute the proceeds of such sales among the interested organizations.

11. The exchanges authorized in the foregoing shall be conducted in accordance with the Post Exchange Regulations, 1917 (Special Regulations No. 59), except in so far as those regulations conflict with the provisions of this order.

12. Each month the camp commander shall detail for each exchange an officer to audit, on the last day of the month, the accounts of that exchange. In each case the officer detailed shall be selected from an organization participating in the exchange, the accounts of which he is to audit.

WAR DEPARTMENT,
Washington, January 17, 1918.

I. Section I, General Orders, No. 160, War Department, 1917, is rescinded and the following rules of procedure prescribed by the President are substituted therefor. This order will be effective from and after February 1, 1918:

1. Whenever, in time of war, the commanding general of a Territorial department or a Territorial division confirms a sentence of death, or one of dismissal of an officer, he will enter in the record of trial his action thereon, but will not direct the execution of the sentence. His action will conclude with a recital that the execution of the sentence will be directed in orders after the record of trial has been reviewed in the office of the Judge Advocate General, or a branch thereof, and its legality there determined, and that jurisdiction is retained to take any additional or corrective action, prior to or at the time of the publication of the general court-martial order in the case, that may be found necessary. Nothing contained in this rule is intended to apply to any action which a reviewing authority may desire to take under the 51st Article of War.

2. Whenever, in time of peace or war, any officer having authority to review a trial by general court-martial, approves a sentence imposed by such court which includes dishonorable discharge, and such officer does not intend to suspend such dishonorable discharge until the soldier's release from confinement, as provided in the fifty-second article of war, the said officer will enter in the record of trial his action thereon, but will not direct the execution of the sentence. His action will conclude with the recital specified in rule 1. This rule will not apply to a commanding general in the field, except as provided in rule 5.

3. When a record of trial in a case covered by rules 1 or 2 is reviewed in the office of the Judge Advocate General, or any branch thereof, and is found to be legally sufficient to sustain the findings and sentence of the court, the reviewing authority will be so informed by letter, if the usual time of mail delivery between the two points does not exceed six days, otherwise, by telegram or cable, and the reviewing authority will then complete the case by publishing his orders thereon and directing the execution of the sentence. If it is found, upon review, that the record is not sufficient to sustain the findings and sentence of the court, the record of trial will be returned to the reviewing authority with a clear statement of the error, omission, or defect which has been found. If such error, omission, or defect admits of correction, the reviewing authority will be advised to reconvene the court for such correction; otherwise he will be advised of the action proper for him to take by way of approval or disapproval of the findings or sentence of the court, remission of the sentence in whole or in part, retrial of the case, or such other action as may be appropriate in the premises.

4. Any delay in the execution of any sentence by reason of the procedure prescribed in rules 1, 2, or 3 will be credited upon any term of confinement or imprisonment imposed. The general court-martial order directing the execution of the sentence will recite that the sentence of confinement or imprisonment will commence to run from a specified date, which date, in any given case, will be the date of original action by the reviewing authority.

5. The procedure prescribed in rules 1 and 2 shall apply to any commanding general in the field whenever the Secretary of War shall so decide and shall direct such commanding general to send records of courts-martial involving the class of cases and the character of punishment covered by the said rule, either to the office of the Judge Advocate General at Washington, D. C., or to any branch thereof which the Secretary of War may establish, for final review, before the sentence shall be finally executed.

6. Whenever, in the judgment of the Secretary of War, the expeditious review of trials by general courts-martial occurring in certain commands requires the establishment of a branch of the Judge Advocate General's Office at some convenient point near the said commands, he may establish such branch office and direct the sending of general court-martial records thereto. Such branch office, when so established, shall be wholly detached from the command of any commanding general in the field, or of any territorial, department, or division commander, and shall be responsible for the performance of its duties to the Judge Advocate General.

[250.1, A. G. O.]

II. There is hereby established, in aid of the revisory power conferred on the Judge Advocate General of the Army by section 1199, Revised Statutes, a branch of the office of the Judge Advocate General, at Paris, France, or at some other point convenient to the headquarters of the American Expeditionary Forces in France, to be selected by the officer detailed as the head of such branch office, after conference with the commanding general of the American Expeditionary Forces in France. The officer so detailed shall be the Acting Judge Advocate General of the American Expeditionary Forces in Europe, and shall report to and be controlled in the performance of his duties by the Judge Advocate General of the Army.

The records of all general courts-martial in which is imposed a sentence of death, dismissal, or dishonorable discharge and of all military commissions originating in the said expeditionary forces, will be forwarded to the said branch office for review, and it shall be the duty of the said Acting Judge Advocate General to examine and review such records, to return to the proper commanding officer for correction such as are incomplete, and to report to the proper officer any defect or irregularity which renders the findings or sentence invalid or void, in whole or in part, to the end that any such sentence or any part thereof so found to be invalid or void shall not be carried into effect. The said Acting Judge Advocate General will forward all records in which action is complete, together with his review thereof and all proceedings thereon to the Judge Advocate General of the Army for permanent file.

WAR DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE JUDGE ADVOCATE GENERAL,
Washington, November 3, 1917.

Memorandum for Gen. Crowder:

1. I am at times considerably embarrassed, and besides the transaction of public business is, I think, somewhat impeded and confused, by the the fact that it is not known to the service at large that you are not conducting the affairs of this office as well as those of the Provost Marshal General; the public conception being that you are, as you legally are, the head of both offices, as in fact you are not. On innumerable occasions I am sought for conference on matters that pertain to your office, and am not sought in matters which do pertain to this office. I suspect that you have a similar experience.

2. I think this ought to be done: I ought to be designated in orders by the Secretary of War as Acting Judge Advocate General during your practical detachment from this office. This is advisable, first, because it would lead to a better defined administration, as I have just indicated, and secondly, it would be in consonance with the actual situation. In theory of regulations I am here simply because I am the senior officer on duty and not by virtue of any designation. That situation is the one contemplated when the absence of the head of the office is both brief and definite. It contemplates that the head of the office is charged with the full responsibility for its policies and for its general administration. That is not the situation now, nor do I believe it can ever be the situation as long as you perform the duties of Provost Marshal General.

3. Furthermore, I believe that the conception which the service has of your relation to both offices has succeeded in minimizing the importance of each office, and that this has resulted already in considerable disadvantage to yourself, and has resulted in no advantage to me.

4. I submit this letter to you wholly disinterestedly, personally, but with the absolute conviction that the order ought to issue. If the suggestion should be agreeable to you I should ask you to join in the memorandum to the Secretary of War asking its accomplishment. I defer to you in this matter absolutely, as I properly should, but at the same time frankly saying to you that I am entirely assured of the correctness of my views.

NOVEMBER 17, 1917.

MY DEAR GEN. CROWDER: As the time approaches for the reassembling of Congress and the consideration of many actively controverted questions of legal policy affecting the military establishment, I write you this personal note to inquire something of the present character of your burdens as Provost Marshal General.

You will recall that in our discussions on your assumption of that work I had a certain hesitancy which was due to the fact that you would necessarily be withdrawn for a substantial part of your time from the active guidance of the Judge Advocate General's office, where I have learned so confidently to rely upon you; and I then expressed the hope that after the great machine necessary for the mobilization of the selective army had been organized, it would be possible for you gradually to give it less time—to leave it under your supervision still, but demanding less of your actual presence, so that you could with justice to both offices, resume your activity in the Judge Advocate General's Department.

I am writing this note not in any way to question the wisdom of the apportionment of your time which you have so far made. The fine perfections of the results of the administration of the selective-service law could have been attained in no other way than by the sleepless vigilance with which you have applied yourself to it; but I shall be happy, when that work is so far advanced as to be more nearly automatic and to leave you free to return to your task here, and so I am making this inquiry as to your own estimate of the situation.

Cordially, yours,

NEWTON BAKER, Secretary of War.

Gen. E. H. CROWDER,
Provost Marshal General.

EXHIBIT 65.

NOVEMBER 18, 1917.

MY DEAR MR. SECRETARY: I am deeply appreciative of the statements in your personal letter of this date respecting my resumption at an early date of my supervision of the Judge Advocate General's Office and Department.

In response to your request that I fix a date when I could with justice to both offices—the Provost Marshal General's and the Judge Advocate General's—resume my activity of the Judge Advocate General's Department, I have to advise you as follows:

The revised regulations providing for a national classification and governing the second and subsequent draft have been printed and distributed to boards. The organization of the medical and legal advisory boards in the several States is well under way and will be completed at an early date. I may say for your information that State headquarters, district boards, and local boards have been so enthusiastic in their approval of the new scheme and have evinced such a complete understanding of it, that I do not anticipate great administrative difficulty in connection with the future administration of this department.

I feel myself free to advise you that I can resume my active supervision of the work of the Judge Advocate General's Department at once to the extent of giving at least half of my time to that office and continue at the same time an efficient adequate supervision of this office. This is my estimate of the situation.

I thank you for the terms in which you have expressed yourself in your letter of this date.

E. H. CROWDER.

EXHIBIT 66.

OCTOBER 18, 1917.

Memorandum for the Chief of Staff.

(For the personal consideration of Gen. Bliss.)

Subject: Proper punishment during war.

1. I am concerned about the character of punishments that should be awarded to members of the Army in time of war. A great many cases are passing over my desk carrying dishonorable discharge and long terms of confinement. For the year ending July 1, 1917, 4,121 men were dishonorably discharged from the Army, about 75 a week. Now, such discharges are running more than 100 a week. This means, of course, that such men are withdrawn from the service. This is the very thing that ought not to be, because in time of war every man should be made to serve as long as and to the extent that he is capable of serving, and because it furnishes a convenient method of getting out of the Army. As long as a man has within him the elements of service he should be made to serve, and not be permitted to choose or have mere penal servitude instead. It should be remembered that the status of a soldier is a peculiar one, in that it carries with it the power upon the part of the proper authorities to compel the performance of all the obligations of the status. That is, if a man refuses to serve, refuses to obey orders, for instance, to do his duty, the military authorities are not limited simply to court-martialing him and sentencing him to penal servitude. He may be made, by physical force if need be, to perform the duty. For some time, at least, there will be no disposition on the part of the military authorities, except in rare cases, to resort to physical compulsion instead of the usual judicial method, and yet a method of maintaining discipline which results in depriving the service of its man power in time of war is fundamentally defective.

2. There are many men in the disciplinary barracks at Leavenworth, and I am advised that the department contemplates, or did contemplate, at least, the establishment of a disciplinary battalion for each division. In any event, as a result of court-martial punishment, a great number of men will, under the existing system, be withdrawn from actual service. In my judgment, this ought not to be, and the department should now take some means of preventing, or at least controlling, discharges from the service as a result of court-martial punishment.

My own view is that these disciplinary or penal battalions ought to be organized under the control of the division commander, and to these penal battalions military offenders should, except, perhaps, in rare instances, be sentenced to serve, and while therein they should be made to serve not only as soldiers but under such conditions as would involve punishment. By this means the Government would save for itself the service of the soldier and furnish him an opportunity for self-redemption. Doubtless there are rare instances where men must be taken out of the Army entirely and subjected to long-term imprisonment, but I think they must be rare. As I see it, the department has the responsibility of deciding how it can utilize the services of these soldiers and at the same time keep them within a penal condition.

3. Under the existing law the matter of dishonorable discharge is within the hands of the court and the reviewing authority. The reviewing authority may suspend the sentence of dishonorable discharge until the soldier is released from confinement. If it were laid down as the policy of the War Department that the department intended to avail itself of the service of men sentenced to dishonorable discharge, except perhaps in rare instances, that policy could be so imposed upon the several reviewing authorities as to have them suspend all such sentences until the pleasure of the department should be known.

4. I think the policy of the department should be determined now. At the present time men are being dishonorably discharged for offenses which are really trivial. I think you should take immediate action. For the time being further dishonorable discharges could be stayed by a communication to the service generally to the effect that it is the desire of the Secretary of War that the authorities contemplated in the fifty-second article of war to suspend the execution of all sentences of dishonorable discharge until the further pleasure of the Secretary be made known. In the meantime, this office, if advised of your views upon the policy, could formulate the plans accordingly.

S. T. ANSELL,

Acting Judge Advocate General.

EXHIBIT 67.

NOVEMBER 14, 1917.

Memorandum for the Chief of Staff.

Subject: Proper punishment during war.

1. In a memorandum from this office addressed to the Chief of Staff under date of October 18, 1917, on the above subject, attention was invited to the fact that men were being dishonorably discharged from the service at the rate of more than 100 a week. It was there indicated, as the views of this office, that in time of war the punishment of dishonorable discharge should be very sparingly resorted to, and the suggestion was made that any method of maintaining discipline which results in depriving the service of its man power in time of war is fundamentally defective. It was further suggested that a disciplinary battalion should be established under the control of each division commander to which military offenders should, except in rare instances, be sentenced to serve and while therein be made to serve not only as soldiers, but under such conditions as would involve punishment. The idea underlying the suggestion was that any sentence of dishonorable discharge, except in the few cases where the offenders are totally unfit for military service or their retention therein would be harmful, would be suspended or remitted by the reviewing authority for the purpose of holding the men in these disciplinary units and for military service, rather than sending them to the disciplinary barracks or to a branch thereof where they are removed entirely from military service.

2. Unfortunately, the idea sought to be conveyed by this memorandum has been confused with the plan heretofore suggested, by Maj. King, of the Medical Corps, of establishing disciplinary battalions at the various cantonments which would be, in effect, branches of the United States disciplinary barracks, the necessary construction for which has been variously estimated at from $300,000 to $1,000,000. In order to obtain the views of the commanding generals of departments and tactical divisions with reference to the advisability of establishing such disciplinary battalions in the various divisions, The Adjutant General called upon each of them for an opinion. The majority of them expressed themselves as being opposed to the establishment of disciplinary battalions at the present time. The memorandum of this office above referred to, together with all other papers bearing upon this subject, was referred to the War College for study, and a conclusion was reached which has served as a basis for a memorandum from the Acting Chief of Staff to The Adjutant General, in which it is stated that:

"The Secretary of War directs that the papers herewith regarding the above matter (disciplinary battalions for divisional cantonments and camps) be filed without further action."

The said memorandum then recites that the Secretary of War has directed that "confidential instructions be given for the information and guidance of all department, division, and organization commanders, general courts-martial, and judge advocates," calling attention, first, to the fact that a considerable number of general courts-martial are adhering to peace-time standards of punishment and imposing sentence of dishonorable discharge with comparatively short periods of confinement for offenses committed in time of war. Second, that to continue to impose such sentences is objectionable because of the resulting tendency to encourage some men, especially among those drafted into the military service, to commit offenses in order to escape such service. Third, that organization commanders, general courts-martial, judge advocates, and reviewing authorities should give close scrutiny to all cases coming before them with a view of determining whether or not the offense was committed with the object of avoiding war service, the suggestion being made that where this fact appears, the leaning of the courts and reviewing authorities should be toward giving sentences of such severity that any tendency toward this practice will be obviated.

3. This memorandum of confidential instruction does not meet the requirements of the case. Wholly regardless of the advisability of authorizing at this time such construction as may be necessary to take care of prisoners held at division camps, and wholly regardless of whether disciplinary battalions, as that term is generally understood, should be organized at this time, the necessity of discontinuing the practice of dishonorably discharging men for light offenses is clearly manifest and calls for quick action. In a great majority of the cases now arising a dishonorable discharge is not only unnecessary but futile and inappropriate. Men sentenced to be dishonorably discharged, who have within them the elements of service, should still be made to serve, and to accomplish this end the dishonorable discharge should be remitted or suspended in their cases and they should be held for training and service with their divisions. Such sentences as it is necessary to impose upon them can ordinarily be worked out in the commands, and the cases will be few in which it is necessary to remove them from their commands and confine them in a penitentiary or the disciplinary barracks. In this view of the case it matters but little whether disciplinary battalions are organized in the various divisions at this time or not; it matters still less whether or not a uniform plan is adopted in the various divisions to take care of the military offenders therein; but it is urgently necessary that division commanders should be immediately informed—

(a) That the department looks to them for the maintenance of discipline in their organizations;

(b) That it looks to them to discourage the awarding of dishonorable discharge as a punishment, except where the same is accompanied by long periods of confinement, and then only in cases where it is entirely obvious that the man so sentenced has not within him the elements of service, or that his retention in the military service is wholly inadvisable because of criminal or degenerate tendencies;

(c) That it advises the suspension of any sentence of dishonorable discharge awarded by courts-martial appointed by them, except under the circumstances indicated in (b) above; and

(d) That it looks to them to exercise any and all proper means within their power to bring about a condition in their commands under which those who can be properly punished only by confinement in the penitentiary or in the disciplinary barracks be given sentences commensurate with the gravity of the offenses committed by them.

In line with the views herein expressed, it is recommended that the confidential instructions to be given to department, division, and organization commanders and to general courts-martial and judge advocates, as indicated in the memorandum for The Adjutant General from the Acting Chief of Staff, a copy of which is attached thereto, be amended to read as follows:

"The attention of the War Department is forcibly called to the fact that courts-martial throughout the service are adhering, in time of war, to peace-time standards of punishment and are imposing sentences of dishonorable discharge, together with comparatively short periods of confinement, for comparatively trivial offenses. The Judge Advocate General reports that men are now being dishonorably discharged from the service at the rate of more than 100 a week, and an inspection of the record in these cases indicates that a large percentage of these men can without doubt be sufficiently disciplined and punished within their organizations while they are being trained for military service. In these cases dishonorable discharge is not only futile and inappropriate but imposes a loss of man power which should be obviated. It has also come to the attention of the War Department that in some cases, especially among those drafted into the military service, there appears to be a tendency to commit offenses in order to receive a punishment which enables the offender to escape military service, but which in itself is not of sufficient severity to discourage or prevent a commission of the offense.

"Division and other commanders are expected to make themselves strictly responsible for the discipline of their commands and these officers, together with general courts-martial and judge advocates, should give close scrutiny to all cases coming before them with a view of being able to pass intelligently upon them and so to measure the punishment to the offense that the following conditions will obtain.

"(a) No sentence of dishonorable discharge will be given where the offender has within him the capacity for military service and where any other appropriate form of punishment is sufficient to meet the requirements of the case;

"(b) Whenever a sentence of dishonorable discharge is given, it should be accompanied by a long term of confinement in the penitentiary or in the Disciplinary Barracks. Where the offense is not sufficiently grave to warrant a long term of confinement it should be assumed that the offender has within him the elements of military service, and he should be made to serve.

"(c) When a sentence of dishonorable discharge is given, unaccompanied by a long period of confinement, reviewing authorities should, in general, suspend or remit the dishonorable discharge and hold the offender to service and punishment with the organization to which he belongs."

Subject: Sentences of general courts-martial.

1. The attention of the War Department is forcibly called to the fact that courts-martial throughout the service are adhering in time of war to peace-time standards of punishment and are imposing sentences of dishonorable discharge, together with comparatively short periods of confinement, for comparatively trivial offenses. The Judge Advocate General reports that men are now being dishonorably discharged from the service at the rate of more than 100 a week, and that an inspection of the records in these cases indicates that a large percentage of these men can without doubt be sufficiently disciplined and punished within their organizations while they are being trained for military service. [Congressional Record, February 19, 1919.]

FEBRUARY 17, 1919.

Hon. JOHN L. BURNETT.

House of Representatives.

SIR: I regret to have observed in the Congressional Record of February 14 that upon that day, during the debate on the Army bill in the House you took occasion to make a bitter attack upon me, based upon your gratuitous assumption that I had made no effort to prevent or correct the prevalent injustices of courts-martial administration, and it was with even greater regret, if of greater regret I could be sensible, I observed that your attack upon me evoked the applause of your colleagues.

Despite the intemperance of your remarks and notwithstanding that you based them upon the purest assumption which the slightest investigation would have shown, even if my present attitude had not satisfactorily indicated, to be the very opposite of the truth, I shall assume, for the present at least, that you do not intend to do me a grievous wrong; that you do not wish to take advantage of your official position to my great injury; and I shall assume, in fairness to you, that the highly objectionable character of your remarks is due to the fact that you spoke out of an outraged sense of justice, and that you want to be fair, and can be fair, and will be fair even now.

If I am justified in indulging this presumption you will permit me to show you, and you will be glad to be shown and to be able to acknowledge, that your attack upon me was as baseless as it was bitter.

Your initial statement was as follows:

"Gen. Ansell, when he made the statement credited to him in the Washington Post to-day, showed that he himself was a party to the crime. Any man who would sit by as an assistant judge advocate general and see men convicted under the circumstances that Gen. Ansell detailed must either be a coward or an incompetent weakling. [Applause.]

"Now, there is no use talking about it. I think he stated facts about it, and there have been committed the enormities and atrocities by men on courts-martial which have been winked at by Crowder, and perhaps by the Secretary of War himself. These outrages are only equaled by the atrocities that the Huns themselves committed. It is infamous. The statement of Ansell shows the wickedness in the War Department among these petty officers, some of whom no doubt were men from civil life who never made $50 or $100 a month and who tried men and sent them to Leavenworth Penitentiary for years, and yet the men higher up of this department are the ones who are responsible and ought either to be impeached or court-martialed themselves."

And when reminded by another Member that you were doing me an injustice, you continued to say:

"Why did he not appeal to Gen. Crowder; why did he not appeal to the President to vindicate him; why did he go on here until he was called before a committee of the Senate to do it? Now, if he had been a brave man and an honest man he never would have held the place that he held with these atrocities and wickedness being perpetrated by men in high life. You can not get around it, gentlemen. He is a party to the crime; there is no doubt about it. * * * Those things are done, gentlemen. But who has done it? Gen. Ansell is responsible; Crowder and the whole bunch of them; Crowder, no doubt, more than any of them. Do not try to throw it on one man, but hold the whole lot of them responsible. Let the responsibility fall where it ought to fall, gentlemen, and not upon any one man."

I shall speak by the record and tell you, in part at least, of the efforts made by me since the beginning of this war to correct a situation which I believe, and which you with bitterness have proclaimed, to have produced injustice. It is not my purpose to assert that my views were right; it is my sole purpose to show you that I did not "sit back" inactive, without attempting to prevent and remedy a course of administration which is now generally conceded to have resulted in injustice to the enlisted men of the Army.

In the first place, I think I may appropriately say in this connection that throughout my service I have not been able to accept the view that our military code sufficiently establishes the rights of an enlisted man before a court-martial, or that our procedure is sufficiently protective of those rights, or that there is no reason or necessity for authoritative supervision of the procedure of courts-martial, and of revision of their judgments. Such a view I have ever rejected, as all those will attest who have been most closely associated with me in the performance of my legal duties in the Army.

In and out of season, whenever opportunity has offered, and at times with an insistence which has strained, if not transgressed, the military proprieties, I have labored to the end that courts-martial might come to be legally established and universally regarded and respected as courts administering law according to fixed and established principles of jurisprudence; that is, as courts of justice. Such was my attitude as early as 1901. Throughout my instructorship at West Point, from 1902 to 1909, I labored to that end; and the whole course of my conduct as a judge advocate has been marked by a desire to liberalize the harsh features of our military methods and subject them, to the greatest practical extent, to those guaranties that guard an accused on trial in a civil forum. When, by virtue of seniority, I came to the head of this office in September, 1917, while Marshal General, I knew that with this new and large citizen Army we should have need of the closest legal supervision of courts-martial procedure and judgments, and I envisioned the great difficulties that must result from a continuation of our old-established methods.

At the outbreak of the war the state of the law was, as the department had for years construed it, that the judgment of a court-martial one approved by the officer in the field appointing it was final and unmodifiable; that no matter how gross and prejudicial and palpable the errors of law in the proceedings as shown upon the face of the record, there was no power in the department or elsewhere to modify, reverse, or set the judgment aside. This was the crux of the difficulty. There was no authority whatever with power to correct for prejudicial errors of law. If this were true, then, indeed, as was said by those in the department who have opposed me during this agitation, is "a military camp the fittest field of application of the military code." The camp commander's will and view become the touchstone of legality; there can be no such thing as established legal control over courts-martial and courts-martial proceedings; no means of correcting their judgments, however unlawful and however unjust. When I became the senior present for duty in the office in the early days of the war I saw, or at least I thought I saw, the necessity of breaking up such a static and intolerable legal situation, and proceeded to act accordingly. During this war I have made the following efforts, among other innumerable ones in individual cases, to that end:

(a) On October 18, 1917, I had the office begin a study to determine whether the power of revision of courts-martial judgments and the incidental power of a close and corrective supervision over their procedure could not be found in existing law.

(b) On November 10 I completed and submitted to the Secretary of War for his personal consideration a formal office opinion, which held, with all my associates concurring, that such a power had been conferred upon the Judge Advocate General of the Army by virtue of 1199, Revised Statutes of the United States.

(c) I immediately proceeded to revise courts-martial judgments, and on the very first day, under the opinion, I set aside several sentences on the ground of their illegality.

(d) I immediately took steps to establish in the office a court of revision, and to consider the drafting of regulations to govern it.

(e) The Judge Advocate General, who was then Provost Marshal General, and who, up to this time, had been without active connection with this office, thereupon returned to this office, wrote and filed with the Secretary of War a brief in opposition, and held that there was no such power of revision, and urged the reversal of my opinion and my action.

(f) The Secretary of War, for the time being at least, agreed with the Judge Advocate General, as did also the Acting Chief of Staff and the Inspector General of the Army, who apparently had been called into conference.

(g) Thereupon I was relieved of my duties in connection with the administration of military justice, and these were taken over by the Judge Advocate General in person. Consequently, from the middle of November, 1917, to the middle of July, 1918, I was not charged with any duty or responsibility in connection with the administration of military justice, nor was I consulted either by the Secretary of War or the Judge Advocate General upon matters affecting the administration of military justice.

(gg) About this time, also, an order which had previously been issued, with the concurrence of the Judge Advocate General and the Chief of Staff, under 1132, Revised Statutes, empowering me to take full charge of the office and its policies, was revoked.

(h) On December 11, 1917, I asked the Secretary of War for a suspension of his decision and that I be permitted to file an extended brief in support of my views and the office opinion. This permission was granted. The brief was filed with the Secretary. As indicating its character, the following were its several points:

I. The action taken by the Secretary of War on the advice of the Judge Advocate General has been taken under very evident misapprehension. Such action is predicated upon the correctness of conviction; and the acceptance of such an act of grace by these innocent men necessarily implies a confession of guilt of a crime which, upon well-established principles of law and justice, they never committed. Justice is a matter of law and not of Executive favor.

II. It is as regrettable as it is obvious that those who oppose my views do not vision in the administration of military justice what the new Army of America will require, nor do they even see what the present is revealing; they are looking backward and taking counsel of a reactionary past whose guidance will prove harmful if not fatal.

(1) The views of the Assistant Chief of Staff and the Inspector General savor of professional absolutism.

(2) The opposing legal views are anachronistic. They are given a backward slant through undue deference to the theory of an illustrious text writer as to the nature of courts-martial, a theory which civil jurisprudence has never adopted but distinctly denied.

(3) The teachings which followed upon the premise that courts-martial are executive agencies have all been disproved by the Supreme Court of the United States, though this department still clings to them.

III. The whole argument of the other side is found in the contention that the word "revise" has no substantial meaning, but has reference only to clerical corrections.

One single fact exposes the utter fallacy of that contention, and had it been considered must have prevented an expression of that view.

That fact is this: The word "revise" is an organic word, which solely creates and defines the duties of an entire bureau. Congress went to the great length of creating an independent bureau in the War Department for the sole and declared purpose of having it "revise" the proceedings of all military courts, and made that duty of revision the sole duty of that bureau.

IV. "Revise" in its every sense—ordinary, legal, and technical military sense—means to correct, to alter, and amend.

V. The word "revise," as a matter of fact, is in no sense ambiguous, and there is no room for misconstruing it. It would have made no difference, therefore, what the administrative practice was or is. The quality of law is not impaired by nonuse. As a matter of fact, Judge Holt did, in form at least, pronounce sentences invalid, and did not content himself simply with recommending that pronouncement was by superior authority. His views as to the validity of proceedings were expressed in terms that savor of judicial pronouncement, and the orders of the War Department so far as examined seem to respect that quality by confirmance.

VI. The judge advocate general of England certainly did have this power of revision. I am not advised of his present authority.

VII. Whence comes the established power to declare proceedings null and void for jurisdictional error? And why should not the larger power include the lesser radical one of correction of legal error?

VIII. The necessity, in the name of justice, of locating this power in this department, and preferably in this office, where logically and, I think, legally it belongs, must be apparent to all who are familiar with the administration of military justice.

(h) The Judge Advocate General filed a brief in opposition to my second brief, which was to the point that the power did not exist, and to the effect that the military code should better be left to be administered by the camp commander.

(i) The Secretary of War again held with the Judge Advocate General that the power was not to be deduced by the existing law, and directed him, not me, to make a "study" of the situation regarding revisory powers.

(j) About this time 13 negro soldiers were hanged in Texas almost immediately upon the completion of their trial and without review of their cases. Indeed, the proceedings under their cases did not reach the department until probably some three months after they had been executed. I took this occasion to file a memorandum with the Judge Advocate General to show what was happening and what was always likely to happen if he and the Secretary of War adhered to their views.

(k) The Judge Advocate General recommended and the department finally adopted an administrative method known as General Order No. 7, which suspended certain sentences until the proceedings could be examined in this office and the commanding general advised with. This was an administrative palliative which was described by the Judge Advocate General as necessary to head off a "threatened congressional investigation" to "silence criticism," to "prevent talk about the establishment of courts of appeal," and to make it "apparent that an accused did get some kind of revision of his proceedings other than the revision at field headquarters."

(l) I volunteered to criticize this compromise with the law and justice and again asked that revisory power be established in this office. I recommended that if the administrative method was nevertheless to be adhered to, it should be greatly extended.

(ll) It was upon my voluntary recommendation that a branch of this office was established in France, to make such review as departmental administration permitted.

(m) Several times—three times, I think—during January, February, March, and April, 1917, I called attention to the necessity of closer supervision of courts-martial judgments and proceedings.

(n) Returning from Europe in the middle of July, whither I had gone the April before for the purpose of studying the military administration of our Allies, I filed with the Judge Advocate General a report which among other things treated especially of the administration of military justice in France, Italy, and England, and which indicated those elements of their systems which I believed to be better than our own, and suggested our own weaknesses. This report never reached the Secretary of War.

(o) In August, 1918, I reorganized the office so as to be enabled to present a more thorough presentation of the deficiencies of the courts-martial records coming to the office, and by strength and thoroughness of argument, to impel the minds of the military authorities to action in individual cases. For this purpose I created the boards of review, which still exist and perform most valuable service, but without any authority to make a modification of a judgment in any case.

(p) In September I ordered the boards of review to break away from the office interpretation (which, however, was probably correct) of the administrative method heretofore referred to (subpar. k), which had been construed to forbid this office to make any recommendation or suggestion as to clemency. And I ordered that, in a proper case, despite the order, clemency should be suggested to commanding generals.

(q) In September, upon my insistent recommendation, power was established in the Acting Judge Advocate General in France to make rulings upon matters of the administration of military justice in our own forces in France, which would control all commanding generals until overruled by the Secretary of War. This is now being opposed by the commanding general American Expeditionary Forces, and my own action and propriety in procuring the issue of this order is being subject to question.

(r) In October the executive officer and I advocated (and the head of the office approved) the increase of the personnel of the department, so that at least the trial judge advocate should be a lawyer and could use his power as such to exert some legal control over the court.

Upon every occasion and every opportunity I have stood for an absolute legal supervision of courts-martial procedure and judgments, and even when not charged with any duty touching the administration of military justice, I have never hesitated to express my view upon any matter concerning it that might come to my attention. In certain several cases involving sentences of death, I voluntarily went to the chief of this office and opposed his recommendation for execution.

These are a part of my efforts. I hope they may serve to convince all fair-minded men that I am not a coward or weakling.

You seem to think that under these circumstances I should have gone directly to the President. Upon a little reflection you will appreciate, I am sure, the impossibility of such a course. I think, however, that, resting under the charge which you have made against me, I am justified in saying this, that on one occasion I well remember—and doubtless there are others—when four sentences of death were pending in the department for confirmation, and when this office had recommended execution, I went to the head of the office and orally presented to him my views in opposition. I then filed with him a memorandum in which I did my best to show, what seemed to me to be obvious, that these men had been most unfairly tried, had not been tried at all, and ought not to die or suffer any other punishment upon such records. Discovering that these memoranda had not been presented to the Secretary of War, and feeling justified by the fact that I had no other forum in this department, I gave a copy of the memorandum to a distinguished member of the Judiciary Committee of the House and was told by him that he could present the cases to the President himself.

I was compelled to do this—an act inconsistent with strict military propriety—by the dictates of my own conscience, by my desire to serve justice, and by my sense of duty to my God and these unprotected men that their lives might be spared.

Very respectfully, yours,

S. T. ANSELL.

OCTOBER 25, 1918.

Memorandum for the Chief of the Division of Military Justice.

Subject: Scope of duties of the board of review of your division.

1. I understand that this office has heretofore held, or that at least you have heretofore been instructed, that the power of this office is strictly limited in its reviews of courts-martial cases sent up under General Orders, No. 7, War Department, 1918, to the question of legality of the proceedings. With this view I am not in accord.

2. I am very familiar with the origin and purpose of that order. It was never intended to operate as a limitation upon the duties of this office. On the other hand, the order itself, while in my judgment altogether too limited in its terms, was born out of an effort then being made by this office to the end that the War Department, through its proper functionaries, exercise the requisite and necessary revisory power and control over all courts-martial proceedings.

3. The language of the order, standing alone, may, indeed, limit the powers of this office to a review for the sole purpose of determining the legality of proceedings. But for the reason just adverted to the terms of the order are not all inclusive. There are still powers, organic, statutory, and administrative, which it could not have been the purpose, nor can it be the effect, of that order to modify. The President is the source of all clemency, and that power, of course, finds no limitations in the order. Furthermore, as Commander in Chief of the Army, speaking directly or through his constitutional organ, the Secretary of War, his suggestions to convening authorities are entitled to, and will, of course, receive, the most thorough consideration. It would be the extreme case in which the views and suggestions of the Commander in Chief of the Army, concerning military punishments, could justifiably be disregarded. Also this office is the office which the President and the department must rely upon for their advice and guidance in matters affecting court-martial procedure and punishment. Moreover, and aside from the realm of administration, this office has the statutory duty of revising all court-martial proceedings, a duty which it can not disregard. In view of all this constitutional, administrative, and statutory power, this office must be assumed to have the duty, by reason of its powers and its organic relation to the authorities just mentioned, to speak beyond the strict question of legality authorized by said order.

4. The administration of this office has revealed the necessity of giving this consideration concrete application. Frequently proceedings are legal in toto and admit of no question of their legality or regularity whatever, and yet the punishment awarded is such as would justify any reviewing authority or supervisory power of any kind at least to invite attention to the punishment and to suggest a modification of it or a means of modifying it. The board of review in your division, through whose hands pass all court-martial records of the trials of the most serious offenses, and to whose attention and consideration come the most serious sentences awarded by courts-martial, are, by virtue of these facts and their position as a board of review, best able, within broad limits, to weigh the relation of punishment to discipline, and frequently of specific punishment to specific offense. Besides, while uniformity of punishment may not be a fundamental consideration, it is, in the administration of military justice, a most important one by reason of the great variation in punishments awarded by courts-martial. Such variations are more or less inherent in the system—a system which is administered by officers more or less unfamiliar with the military profession itself and always unskilled in the law and in which thousands of tribunals are exercising judicial functions unguided by their own or other precedents. In my judgment, there could be no present accomplishment that would operate to the greater good of the Army or meet with greater approbation of those of our people who are interested in the administration of military justice than the establishment in this office of an administrative procedure that would result in rendering the punishments in the Military Establishment more nearly uniform, more scientific and intelligent, and better related to justice to the individual upon the one hand and military discipline in general upon the other.

5. In view of these reasons, you and the board of review are instructed to make such recommendations in all cases passing under your supervision by virtue of General Order No. 7 as will tend toward the achievement of this result, and will no longer in such cases consider yourselves limited to the sole question of legality of procedure.

S. T. ANSELL,
Acting Judge Advocate General.

WAR DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE JUDGE ADVOCATE GENERAL,
March 11, 1919.

CASES RETURNED TO REVIEWING AUTHORITIES.

To Gen. CHAMBERLAIN:

In addition to the cases cited here, there is one other, the Peters case, in which, in France, the reviewing authority did not follow the recommendation of the branch office of the Judge Advocate General's Office. A memorandum of that case will be prepared and sent to you promptly.

Very respectfully,

W. C. RIGBY, Major, Judge Advocate.

APPENDIX TO MAJ. RIGBY'S REPORT.

Memorandum with regard to courts-martial cases in which the Secretary of War or the reviewing authority has failed to follow the recommendations of the office of the Judge Advocate General.

An examination has been made of records of courts-martial cases, tried since the Government of the United States entered the war, with a view to obtaining figures as to the number of cases in which recommendations of the office of the Judge Advocate General with regard to the setting aside or the modification of sentences of courts-martial have not been followed by the Secretary of War or by reviewing authorities. It is not possible to procure from available records absolutely accurate statistics, but those obtained are evidently such that they furnish information on which definite conclusions can be based. Brief abstracts of the facts in cases in which the recommendations of the office of the Judge Advocate General have not been followed are set forth below.

Recommendations have been made to the Secretary of War in approximately 279 cases. Examination of these cases discloses that in 13 of them the recommendations of this office were not followed.

In three of these cases the Secretary of War differed with the views of this office with regard to points of law involved therein (Lieut. Millard M. Green, Pvt. Dan Nona, and Pvt. Edwin E. Schonofsky).

In four cases there was merely a difference of opinion as to the propriety of a commutation of sentences (Second Lieut. John C. Ward, Maj. Henry R. Freeman, jr., Second Lieut. Louis B. Hanks, and First Lieut. John B. Sisson). This office recommended a partial commutation of the sentence in each of these cases. The Secretary of War did not concur in such recommendation. In two of these cases the President directed final action in accordance with the recommendations of this office (Maj. Henry R. Freeman, jr., and John C. Ward).

In one case this office had recommended that a sentence of dismissal be confirmed (Second Lieut. Arthur Brigham). The Secretary of War disagreeing with the view of this office recommended that the sentence be remitted, and the President took action in accordance with the Secretary's recommendation.

Five cases, all tried in France, merely involved a question, identical in each case, as to the place of confinement (Pvts. Thurston C. Reynolds, Frank Malarich, Robert M. Hughett, Charles M. Gard, and Nelson Glock). The office of the Judge Advocate General recommended confinement in the United States Disciplinary Barracks instead of at military posts in France. The Secretary of War did not concur in the recommendations made in each of these cases.

Recommendations have been made to reviewing authorities in approximately 212 cases under General Orders, No. 7, War Department, 1918; and the reviewing authorities have failed to follow the recommendations in six of them. Three of these cases arose in France and three in the United States.

The records of the three cases tried in the United States show that in one of them the reviewing authority followed the recommendations of this office in part (Pvt. Charles A. McBect); in one the reviewing authority complied with the recommendations of this office in such a way that punishment was imposed on the accused in accordance therewith, and only the record of the accused was affected by the failure of the reviewing authority strictly to follow the recommendations (Pvt. Edward C. O'Neill); in one case the recommendations of this office were disregarded in their entirety (Harvey W. Janke).

The records of the three cases tried in France show that in one case the reviewing authority complied in part with the recommendations of the office of the Judge Advocate General (Pvt. James Adlo); in two cases the recommendations of the office of the Judge Advocate General were disregarded in their entirety (Pvt. Delbert L. Moss and Capt. Samuel D. Mann).

In a case tried at Camp Funston, Kans., the office of the Judge Advocate General and the Secretary of War recommended that the sentence be confirmed, and the President, differing with both, disapproved the finding and sentence (First Lieut. Charles H. Mielke).

Second Lieut. Arthur Brigham, Sixth Field Artillery. Trial by general court-martial at Douglas, Ariz., July 22, 1917. Dismissal from the service.

The accused was tried under the ninety-sixth article of war under specifications relating to the taking of a false oath in making application for appointment as provisional second lieutenant, in which application he stated falsely that he was a single man. He was found guilty and sentenced to be dismissed from the service.

The reviewing authority approved the sentence and suspended execution thereof pending action by the President, and he recommended that the sentence of dismissal be remitted in view of the frank admission of the accused apparently made for the purpose of rectifying an error made by him, and of the exemplary reputation formerly borne by the accused in the military service.

This office being of the opinion that the false oath made by the accused showed him to be untrustworthy, recommended that the sentence of the court be confirmed.

The Secretary of War disagreeing with the view of this office, recommended to the President that sentence should be remitted, and the President took action in accordance with the Secretary's recommendation.

Second Lieut. John C. Ward. Trial by general court-martial convened at Fort McDowell, Calif., August 29, 1917. Dismissal from the service.

Lieut. John C. Ward was tried by a court composed of five captains of the Regular Army. He was arraigned under the ninety-sixth article of war on the charge of drunkenness. He was found guilty and sentenced to be dismissed from the service.

The reviewing authority, the commanding officer at Fort McDowell, approved the proceedings without comment and forwarded them by indorsement for action of the President in compliance with the forty-eighth and fifty-first articles of war.

This office recommended, in view of the man's excellent service as an enlisted man since April 26, 1906, up to the time he was commissioned, shortly before his trial, that the sentence be commuted to forfeiture of $50 per month for six months and restriction to the limits of the post to which he might be stationed for a like period.

The Secretary of War was unwilling to recommend commutation, but called the attention of the President to the recommendations of this office, which the President followed.

Lieut. Millard M. Green, Engineer Reserve Corps. Trial by general court-martial convened at Camp Dix, N. J., March 19, 1918. Dismissal.

The accused was charged with violation of the ninety-fifth and ninety-sixth articles of war. Under each specification the allegations of fact were that he had married in the month of December, 1906, one Lillian Melton Greer and that afterwards, while so married to her, he unlawfully married one Edith Elder. He was found guilty and sentenced to be dismissed from the service and to be confined at hard labor for five years.

The reviewing authority approved the sentence and forwarded the record for action under the forty-eighth article of war.

This office recommended that, there being no legally sufficient evidence to prove the offense of bigamy, the findings and sentence be disapproved, but that appropriate steps be taken looking to the discharge of the officer under the provisions of section 9 of the act of May 18, 1917.

The Secretary of War did not concur in the recommendations of this office, but recommended to the President that, the offense of bigamy not having been proved, the findings and sentence under the ninety-sixth article of war be disapproved and that the accused, having been guilty of conduct unbecoming an officer and a gentleman, the findings under the ninety-fifth article of war be approved and the officer dismissed.

Maj. Henry R. Freeman, jr., Three hundred and thirty-seventh Field Artillery. Trial by general court-martial convened at Camp Dodge, Iowa, April 3, 1918.

The accused was tried on a charge of violating the ninety-fifth article of war on a specification that he was drunk. He was found guilty and sentenced to be dismissed from the service.

The reviewing authority approved the findings and sentence and forwarded the record for the action of the President under the forty-eighth article of war.

This office recommended that the findings of the court be approved, but that, in view of the previous good record of the officer, the sentence be commuted to confinement for six months, forfeiture of $100 a month, and a reprimand by the commanding general of his division. The Secretary of War did not concur in the recommendation of this office, but called the President's attention thereto.

who later directed a disposition of the case in accordance with the recommendations of this office.

Pvt. Dan Nona, One hundred and thirty-fifth Machine Gun Battalion, United States National Guard. Trial by general court-martial convened at Vreecourt, France, July 17, 1918. Hard labor, without confinement, for three years, with forfeitures.

The accused was tried for violation of the ninety-third article of war under the specifications that he "did willfully, feloniously, and unlawfully commit involuntary manslaughter."

This office pointed out that the finding of the court was void for repugnancy, since if the act was willful and felonious it was not involuntary manslaughter, and it recommended that so much of the sentence in the case as remained unexecuted be remitted.

The Secretary of War disapproved this recommendation.

Pvt. Thurston G. Reynolds, Company M, Sixtieth Infantry. Trial by general court-martial in France, April 14, 1918. Dismissed from the service, forfeitures, and confinement at hard labor for three years.

The accused was tried on a charge of violating the eighty-sixth article of war on a single specification alleging that he was found sleeping on his post while on guard as a sentinel in time of war. He pleaded guilty and was found guilty on the charge and was sentenced to be dishonorably discharged from the service, to forfeit all pay and allowances and to be confined at hard labor for three years.

The reviewing authority approved the sentence, suspended the dishonorable discharge, and designated the station of his company as the place of confinement of the accused.

The Office of the Judge Advocate General called attention to the policy of the War Department respecting the place of confinement to be designated on conviction by general court-martial as set out in paragraphs 396, 397, and 398, M. C. M., 1917, and pointed out that paragraph 377, specifically provides for the designation of the United States disciplinary barracks at Fort Leavenworth, Kans., or one of its branches, as the place of confinement for general prisoners who are to be confined for six months or more and who are not to be confined in a penitentiary.

The view was expressed that the interests of discipline in the Army could not best be served by retaining at military posts or camps prisoners undergoing extended periods of confinement, and it was therefore recommended that the place of confinement of the prisoner be changed to the United States disciplinary barracks.

The opinion was expressed by The Adjutant General that, in view of the fact the commanding general of the American Expeditionary Forces had been specifically authorized to retain general prisoners in France, and in view of provisions in the Army appropriation act approved July 9, 1918, relating to the remission of sentences, it was not advisable to concur in the recommendation of the Judge Advocate General's Office.

Cases of Pvt. Frank Malarich, Pvt. Robert M. Hughett, Pvt. Charles M. Gard, and Pvt. Nelson Glock, tried in France.

In the cases of Pvt. Frank Malarich, Pvt. Robert M. Hughett, Pvt. Charles M. Gard, and Pvt. Nelson Glock, all tried in France, sentences were imposed similar to that imposed in the case of Pvt. Thurston G. Reynolds, the facts in which are set forth above. The Office of the Judge Advocate General made recommendations in these cases the same as that made in the case of Pvt. Reynolds. The Office of The Adjutant General of the Army by direction of the Secretary of War did not concur in these recommendations for the same reasons as were indicated by him in the case of Pvt. Reynolds.

Second Lieut. Louis B. Hanks, Quartermaster Corps, National Army. Trial by general court-martial convened at Boston, Mass., July 22, 1918. Dismissal from the service.

The accused was tried for violation of the ninety-sixth article of war, under specifications of having appeared in civilian clothing, in violation of General Orders, No. 63, and of having been drunk in a public place. He was found guilty of both specifications and sentenced to be dismissed from the service.

The reviewing authority approved this sentence and forwarded the record for trial under the provisions of General Orders, No. 7, War Department, 1918.

This office recommended that the sentence be commuted to a reprimand, to be administered by the commanding general Northeastern Department, restrictions to the limits of the accused's post, camp, or station for three months, and forfeiture of $25 of his pay per month for a like period, unless he should be discharged from the service prior to the expiration of said period, in which event so much of said sentence as provides for such restriction and forfeiture as remains unexecuted should stand remitted.

The Secretary of War did not concur in the recommendation of this office.

First Lieut. John B. Sisson, Field Artillery. United States Army. Trial by general court-martial, Camp Jackson, S. C., October 1, 1918. Dismissal from the service.

The accused was tried on charges under the ninety-fifth article of war, under specifications of drunkenness and having liquor in his possession. He was convicted and sentenced to be dismissed from the service.

The reviewing authority approved the sentence and forwarded the record for action under the forty-eighth article of war.

This office recommended that clemency be extended to the accused and that accordingly the sentence be commuted to a reprimand, to be administered by the commanding general at Camp Jackson, restriction to the limits of the post or camp for six months, and forfeiture of $50 of his pay per month for a like period, unless he should be discharged from the service prior to the expiration of the said period, in which event so much of said sentence as provided for restriction and forfeiture as remained unexecuted should stand remitted.

The recommendations of this office were not approved by the Secretary of War.

Pvt. First Class Edwin E. Schonofsky, Battery F, Eighty-first Field Artillery, and Pvt. First Class Alfons Dalloen, Battery F, Eighty-first Field Artillery. Trial by general court-martial at Camp Fremont, Calif., June 3, 1918.

These soldiers were arraigned and jointly tried under charges of having violated the fifty-eighth and ninety-sixth articles of war, by committing the crimes of desertion and larceny. Schonofsky was sentenced to be shot and Dalloen was sentenced to be dishonorably discharged from service, to forfeit all pay and allowances due or to become due, and to be confined at hard labor for 50 years.

The reviewing authority approved the sentences, but stayed their execution until the record of the trial should be reviewed in the office of the Judge Advocate General and its legality determined. The reviewing authority did not forward the record for action of the President under the forty-eighth article of war so far as the accused Schonofsky was concerned, as should have been done. The Judge Advocate General decided that the proper disposition to make of the case, so far as Schonofsky was concerned, was to recommend that the President disapprove the findings of guilty of the specifications and charges against him and the sentence imposed upon him. The Judge Advocate General, upon a review of the case, found that it was a fatal irregularity to try these men jointly upon charges not alleging that they had acted in concert and in pursuance of a common design and that accordingly the trial was contrary to law and in violation of the substantial rights of the accused.

The Secretary of War did not concur in the Judge Advocate General's recommendation. While conceding that the men had some "purely technical right to separate trials," the Secretary took the position that the procedure followed in these cases violated no substantial rights of the men.

The President, in accordance with the recommendation of the Secretary of War, commuted the sentence imposed on Schonofsky to dishonorable discharge, total forfeitures, and confinement at hard labor for 25 years, and designated the United States military prison, at Fort Leavenworth, as the place of confinement.

CASES IN WHICH THE REVIEWING AUTHORITY HAS FAILED TO FOLLOW THE RECOMMENDATIONS OF THE JUDGE ADVOCATE GENERAL'S OFFICE.

Pvt. Charles A. McBect, Company H, Fifteenth Infantry. Trial by general court-martial at Fort Lawton, Wash., September 17, 1918. Five years' confinement, penitentiary.

The accused was tried for an offense under the ninety-sixth article of war. He was sentenced to be discharged from the service, with total forfeitures, and to be confined at hard labor for five years.

The reviewing authority approved the sentence, and the record was forwarded to this office for review pursuant to General Order No. 7, War Department, 1918. In view of errors in the admission of evidence and in the failure of the court to advise the accused of his rights as a witness, this office recommended that the findings and sentence be disapproved, and that the accused be released from confinement and restored to duty.

The department commander failed to follow the recommendation in its entirety, and directed that the sentence be executed except that confinement be remitted.

Pvt. Harvey W. Janke, Medical Department, United States Army. Trial by general court-martial at Fort Sheridan, Ill., November 22, 1918. Fifteen years' confinement, penitentiary.

The accused was tried and convicted (1) of desertion under the fifty-eighth article of war, and (2) of forging and uttering certain forged checks under the ninety-six article of war. The record, which was forwarded pursuant to General Order No. 7, War Department, 1918, was reviewed in this office, which reached the conclusion that the finding of guilty of desertion was not supported by the evidence, and recommended that the reviewing authority disapprove the finding of guilty of this offense and reduce to 5 years the period of confinement of 15 years, as imposed by the court, and approved by the reviewing authority. It was the opinion of this office that a charge of desertion was not proven by competent evidence.

The record was returned to the commanding general, Central Department, the reviewing authority, who declined to follow the recommendation of this office and published a general court-martial order in the case, approving the sentence as originally imposed and ordering its execution.

The sentence having been published in orders is now beyond the control of the reviewing authority to correct, but, as in the opinion of this office, it rests in part upon an illegal basis and as measured by its legal warrant, it is excessive, it was recommended by this office to the Secretary of War that the findings of guilty on the charge of desertion be set aside and that the period of confinement be reduced to five years.

Pvt. Edward C. O'Neill, alias Edward C. Joyce, Coast Artillery Corps, Eighteenth Company, Boston, Mass. Trial by general court-martial at Fort Sheridan, Ill., December 4, 1918. Twenty-five years' confinement, penitentiary.

The accused was tried for violation of the fifty-eighth and ninetyeth articles of war on specifications involving, among other charges, desertion and forgery.

In view of the errors committed during the trial which injuriously affected the substantial rights of the accused and which invalidated the findings on certain charges and specifications, this office recommended that the reviewing authority revoke its approval of the findings and sentence in this case, except as concerned certain charges, and that the term of confinement of 25 years imposed by the court be reduced to 3 years. The reviewing authority reduced the sentence as recommended by this office, but did not revoke its approval of the findings on certain specifications. Only the record of the accused was therefore affected by the failure of the reviewing authority strictly to follow the recommendations of this office.

Pvt. Emmett T. Whelan, Battery D, Sixty-third Artillery, Coast Artillery Corps. Trial by general court-martial at Fort Worden, Wash., June 28, 1918. Confinement at hard labor for one year and forfeiture of pay.

The accused was tried for violation of the ninety-third article of war on a specification that he fraudulently converted to his own use certain funds belonging to other soldiers, and for a violation of the ninety-sixth article of war on a specification that he violated standing post hospital orders by retaining property received from patients for safe-keeping. He was found guilty on the second charge and sentenced to be confined at hard labor for one year and to forfeit two-thirds of his pay per month for a like period.

The reviewing authority approved the sentence and ordered the execution thereof at the station of the soldier's company. This office pointed out to The Adjutant General that it is the policy of the War Department that such long-term sentences to confinement should also include dishonorable discharge and forfeiture of pay and allowances, that where a period of confinement is for more than 6 months, and where a penitentiary is not designated as a place of confinement, a disciplinary barracks should be designated, and that it is not believed that the interests of discipline in the Army can best be served by re-military offenders should, except, perhaps, in rare instances, be sentenced to serve, and while therein they should be made to serve not only as soldiers but under such conditions as would involve punishment. By this means the Government would save for itself the service of the soldier and furnish opportunity for self-redemption. Doubtless there are rare instances when must be taken out of the Army entirely and subjected to long-term imprisonment, but I think they must be rare. As I see it, the department has the responsibility of deciding how it can utilize the services of these soldiers and at the same time keep them within a penal condition.

Under the existing law the matter of dishonorable discharge is within the jurisdiction of the court and the reviewing authority. The reviewing authority should suspend the sentence of dishonorable discharge until the soldier is released from confinement. If it were laid down as the policy of the War Department that the department intended to avail itself of the service of men sentenced to dishonorable discharge, except perhaps in rare instances, that policy could be laid upon the several reviewing authorities as to have them suspend all sentences until the pleasure of the department should be known.

I think the policy of the department should be determined now. At the present time men are being dishonorably discharged for offenses which are venial. I think you should take immediate action. For the time being dishonorable discharges could be stayed by a communication to the effect generally to the effect that it is the desire of the Secretary of War that all sentences contemplated in the fifty-second article of war to suspend the execution of all sentences of dishonorable discharge until the further pleasure of the Secretary be made known. In the meantime, this office, if advised of the policy, could formulate the plans accordingly.

NOVEMBER 14, 1917.

Memoandum for the Chief of Staff.

Proper punishment during war.

A memorandum from this office addressed to the Chief of Staff under date of October 18, 1917, on the above subject, attention was invited to the fact that men were being dishonorably discharged from the service at the rate of about 100 a week. It was there indicated, as the views of this office, that during war the punishment of dishonorable discharge should be very sparingly resorted to, and the suggestion was made that any method of maintaining discipline which results in depriving the service of its man power in time of war is fundamentally defective. It was further suggested that a disciplinary unit should be established under the control of each division commander in which military offenders should, except in rare instances, be sentenced to serve while therein be made to serve not only as soldiers, but under such conditions as would involve punishment. The idea underlying the suggestion was that any sentence of dishonorable discharge, except in the few cases where offenders are totally unfit for military service or their retention therein is harmful, would be suspended or remitted by the reviewing authority for the purpose of holding the men in these disciplinary units and for military duty rather than sending them to the disciplinary barracks or to a branch where they are removed entirely from military service.

Unfortunately, the idea sought to be conveyed by this memorandum has been confused with the plan heretofore suggested, by Maj. King, of the Medical Department, of establishing disciplinary battalions at the various cantonments which, in effect, branches of the United States disciplinary barracks, the construction for which has been variously estimated at from $300,000 to $1,000,000. In order to obtain the views of the commanding generals of the various divisions and tactical divisions with reference to the advisability of establishing such disciplinary battalions in the various divisions, The Adjutant General has asked upon each of them for an opinion. The majority of them expressed themselves as being opposed to the establishment of disciplinary battalions at the present time. The memorandum of this office above referred to, together with other papers bearing upon this subject, was referred to the War College for study, and a conclusion was reached which has served as a basis for a

CASE IN WHICH THE PRESIDENT FAILED TO APPROVE OF THE RECOMMENDATIONS OF THE SECRETARY OF WAR AND OF THE OFFICE OF THE JUDGE ADVOCATE GENERAL.

First Lieut. Charles H. Mielke, Medical Reserve Corps. Trial at Camp Funston, Kans., November 16, 1918. Dismissal from the service.

The accused was tried for violation of the eighty-fifth article of war on the specification that he was drunk while on duty. He was convicted and sentenced to be dismissed from the service. The sentence was approved by the convening authority and the record was forwarded for action by the President under the forty-eighth article of war.

This office and the Secretary of War recommended that the sentence be confirmed. The President disapproved of the finding and sentence, and directed that the restoration to duty of the accused in view of the fact the evidence of record failed "to show the guilt of the accused beyond a reasonable doubt."

WAR DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE JUDGE ADVOCATE GENERAL,
March 11, 1919.

Memorandum: For Gen. Chamberlain, Inspector General:

Herewith is a memorandum concerning the Noel F. Peters case, C. M. No. 118312. This is the remaining case, which I mentioned to you this morning, in which the reviewing authority did not follow the recommendation of the Paris branch office of this office.

This memorandum, with what I gave you this morning, completes the statement of cases of that character, so far as the records of the statistical division of this office show.

WILLIAM C. RIGBY,
Major, Judge Advocate.

Memorandum of a case in which the reviewing authority declined to follow the recommendation of the Paris branch office of the Judge Advocate General's Office.

C. M. No. 118312. United States v. Noel F. Peters, private, Four hundred and sixty-sixth Aero Squadron, S. C. (A. J. A. G. O., 201-116).

1. Pvt. Noel F. Peters was tried by general court-martial convened by command of Gen. Kernan, commanding general, headquarters Services of Supply, American Expeditionary Forces, France. The court met at Air Service Production Center No. 2, May 20, 1918. The accused was charged, under one charge, violation of the fifty-eighth article of war, and one specification, with desertion, February 24, 1918, from the Third Aviation Instruction Center, American Expeditionary Forces, and remaining absent in desertion until apprehended at Toulouse, France, on or about March 10, 1918. He pleaded not guilty to the specification and the charge, but was found guilty and sentenced to dishonorable discharge, total forfeitures, and confinement at hard labor for 10 years. Gen. Kernan, as reviewing authority, on May 31, 1918, approved the sentence, "though lenient"; designated the United States Penitentiary, Leavenworth, Kans., as the place of confinement; suspended the execution of the sentence under General Order No. 7, War Department, 1918; and forwarded the record to the Paris branch office of the office of the Judge Advocate General.

2. Upon review in the Paris branch office of the Judge Advocate General's Office, the record was found not legally sufficient to support the conviction of desertion, but sufficient to support a conviction of absence without leave. It was accordingly recommended by Brig. Gen. E. A. Kregar, Acting Judge Advocate General, that the approval of the sentence and the designation of a penitentiary as the place of confinement be vacated, and that so much only of the findings of the court be approved as involved a finding of guilty of the lesser and included offense of absence without leave, in violation of the sixty-first article of war, and that appropriate action be taken with reference to the approval of the sentence, or a portion thereof, and the designation of a place of confinement under military control.

3. Upon the return of the record to Gen. Kernan, with this recommendation of the Acting Judge Advocate General, the case was referred by Gen. Kernan to his staff judge advocate, Col. J. A. Hull, judge advocate, who, in a memorandum dated July 1, 1918, disagreed with the opinion and recommendations of the Acting Judge Advocate General, Gen. Kreger, and concluded his memorandum with:

"In this case it is submitted that if the errors are such that the trial is a nullity, disapproval of the entire proceedings is the correct action, and not merely a compromise verdict. Your orders are, therefore, requested."

4. Thereupon Gen. Kernan made the following indorsement upon Col. Hull's memorandum:

"For Col. Hull:

"I have read the entire proceedings and the several memorandums herewith analyzing the case, and I am satisfied that the original action was sound. Let it stand.

"F. J. KERNAN,
"Major General, National Army.

"TOURS, FRANCE, July 4, 1918."

5. Thereupon, under date of July 4, 1918, General Court-Martial Order No. 112, headquarters Services of Supply, American Expeditionary Forces, was promulgated, carrying the original sentence into execution.

6. The following week, under date of July 11, 1918, Acting Judge Advocate General Kreger forwarded to the Judge Advocate General, with the record of trial, a memorandum calling attention to the case and concluding:

"My immediate concern, however, is not with the question of the soundness of the advice given by this office, but with the question of what effect should have been given to such advice by the reviewing authority. That question is not discussed by the judge advocate of the trial jurisdiction in his counter-memorandum pertaining to this case, but was discussed by him in his memorandum relating to the case of Pvt. Delbert L. Moss (A. J. A. G. O., 201-92). The following extract from a letter addressed to you with reference to the Moss case is quoted as especially pertinent in connection with this case, viz:

"It has been my belief that the purpose in view in the creation by General Order 7 of this branch of your office was to prevent final approval of illegal findings and the execution of illegal sentences in the classes of cases described in that order, and I am unable to see how that purpose is to be fully accomplished if reviewing authorities are to be free to disregard the advice of this office with respect to the legality of findings and sentences. It may be * * * that the purpose of General Order 7 will be regarded as having been sufficiently attained by delaying the execution of sentences until the records shall have been reconsidered by the reviewing authority in the light of views expressed by this office. As to this I do not urge my opinion, but submit the question to your office for decision."

"Your instructions in the premises are requested for the guidance of this office, and if the opinions of this office with respect to the legality of findings and sentences are to be regarded by reviewing authorities as controlling, it is recommended that they, as well as this office, be advised to that effect.

"Being still of the opinion that the record in this case is legally insufficient to support the findings and sentence, and that the advice of this branch of the office of the Judge Advocate General with reference to the legality of a finding or sentence reviewed here should be given the same effect as if the advice had been given by the office of the Judge Advocate General of the Army, I recommend that the sentence be declared null and void and that Peters be restored to duty."

7. This case is understood to have been one of the immediate occasions of the discussions preceding the issuance of General Order No. 84, War Department, 1918 (par. IV).

Major, Judge Advocate.

EXHIBIT 72.

MILITARY JUSTICE DURING THE WAR.

WASHINGTON, March 25, 1919.

To my fellow members of the bar in the United States:

Herewith is inclosed to you a copy of a letter sent this month to the Secretary of War by the Judge Advocate General, Maj. Gen. Enoch H. Crowder. It was evoked by recent complaints about the system of military justice, uttered on the floor of Congress and in the press.

The principal congressional speeches on this topic appeared in the Congressional Record for January 3, January 23, February 19, February 27, and March 4; and these criticisms, together with others developed by a witness before the Senate Committee on Military Affairs during February, have been given by the daily press considerable publicity of a sensational nature, notably in the New York World of January 19 and later dates, and in the Philadelphia Public Ledger.

The testimony at the committee hearings will probably not be printed for some time to come; and it will form a large pamphlet, requiring patient study for extraction of the general features of fact. Meanwhile the lack of any publicity for the defense of those criticisms will have left the intelligent public under the impression that there is and can be no defense, although the contrary is the case. It has therefore seemed proper and necessary to give circulation to this letter.

In the Official Bulletin for March 5 and March 10 will be found two letters of Gen. Crowder, addressed in reply to a letter of request from the Secretary of War. The first letter, of date February 13, deals at great length with the specific criticisms voiced in the speech of Senator Chamberlain, published January 3. The second letter, of date March 8, surveys briefly the entire field of complaint. But the subject is too large for adequate reply in a brief letter. Moreover the intelligent public needs, as the foundation of its judgment, an educative description of the system of military judicial procedure as it actually is. This is furnished by the present letter.

I commend this letter to your careful perusal. It is to be hoped that the candid judgment of the legal profession, made after hearing both sides, will impress itself upon public opinion at large.

It would be presumptuous in me to suppose that the distinguished Judge Advocate General needs any assistance from me in securing credit for his utterances. But, so far as my name is known to the American bar, I am keenly desirous to do my part in securing a just verdict for our military system in the forum of public opinion. And that part can be contributed by urging upon my fellow members of the bar a careful study of this presentation by the Judge Advocate General.

In addressing you in this direct fashion, I am deliberately breaking through the etiquette of the military service, rigorously observed by me since my call to active duty in July, 1917. I am on the point of receiving my honorable discharge (I hope) within a few weeks, and I speak to you in this letter not merely as an officer of the Army but also as a member of the bar of 30 years' standing who has happened to have intimate observation of the methods of military justice during the war as well as of the principal personages in charge of it in Washington. Some of the court-martial records recently discussed in the public press had been submitted to my scrutiny at the time they were originally pending for action. Many of the events of 1917 and 1918 publicly discussed in Congress were the subject of personal knowledge on my part. My official duties, however, have been almost entirely in the office of the Provost Marshal General, and I have not prepared (with a single exception) any official opinion on court-martial records. I am therefore not implicated in any criticisms upon the court-martial system. I have nothing to hope and nothing to fear from the authorities of the War Department. I have always, in our civil profession, acted sympathetically and spoken frankly in the cause of the reform of justice. My record shows that I do not belong either with the reactionaries or with the Bolsheviks.

These circumstances are mentioned to indicate that I have adequate grounds for a correct and untrammelled opinion, as an observer and a member of the bar, upon the comparative administration of military and civil justice, and that opinion is that the inclosed letter of the Judge Advocate General is a correct and reliable description of the facts and the spirit of American military justice during the war. I see where military justice, in the light of the war's experience, can be improved; but I will not remain silent in the presence of an unmerited attack, full of exaggeration and defamation, wholly unjust both to the system itself and to those able and faithful men who have borne the burden of its administration.

The legal profession, by its firmest traditions and daily practice, is accustomed to recognize the necessity of hearing both sides before passing final judgment. I therefore make this personal appeal to my fellow members of the bar to peruse the inclosed letter and to give due weight to its presentation. When the entire facts shall have been brought out and the motives behind the recent press publicity become plain, you will be well satisfied that you did not allow yourselves to be carried away by first impressions gained from sensational headlines, extreme cases, and emotional epithets.

JOHN H. WIGMORE,
Colonel, Judge Advocate, United States Army.

LETTER OF THE SECRETARY OF WAR.

MARCH 1, 1919.

MY DEAR GEN. CROWDER: I have been deeply concerned, as you know, over the harsh criticisms recently uttered upon our system of military justice. During the times of peace, prior to the war, I do not recall that our system of military law ever became the subject of public attack on the ground of its structural defects. Nor during the entire war period of 1917 and 1918, while the camps and cantonments were full of men and the strain of preparation was at its highest tension, do I remember noticing any complaints either in the public press or in Congress or in the general mail arriving at this office. The recent outburst of criticism and complaint, voiced in public by a few individuals whose position entitled them to credit, and carried throughout the country by the press, has been to me a matter of surprise and sorrow. I have had most deeply at heart the interests of the Army and the welfare of the individual soldier, and I have the firmest determination that justice shall be done under military law.

I have not been made to believe, by the perusal of these complaints, that justice is not done to-day under the military law or has not been done during the war period. And my own acquaintance with the course of military justice (gathered as it is from the large number of cases which in the regular routine come to me for final action) convinces me that the conditions implied by these recent complaints do not exist and had not existed. My own personal knowledge of yourself and many of the officers in your department and in the field corroborates that conviction and makes me absolutely confident that the public apprehensions which have been created are groundless. I wish to convey to you here the assurance of my entire faith that the system of military justice, both in its structure as organized by the statutes of Congress and the President's regulations and in its operation as administered during the war, is essentially sound.

But it is not enough for me to possess this faith and this conviction. It is highly important that the public mind should receive ample reassurance on the subject. And such reassurance has become necessary, because all that the public has thus far received is the highly colored press reports of certain extreme statements, and the congressional speeches placing on record certain supposed instances of harsh and illegal treatment. The War Department and its representatives have not been in a position to make any public defense or explanation and have refrained from doing so. The opportunity recently afforded the members of your staff to appear before the Senate Committee on Military Affairs has been an ample one, and it has furnished, I hope, entire satisfaction to the members of that committee. But of the proceedings of that committee I perceived no general public notice; the testimony, when published, will be somewhat voluminous, and its publication will not take place for some time yet, and it will certainly not reach the thousands of intelligent men and women who read the original accounts. And yet it is essential that the families of all those young men who had a place in our magnificent Army should be reassured. They must not be left to believe that their men were subjected to a system that did not fully deserve the terms "law" and "justice." And this need of reassurance on the part of the people at large is equally felt, I am sure, by the Members of Congress in both Houses, who have, of course, not yet become acquainted with the proceedings before the Senate committee. It is both right and necessary that the facts should be furnished. It is indeed a simple question of furnishing the facts; for when they are furnished, I am positive that they will contain the most ample assurance.

Those facts are virtually all in your possession, on record in your office. I am aware that they are voluminous and that a complete explanation and answer to every specific complaint is impracticable. But I believe that you are in a position to make a concise survey of the entire field and to furnish the main facts in a form which will permit ready perusal by the intelligent men and women who are so deeply interested in this subject.

I have been asked by a Member of the House of Representatives to furnish him with such a statement. And I am now calling upon you to supply it to me at your early convenience.

Faithfully, yours,

NEWTON D. BAKER,
Secretary of War.

To Maj. Gen. E. H. CROWDER,
Judge Advocate General, War Department, Washington, D. C.

LETTER OF THE JUDGE ADVOCATE GENERAL.

MARCH 10, 1919.

DEAR MR. SECRETARY: On March 1, 1919, you addressed to me a letter concerning the recent criticisms uttered upon our system of military justice, and asking me to make a concise survey of the entire field and to furnish the main facts in a form which will permit ready perusal by the intelligent men and women who are so deeply interested in the subject. On March 8 I replied to you, giving you a brief and concise survey of the field of controversy; but the limitations of that letter made it impracticable for me to deal with the subject in all its scope. The subject is one in which it needs only to set forth the facts, based on the records of my office, in order to perceive the injustice of the charges that have been made. This exposition of facts must be directed to each one of the main charges that have been voiced on the floor of Congress and in the press.

In my first letter to you, dated February 13, forwarded by you to the chairman of the Senate Committee on Military Affairs, and subsequently printed in the Official Bulletin of March 5, the six general criticisms voiced by Senator Chamberlain were dealt with at great length by statistical tables compiled from the records in my office. But these tables are, perhaps, too voluminous for ordinary perusal; and, on the other hand, the letter did not deal with a number of other specific criticisms made by other Members of Congress in the press. I have, therefore, gone over the entire subject so as to include a number of additional points of criticism, and have dealt with the specific points of Senator Chamberlain by omitting the elaborate statistical studies contained in my first letter.

It is my belief that the intelligent public, particularly the members of the legal profession and of the press, would welcome such an exposition of the facts; because the case is one in which it is necessary only to peruse the facts in order to estimate at their true value the criticisms, made in haste and based upon such imperfect and misleading data.

Before proceeding to set forth these facts, I will take a few words to indicate my own attitude toward the standards of military justice.

In 1888, while still a Lieutenant of Cavalry, some years before I entered the Judge Advocate General's Department by detail, I addressed a letter to Col. G. Norman Lieber, then Acting Judge Advocate General, inviting attention to the necessity for a revision of the military code. Col. Lieber declined to take up the matter, fearing that the code might suffer in essential features by a revision which might adapt it too much to the methods and traditions of civil practice. Again in 1896, noticing that Congress had enacted a statute for the revision of all statutes, and knowing that the commission appointed under the terms of that statute would necessarily consider the Articles of War, I addressed a second letter to the then Gen. Lieber, Judge Advocate General, asking his attention to the opportunity this afforded to secure a proper revision of the Articles of War. He again declined to take up the matter, remarking that he felt that the code needed very little, if any, revision, and that if he had the entire responsibility of revising it he would limit himself to the eliminating of obsolete articles and a rearrangement of the code. Again in 1903, while Chief of the First Division of the General Staff, I prepared a draft of revision of the military code and submitted it to the Secretary of War in December of that year for his recommendation to Congress. This came to nothing. In 1911, upon becoming Judge Advocate General, I renewed my efforts, which continued for the ensuing five years and through three Congresses. The revision of 1916 was the culmination of this series of proposals. This record, therefore, must be some testimony to the fact that my attitude toward the improvement of the military code has been an advanced one, at least in comparison with the attitude of others whose authority was superior to mine ie, and that these convictions of mine are publicly on record for a at least 30 years past.

w facts will indicate that I am, at any rate, not one who has been ith anything less than the highest standards of justice for embodiment of military law: and that my constant and urgent efforts have been maintaining those standards and to improving their code whenever to me to fall short of those standards. It was with this spirit that proceeded with the administration of military justice when this tered the Great War, and the American Army, enlarged manifold, n to put our system to such a test as it had never before experienced ire history. The staff of the Judge Advocate General was gradually rom about 30 officers to more than ten times that number; and all of dge advocates were, of course, taken direct from civil practice, with o experience in the military practice of the National Guard. Thus nee was plain that the spirit and traditions of the criminal common all its safeguards for the accused and of its guaranties of full and would dominate in the work of the judge advocates.

on these facts as demonstrating that it is humanly improbable that of things, even remotely justifying some of the extreme epithets sed in public criticism, could have existed in our Army during the ars.

urther digress for a moment to state the extent of my own personal ity for the administration of military justice during the last two ointed Judge Advocate General February 15, 1911, and reappointed piration of the first term of four years in 1915, I was in active charge e of the Judge Advocate General from the outset of the war to the 17. In the meantime, on May 22, 1917, I was detailed as Provost eneral and vested with the execution of the selective draft. I time during the remainder of 1917 between the two series of duties, intime Brig. Gen. S. T. Aswell, as senior officer on duty in the Judge eneral's Office, after August, 1917, acted upon a large share of the without submission to myself. In February, 1918, a branch office of Advocate General's Office was established in France and Brig. Gen. er was appointed as Acting Judge Advocate General in that position. er, 1917, at your request, I arranged to divide my time about equally he Office of the Judge Advocate General and that of the Provost eneral; but Gen. Ansell continued to have detailed supervision over of military justice. Later, viz, during the months of May and parts of April and July, Gen. Ansell was absent in France on inspec- and during his absence Col. J. J. Mayes was senior officer and all details of administration of military justice. The remainder of July, Gen. Ansell again became senior officer in charge of that sub- while the Military Justice Division of the office had been enlarged mprise nearly 50 officers on duty in Washington. Thus during the rter of 1917 and the whole of 1918 the rulings upon individual court- ses did not come to my personal attention, except in rare instances, it usually bear my signature. Nor were the rules of the administra- r as framed in my office during that period, personally framed or on by myself, with a few important exceptions to which I will later wish to make clear is that, so far as my active approval or disap- concerned, there was no time during the latter part of 1917 and the 918 when a court-martial ruling or a rule of practice could not have e or put into effect by the senior officer in supervisory charge of justice, without personal submission to myself. More specifically, of the above-named senior officers found reason sufficient to himself ie practice in any detail or to disapprove any individual court-martial he was in a position to exercise free responsibility to do so without oval of myself. An important exception to this statement is the rule- General Order No. 7, 1918, of which later explanation will be made. s circumstance, that I was not personally responsible for the details stration of military justice during the above period and that another s thus responsible, does not, of course, alter the fact that up to the t of 1917 I did share completely that personal responsibility. More- tever my personal responsibility, or lack of it, for individual meas- ourt-martial rulings, I am, of course, responsible for the structure and of military justice as they existed at the time of our entrance into the war—responsible, that is, in so far as the Judge Advocate General's views were consulted by the Secretary of War and by Congress in the framing of the statutes and the regulations, and in so far as those statutes and regulations were enforced in the field and in my office. And it is because of that responsibility, and because of my firm belief in the merits and high standards of our system of military law, that I am now concerned in pointing out the facts which vindicate it from the recently published reproaches. Regardless of my share of responsibility during 1917 and 1918 for the operation of the system, I could not have performed the duties of that office up to that period without being vitally interested in vindicating the honor of the Army and War Department as involved in the maintenance of that system.

I propose now, first, to refer to certain individual cases recently criticised; next, to comment on the general defects alleged to exist in the system of military justice; and then to close with some recommendations.

(I) Individual cases cited for criticism.—In the recent speeches uttered on the floor of Congress, in the two or three press articles, and in some of the testimony given before the Senate committee and published in the press, certain individual cases of court-martial judgments are cited as notable instances of injustice.

In this letter it is virtually impossible for me to set forth the explanation that can be made for each of these cases. The majority of them are cases in which the sentence is said to be excessively severe; on this general topic of severity I will later offer what needs to be said. Other cases are supposed to be marked by some other form of injustice or illegality. To comment adequately on all these and other cases, which from time to time may be cited, would here be needless and impracticable. I have, therefore, gathered all these cases in an appendix which schedules each case thus cited and makes such explanation as our records afford; and this schedule of individual cases I will file with you for reference. In the meantime, I think that I can allay the apprehensions that have been excited by the public allusion to these cases if I take two or three of the most typical and show how groundless are the criticisms.

This first case cited in a speech in the Senate is that of a soldier at Camp Gordon (record No. 110595, tried January 24, 1918), who, while patrolling the town as military police, was found at midnight in a shop just after a burglary. Being charged with burglary, he asserted that he had entered the shop in search of the burglars. His story was disbelieved, and he was found guilty: the first finding had been not guilty, but at the commanding officer's request there was a reconsideration, and the second finding was guilty. On revision of the record no legal error could be found, but this office reached the opinion that though there was sufficient evidence to sustain the finding, the evidence did not go so far as to show his guilt beyond a reasonable doubt. In such a situation no supreme court in the United States (with three or four exceptions only) would interfere and set aside a jury's verdict. Nevertheless, this office recommended a reconsideration of the verdict by the reviewing authority. It was in fact reconsidered, but the reviewing authority adhered to the finding. But the feature for emphatic notice is that reconsideration was given, not by exercising the "arbitrary discretion of a military commander," but by referring the case to the judge advocate of the command, as legal adviser. The judge advocate wrote an elaborate review of the evidence, disagreeing with the view of this office and recommending confirmation, and the commanding general followed this opinion of his law officer.

This case, therefore, instead of being, as the critic had been led to believe, an illustration of "the control which the military commander exercises over the administration of civil justice," illustrates exactly the opposite. For, in the first place, the confirmation of the sentence was made, not by the arbitrary military discretion of the commanding officer, but upon the legal opinion of his judge advocate; and, in the second place, the reconsideration which was actually given by the judge advocate, on the point of proof beyond a reasonable doubt, was a measure of protection which the law does not provide in any civil court in the United States for the control of a jury's verdict. The case is a good illustration of a feature in which the system of military justice sometimes does even more for the accused than the system of civil justice.

Another case cited on the floor of Congress is one of disobedience to orders to drill and of having seditious literature in possession for distribution. The offender was a conscientious objector who had not been given an opportunity for noncombatant service and who was not attempting nor intending to distribute the literature. The sentence was death; but the critic adds that it was "disapproved by the President and the prisoner discharged," and he expresses t "the President will exercise the same clemency and show the same in many other cases." Now, the facts of the record demonstrate the opposite of what the critic was led to believe; because in this case (No. 116790, tried June 17, 1918) it was not the President's clemency that freed the prisoner; it was the effective operation of that very system of law which the critic supposes not to exist. What happened was that the Advocate General's Office recommended disapproval of the sentence on strictly legal grounds that the order to drill was (under General Order No. 8, 1918) not a lawful command, and his disobedience was therefore an offense; and that there was no evidence of the accused's intention to desert from the literature. The sentence was therefore disapproved and the soldier was discharged on the legal grounds stated by my office. This case, therefore, illustrating the critic's thesis, rather affords an illustration of the operation of military law and justice in entire analogy to that of civil law.

The case, cited in the newspaper article read into the Congressional Record, vol. 57, No. 44, Jan. 23, 1918, p. 1988), concerns two soldiers imposed in France for sleeping on post in a front-line trench. Actually three distinct questions involved in those cases—first, whether the death in all cases of this offense should be the inexorable policy; second, if not, these particular cases showed sufficient extenuating circumstances; and, thirdly, whether the cases were fairly and fully tried to meet the facts.

As to the first question it is enough here to say that Gen. Pershing especially for the importance of adopting this policy for the protection of his Army's discipline.

His chief law officer concurred in this message; and that under the circumstances no one could have been criticized for acceding to this policy and adhering to the principle handed down by all the fixed laws of military law. I myself, as you know, was at first disposed to follow the urgent recommendation of Gen. Pershing, but continued reflection led me to withdraw from that extreme view, and some days before the case was presented for your final action the record contained a recommendation favoring clemency in the direction of clemency.

As to the second question it can be stated that, except for the youth of the offenders (they were about 20 years of age), there were no special extenuating circumstances. The task laid upon these soldiers was no greater in its exactness than was laid upon hundreds of others at the very same moment in the line doing duty in the trenches. The Chief of Staff's memorandum recommended clemency with great force:

"The American Expeditionary Force is confronted by the most alert and dangerous enemy known in the history of the world. The safety not only of the company but of the entire command is absolutely dependent on the performance of his duties as a sentinel. The safety of that command is in equal measure upon the prompt and complete obedience of the soldiers to the lawful commands of their superior officers. There is no doubt that the members of this court had had the necessity for the alertness of the duties of a sentinel strongly impressed upon them at the time of the commission of those offenses. Before daylight on the morning of November 3, 1917, the first attack by the Germans upon the American position took place. A salient near Artois, which was occupied by Company F, 5th Infantry, was raided by the Germans, who killed 3 of our men and 11, and captured and carried off 11 more. The very next night—on the night of November 3-4, 1917—Pvt. Sebastian was found sleeping on his post and on the night of the 5th Pvt. Cook was found sleeping on his post. Both of these men belonged to the regiment which had suffered in the battle of the 2d and 3d. This condition of affairs presented an absolute necessity not only to that portion of the line held by the American troops, but to the troops in the adjacent sectors."

The decision to exercise clemency was a sound one I do not doubt. But a reader of the record could look upon these cases as anything but a simple instance of the inevitable mental conflict that arises between the stern duties of war discipline and the natural human sympathy for men who have incurred the death penalty—a conflict which equally agitates every soldier and every civil executive when such a case is presented for his consideration. It is unconscionable that this situation should be cited as a peculiarity of our military system.

As to the third question—whether the case was fairly and fully tried so as to establish the facts—would require too extended a survey for giving all the details here. I content myself with assuring you (what you indeed know already) that the record was scrutinized by several of the most experienced judge advocates of my staff, as well as by myself personally; and that, although the cases were not tried as thoroughly as they could and should have been tried, where the death penalty was involved, nevertheless no reversible error was found and there was no doubt of the facts in either case. The only issue in this case was the severity of the sentence, as above mentioned.

These illustrations must suffice for the present to show how unreliable have been the public citations of individual cases of supposed injustice. What the source of information has been for each of these cases I am not aware. But I believe that I am justified in assuring you that it would be a mistake for the intelligent public to assume, when an individual case of supposed injustice is cited, that there is necessarily any ground for believing that injustice has been done. The information seems to have come from such partisan sources, and there are so many hundreds, that it is natural to find the details gradually altering themselves, in transmission, so that the case as stated becomes one of obvious injustice, and yet the case in its actual facts was nothing of the kind. How unreliable are these citations of supposed cases of injustice can be seen in the circumstances that out of the several scores of cases recently cited in a speech on the floor of the House (Cong. Rec., Feb. 22, p. 4640) and cited with the detail of general court-martial number and place of trial and name, it has thus far proved impossible to find and identify more than a small fraction of the cases in the records of this office owing to errors in the citations.

I must, therefore, so far as individual cases are concerned, content myself with giving you the assurance first that this office is ready and anxious to investigate and supply full explanation for every case that can be identified; and, secondly, that so far as such investigation has thus far been able to be made the cases, with few exceptions, reveal that they merited no such public statement.

What is really at issue, however, is the general state of things in the administration of military justice; i. e., whether there do exist specific shortcomings of law or of method which in themselves permit and have permitted the doing of injustice in any appreciable fraction of cases. It is to that real issue that I now address myself.

(II) General principles and methods in military justice.—Assembling the various criticisms of a general nature they seem to be reducible to the following heads:

1. That the general treatment of accused soldiers is not according to the rigid limitations of law as embodied in the Criminal Code, but is according to the arbitrary discretion of the commanding officer in each case.

2. That the military Criminal Code itself is not modern and enlightened, but is an archaic code which systematically belongs to medieval times.

3. That a soldier may be put on trial by a commanding officer's arbitrary discretion without any preliminary inquiry into the probability of the charge.

4. That commanding officers do thus put on trial a needlessly large number of trivial charges.

5. That the court-martial is composed of and the defense is conducted by men not acquainted with military law.

6. That the judge advocate combines incongruously the functions of prosecutor, judicial adviser of the court, and defender of the accused.

7. That second lieutenants "knowing nothing of law and less than nothing of court-martial procedure" are assigned to the defense of "enlisted men charged with capital or other most serious offenses."

8. That a plea of guilty is received from an accused on a charge for which the sentence of death may be imposed.

9. That commanding generals, as reviewing authorities, send back for reconsideration judgments of acquittal.

10. That the judgment of the court is kept secret until after the action of the reviewing authority is taken, even when the initial judgment is an acquittal.

11. That the sentences imposed by courts-martial are as a rule excessively severe.

12. That the sentences imposed by courts-martial are variable for the same offense.

13. That the Judge Advocate General's office either partakes in the attitude of severity or makes no attempt to check it by revisory action.

14. That the action taken in the Judge Advocate General's office is ineffectual to enforce military law and procedure, because its rulings do not have the force of a Supreme Court mandate, but are only recommendatory, and are either ignored by the division commanders or vetoed by the Chief of Staff.

I will now take up these assertions briefly in succession.

1. That the general treatment of accused soldiers is not according to the rigid limitations of law as embodied in the Criminal Code, but is according to the arbitrary discretion of the commanding officer in each case.

The complete refutation of this assertion will appear very plainly in the answers to the other specific criticisms, which are merely details of this general charge; but in order to gather the full force of the answers which will be made to those more specific criticisms it is necessary to keep in mind the general structure and machinery of the military courts. It may be supposed that the intelligent public in general is not aware of their essentially legal nature and procedure. The public impression perhaps has been gained that there is substantial correctness in the language of one of the Members of Congress:

"The records of the courts-martial in this war show that we have no military law or system of administering military justice which is worthy of the name of law or justice; we have simply a method of giving effect to the more or less arbitrary discretion of the commanding officer."

As a concrete demonstration of the incorrectness of this assertion, the facts, later to be cited, taken directly from the records of courts-martial appealed to by the critic, must suffice as a principal refutation.

And yet the critic's remarks call for more than the citation of concrete facts to the contrary.. The substance of my counterassertion is that although the theory of military justice does differ slightly from the theory of civil justice, yet in substance and in practice both of them, in our inherited Anglo-American system, are fundamentally identical, in that justice is founded upon and strictly limited by the requirements and safeguards of strict rules of law.

The only kernel of correctness in the abstract statement made in Congress is that the theory of military justice is in its general purpose somewhat different from the theory of civilian criminal justice. The contrast of theory between the two is well set forth in a statement of Gen. William T. Sherman, made 30 years ago, in discussing our Articles of War. He says:

"The object of civil law is to secure to every human in a community the maximum of liberty, security, and happiness, consistent with the safety of all. The object of military law is to govern armies composed of strong men, so as to be capable of exercising the largest measure of force at the will of the Nation."

This definition of Gen. Sherman shows that the objects to be attained are different, in that military justice aims to make the man a better soldier or to eliminate him from the military organization if he can not be improved, while civilian justice looks to the ultimate protection of the community at large.

But, once this difference of theory and purpose is conceded, the two systems proceed in identical method, viz, by the application of strict rules and regulations so drawn as to give equal and fair treatment to all men, and to protect them against mere arbitrary discretion on the one hand, and the inflexible rigor of automatic penalties on the other hand.

The former end is obtained by a system of courts, procedure, and definition of offenses which contains the counterpart of civil justice in virtually every respect; and the latter aim, viz, to protect the offender from the harsh consequence of rigid penalties, is secured by the method of indeterminate sentences for virtually all military sentences. In a few words, let me set forth the way in which this system operates.

The system of courts, procedure, and defined offenses is one of law and order and not one of arbitrary discretion of the commanding officer. The proceedings follow the fundamentals of our criminal common law—the accused has his challenges; he may have process for his witnesses; he has counsel without cost, either selected by himself or assigned by the proper authority; he is not compelled to testify against himself; he is furnished on request a copy of the testimony and proceedings. The proceedings are so conducted as to preserve for scrutiny of a superior authority every point of law that can be raised for the protection of the accused. This record of proceedings goes up to the reviewing authority and then to the Judge Advocate General. The Judge Advocate General's rulings on revision represent all those legal principles which are required by law and regulations to be observed. How completely legalistic is this scrutiny of the trial record can best be shown by reproducing here from Form No. 16 the fundamental points to be observed in every general court-martial trial before it receives approval in the Judge Advocate General's Office. This form is known as Form No. 16, and upon the initial examination of the record these questions must all be answered, before sending the case to the Chief of the Division of Military Justice:

- Was court ordered by proper authority?
- Are all orders showing membership of court properly entered in record?
- Does record show place, date, and hour court convened?
- Are all members of court, judge advocate, and assistant judge advocate accounted for as present or absent?
- Was accused given opportunity to introduce counsel?
- Was reporter sworn?
- Was interpreter sworn?
- Was accused extended right of challenge as to each member of court?
- Was action of court upon challenges regular and properly taken?
- Was the court sworn?
- Was the judge advocate sworn?
- Was the assistant judge advocate sworn?
- Was the accused properly arraigned?
- Are charges and specifications and name of officer signing charges copied into record?
- Was the trial within statute of limitations?
- Are pleas of accused regularly entered?
- Were the witnesses sworn?
- Are the findings properly entered?
- Is the record properly authenticated?
- Is the action of reviewing authority properly entered in record and signed?
- In case of adjournment or continuance, are each day's proceedings properly signed by judge advocate?
- After each adjournment during trial is presence or absence of members of court, judge advocate, assistant judge advocate, accused, his counsel, and reporter properly accounted for?
- Did all members who participated in proceedings in revision vote on original findings and sentence?
- Were pleas of guilty properly explained by president of the court?
- Were rights of accused as a witness properly extended and explained?
- Does each specification state an offense under the Articles of War?
- Are the findings legal?
- Is the sentence legal?
- Does the evidence sustain the findings of the court?
- Is the action of the reviewing authority legal and properly taken?
- Does any ruling of the court on the admission of evidence or other matters affect the substantial rights of accused?
- Did the court have jurisdiction of person and offense?

Such are the fundamental points of law which must first be verified before the record proceeds further in the office. But this is only the beginning of the scrutiny. The Office of the Judge Advocate General in the Division of Military Justice is divided into several sections according to the nature of the sentence imposed, viz., disciplinary barracks cases, retained in service cases, penitentiary cases, death and dismissal of officers cases. In the first two branches, including the minor sentences, the case is initially verified and approved or disapproved by one officer; the allotted number during the greater part of 1918 was 10 majors in this branch; the record then goes to the chief of the section. Thus two officers under the Judge Advocate General must pass upon cases of this class. The same is true of the section dealing with sentences not including dishonorable discharge (retained in service). In both these classes of cases written opinions are prepared only where the cases involve some new or important point of law or some serious irregularity or an unduly severe sentence. In the third section, that of penitentiary cases, to which six majors are allotted, the written opinion is required in every case; one officer prepares this opinion, and it then passes to the chief of the section for his approval; if both officers approve, it then passes to the board of review, consisting of three other officers, acting as an appellate court, each of whom must concur in approval of the opinion (or note his dissent) before the opinion is transmitted to the Chief of the Division of Military Justice; finally, the opinion must be approved by the chief of that division. Thus, for cases of penitentiary sentences, six officers must have scrutinized the case and concurred in or dissented from the final opinion before its submission for signature to the Judge Advocate General. In the fourth section, dealing with cases where the sentence is death or (for an officer) dismissal, again a written opinion is required in every case, and in this instance the chief of the section, upon receiving that opinion, assigns it to a second officer, who makes an independent examination and review; if the second officer concurs in the first opinion, the chief of the section may then approve it and send it further upward; but if the second officer does not concur, the case is handed to a third officer for examination; not until two officers concur in an opinion does the chief of the section accept it and approve it and send it onward; it then arrives at the board of review, where each of the three officers on the board of review must concur in the final opinion; it then goes in to the Chief of the Military Justice Division for his sanction. Subject to office changes in procedure from time to time, the foregoing is substantially the course of examination of court-martial cases which has been in vogue heretofore in my office. Thus in these most serious cases seven officers must have passed upon the case before it arrives finally for the signature of the Judge Advocate General. Moreover, the board of review is a double one, like some appellate courts, having two branches, each composed of three officers; during the past six months or more these six officers represent one former chief justice of a State supreme court (who resigned his office to become judge advocate), one former justice of nine years' incumbency on the Philippine Island Supreme Court, two professors of criminal law from leading universities, who have been between 15 and 20 years at the bar, and two other eminent practitioners of equal or longer legal experience before their appointment as judge advocates. It may be safely asserted that in no State of the Union is any more thorough scrutiny given to the record of a criminal case than is given in my office, and that in most State supreme courts the scrutiny does not approach in thoroughness the methods here employed.

Moreover, it should also be kept in mind that the accused under the system of military justice enjoys an advantage which does not exist in civil justice, viz, the automatic appellate examination of every serious case. In civil justice there is no appellate or revisory action unless the accused has the moral aggressiveness to insist upon it, and possesses the money (or the friends who will contribute the money) to print the record of the case and to retain counsel who will argue the case on appeal. But every soldier is assured not only of an automatic appeal, as a safeguard against illegal or unfair condemnation, but also of a double appeal in serious cases. The proceedings (except in case of inferior courts, corresponding to petty police courts, and having power to impose only short sentences of imprisonment) are taken down verbatim, and every word of the testimony, every ruling of the court, and every claim of counsel is submitted, first, to the reviewing authority in the field. This authority is the commanding general who appointed the court and who in all serious cases (practices vary somewhat in the different divisions) submits the case to the judge advocate of the division for a quasi judicial opinion. This judge advocate, having the rank of a major or lieutenant colonel, has been, since September, 1917, in almost every instance a lawyer fresh from civil life, chosen for his high standing, and imbued with the standards and traditions of civil practice rather than those of the Regular Army; hence, likely to give fully as careful scrutiny as a civilian judge would give. If the reviewing authority approves the judgment, it then goes on, if a general court-martial case, to the Judge Advocate General at Washington for the second appellate scrutiny (if in France, to the Paris branch office of the Judge Advocate General's Office); the method of scrutiny in this office has been above described. It goes finally to the Judge Advocate General or to the senior officer acting as Judge Advocate General for military justice, who appends his signature if satisfied. Every general court-martial case thus obtains thorough scrutiny in two separate stages.

Putting together these features of the automatic appeal and the thorough scrutiny of all general court-martial cases by at least three superior officers, and in some classes of cases by eight superior officers, before final disposal, it is believed that no such guaranties for the protection of the accused, in the scrutiny of the trial courts' judgment in criminal cases, exist in any civilian system in the United States. I take consolation in believing that if the public at large and particularly the families of those men who have been subjected to military discipline during the past two years could realize the thoroughness of this system they would feel entirely satisfied that the system is calculated in its method to secure ultimate justice for every man; and that the instances where this result is not obtained must be exceptional only. In the foregoing description I have tried to make it possible for the intelligent civilian to visualize the military procedure as it really is, and not as it exists in the fervid imagination of those who do not know it and have never tried to understand it.

The other chief stage in military justice, viz, the stage of the serving of the sentence, has for its aim, as already stated, to protect the offender from the harsh or unequal consequences of a rigid system of penalties. It attains this end by a method of indeterminate (or probationary) sentences. It is not generally known, I presume, that the only War Department prisons to-day in the United States are the three so-called Disciplinary Barracks, viz, at Fort Leavenworth, Kans., at Fort Jay, Governors Island, N. Y., and at Alcatraz, San Francisco, in which are served substantially all sentences of imprisonment for military offenses other than the short terms (less than six months) served in the camp guardhouse. In these disciplinary barracks every sentence is indeterminate as to its minimum, i. e., virtually a probationary sentence for every man whose offense is not so heinous as to require immediate separation from the Army. Speaking generally, soldiers convicted of purely military offenses, i. e., desertion, mutiny, absence without leave, disobedience to officers, assaulting an officer, etc., are sent to these barracks; the penitentiary being used (except in rare and heinous cases) only for those offenses involving murder, forgery, embezzlement, or other civil crimes. The indeterminate or probationary sentence having no minimum, only a maximum, the confinement may be terminated at any time, and the offender (except in the unusual case where a sentence of dishonorable discharge has not been suspended) may be restored to duty in the Army whenever his record of intelligence and good conduct justifies the commandant of the disciplinary barracks in so recommending; and hundreds, if not thousands, of offenders have been so restored since the beginning of the war.

I can not forbear, at this moment, to cite as an illustration an incident recently told by the commandant of the Fort Leavenworth Barracks, while attending the conference lately held in your office on prison discipline. He cited the case of an enlisted man who had been sentenced to two years for desertion. Arriving at the disciplinary barracks on March 8, 1916, he soon acknowledged the error of his former conduct, went into the disciplinary battalion, and was restored to duty within nine months; was assigned to the Sixty-fourth Infantry at El Paso, became successively corporal, battalion sergeant major, and regimental sergeant major; landed in France March 15, 1918; anxious to get into the fighting, he began again, at his own request, at the bottom, as private in another unit; was made sergeant and fought at Chateau-Thierry in July, 1918; was sent to an officers' training camp, commissioned as second lieutenant on October 1, 1918, was promoted to first lieutenant on October 28, and ended on armistice day in command of Company L, One hundred and thirty-eighth Infantry. He wrote to the commandant a few months ago, recounting his history, and ending thus: "There is only one question which I have to ask: Do you consider that I have made a success?" And yet the entire period of time which had elapsed since his original sentence was less than three years. In other words, though sentenced for a period of two years, he had been released from confinement, restored to duty, and traveled up through the grades of noncommissioned officer and had earned promotion through two grades of the commissioned officer, and occupied an honorable status in the Army, within a few months after the nominal period of his original sentence had expired.

This incident illustrates somewhat prematurely what I shall have later to say about the length of some of these apparently severe sentences. But the incident here illustrates what I am concerned to emphasize, viz., that military justice possesses in its indeterminate sentence and its probationary methods a system that is in advance of that of probably any State of the Union. I am given to believe that very few of our States yet possess a law authorizing this indeterminate sentence with no minimum. Our disciplinary barracks should indeed be thought of as a reform school, rather than a prison; it corresponds to the term "industrial school" as used in some States. And I need hardly point out that the disciplinary barracks at Fort Leavenworth are totally distinct from the United States Penitentiary at Leavenworth. And I remember that you yourself recently stated informally at the above mentioned conference of officials that in your opinion the disciplinary barracks at Fort Leavenworth was the best penal institution in the United States. Without claiming any personal credit for its excellent administration, I must here, as some sort of proof of my own deep and long-standing interest in enlightened military justice, take the liberty of reminding you that the probationary system, as exemplified at the disciplinary barracks, was initiated in 1913, on my own personal recommendation, two years after my first appointment as Judge Advocate General; and that the act of March 4, 1915, which transformed the formerly so-called United States military prison at Fort Leavenworth into the United States disciplinary barracks, and organized the modern system of probationary detention for military offenders, was drafted at my instance. Space does not permit me to describe more fully its methods of vocational training and of psychological and psychiatric study and attention given to all prisoners there confined. I will only mention that Maj. King, now Lieut. Col. King, who was for a long time stationed at the Fort Leavenworth barracks, and whose genius I encouraged and supported in applying his practical methods, is an officer of the Regular Army of the United States; and that the elaborate psychiatric attention given to military offenders sent there for detention is not paralleled, so far as I am aware, in any of the civilian penitentiaries now administered by the Federal Government, nor at most of the State penitentiaries.

This much ought in justice to be placed here on record, as information doubtless new to the intelligent American public, and yet calculated to assist in maintaining that public confidence in the military penal system to which it is justly entitled.

2. That the Military Criminal Code itself is not modern and enlightened, but is an archaic code which systematically belongs to medieval times.

Of this statement I can only remark that it is baseless. Those who have ignorantly repeated the statement may be perhaps extenuated for this utterance to the American people of a gross slander, not only upon the War Department and the military system, but also upon the Congress which so conscientiously revised the military code in 1916. But though extenuated they can not be exonerated; for the entire story, so plain that anyone can read, is contained in the introductory six pages to the Manual for Courts-Martial published in November, 1916, and printed with every one of the 250,000 copies that have been issued since that date. Those introductory pages state the entire history of the Articles of War, or Military Code; explain the revision of 1874, and enumerate the most fundamental of the changes introduced in the thorough revision of 1916. That introduction, however, does not state, and I will now add, that the revision of 1916 was pending in draft for four years before the Houses of Congress; that the draft was prepared in my office shortly after my appointment as Judge Advocate General; that it was founded on the most exhaustive consideration of the entire military code, as well as on a thorough comparison with the modern criminal law and its progressive tendencies; and that the hearings before the Military Affairs Committee (S. Rept. 229, 63d Cong., 2d sess., Feb. 6, 1914) showed the most conscientious discrimination of every detail; and that the testimony fills a volume of 146 pages.

The military criminal code of 1916 no more deserves the term "archaic" than the Revised Statutes of the United States under which the Federal courts since 1878 administered civil justice; and it is nearly 40 years later than the civil Revised Statutes. It represents the result of the most conscientious and constructive thought which could be brought to bear by the combined energies of the War Department and of the Congress of the United States in the year 1916.

That the experiences of this great war, with all its novel conditions, multiplying forty-fold the size of our military forces should have revealed nothing in the way of new lessons for improvement, is not for a moment to be asserted. In the light of that experience, which subjected the military code to a tremendous and unprecedented test, I readily admit that certain improvements, limited in number, have been demonstrated to be worth while introducing, and I shall conclude this letter with a suggestion of those improvements. But the statement repeatedly made, and published far and wide, that the military code of 1916 is "an archaic code which systematically belongs to medieval times" and does not "belong to this modern enlightened period," but rather "to the England of 200 years ago, whose criminal code of that time was marked by civil harshness and brutality," is not only a cruel and dangerous slander, but is nothing less than a reflection upon the Congress which so conscientiously consummated that great task.

3. That a soldier may be put on trial by a commanding officer's arbitrary discretion, without any preliminary inquiry into the probability of the charge.

Every system of penal justice has some method of insuring the exercise of caution by a responsible officer in scrutinizing an accusation before an accused is put to the necessity of defending himself by a formal trial. The traditional method inherited by us, in civilian justice, for serious offenses, is the presentment of a grand jury. This method has now proved cumbrous and ineffective; it has been abandoned in perhaps a majority of our States. The modern method of those States is a so-called information by the official State prosecutor, filed after such inquiry as he sees fit to make. This modern American method is the one to which France and other continental nations arrived some centuries ago, about the time when England developed the grand jury instead. This modern American method is also the one used in our courts-martial; it arrived in the Anglo-American military system some centuries ago, said to be by adoption from Scotland, which itself had adopted the French system; for the French were the great military nation of three centuries ago.

By this Anglo-American military system, some officer must file charges before any soldier can be tried. This protection is invariable. Often the judge advocate, as legal adviser, additionally scrutinizes a serious charge before it is filed. This is exactly the protection given by the State official prosecutor in the modern American method. How essential and thorough is this protection can only be appreciated by perusing the strict terms of the law and regulations. Paragraph 62 of the Manual of Courts-Martial reads:

"By the usage of the service all military charges should be formally preferred by—that is, authenticated by the signature of—a commissioned officer."

Paragraph 75 reads:

"Submission of charges.—All charges for trial by court-martial will be prepared in triplicate, using the prescribed charge sheet as a first sheet and using such additional sheets of ordinary paper as are required. They will be accompanied—

"(a) Except when trial is to be had by summary court, by a brief statement of the substance of all material testimony expected from each material witness, both those for the prosecution and those for the defense, together with all available and necessary information as to any other actual or probable testimony or evidence in the case; and

"(b) In the case of a soldier, by properly authenticated evidence of convictions, if any, of any offense or offenses committed by him during his current enlistment and within one year next preceding the date of the alleged commission by him of any offenses set forth in the charges.

"They will be forwarded by the officer preferring them to the officer immediately exercising summary court-martial jurisdiction over the command to which the accused belongs, and will by him and by each superior commander into whose hands they may come either be referred to a court-martial within his jurisdiction for trial, forwarded to the next superior authority exercising court-martial jurisdiction over the command to which the accused belongs or pertains, or otherwise disposed of as circumstances may appear to require."

Paragraph 76 proceeds:

"Investigation of charges.—If the officer immediately exercising summary court-martial jurisdiction over the command to which the accused belongs or pertains decides to forward the charges to superior authority, he will, before so doing, either carefully investigate them himself, or will cause an officer other than the officer preferring the charges to investigate them carefully and to report to him, orally or otherwise, the result of such investigation. The officer investigating the charges will afford to the accused an opportunity to make any statement, offer any evidence, or present any matter in extenuation that he may desire to have considered in connection with the accusation against him. (See par. 225 (b), p. 112.) If the accused desires to submit nothing, the indorsement will so state. In his indorsement forwarding the charges to superior authority the commanding officer will include: (a) The name of the officer who investigated the charges; (b) the opinion of both such officer and himself as to whether the several charges can be sustained; (c) the substance of such material statement, if any, as the accused may have voluntarily made in connection with the case during the investigation thereof; (d) a summary of the extenuating circumstances, if any, connected with the case; (e) his recommendation of action to be taken."

It will, therefore, be seen that the regulations require the strictest scrutiny by a responsible officer before any accused can be put on trial by a court-martial.

In one of the speeches uttered in Congress, occurs the following sentence:

"The commanding officer may, without any investigation of the circumstances, order a man tried by court-martial; in the French Army such cases are not sent to trial until investigation can determine whether the man ought to be tried."

How is it possible for such an assertion to be made, in the face of the law and regulations represented in the quotation above from paragraph 76 of the manual? The safeguard contained in our manual of military justice stands on exactly the same footing with the safeguard contained in the modern method of the State prosecutor, and of the French system as cited by the critics.

But whatever may be the law and the regulations, doubtless it may be asserted that the regulations are not obeyed in spirit. This is, in fact, the precise assertion made in one of the congressional utterances and to that assertion I now come.

4. That commanding officers do thus put on trial a needlessly large number of trivial charges.

It has been asserted that commanding officers direct the filing of trivial charges in excessively large numbers. The precise language is: "It is not surprising, under the circumstances, that there are too many trivial cases sent to trial by court-martial."

Let us examine this assertion in the light of the facts of military justice during the past year as shown by the records.

The United States military forces raised up to November 11, 1918, numbered some 4,186,000; of these about 290,000 were already in service at the opening of the war, of whom 127,000 were in the Regular Army. Thus over 90 per cent were new men, fresh from civilian life. It must be taken for certain that their unfamiliarity with military discipline and the novelty of its rigid restraints would produce an unusual proportion of minor breaches of discipline. In other words, if commanding officers had been merely as strict and rigorous as with the Regular Army before the war in pursuing minor breaches of discipline with court-martial charges, the ratio of trials would be at least as great and presumably far greater than before the war and the accession of the new army.

But the facts show, on the contrary, that commanding officers must have been far less strict and rigorous than before.

Let us take first the serious charges brought before general courts-martial. The printed report of the Judge Advocate General for the fiscal year 1918 shows that the total number of general court-martial trials in the Regular Army of 127,000 in the year ending June, 1917, was 6,200, or about one for every 20 men, while the total in the entire Army for the year ending June, 1918, was less than 12,000, or one for every 200 men (the military forces on May 31 numbering 2,415,000 and the average for the year not being ascertainable with accuracy); and during the last six months of 1918 the total was 7,624, or at the rate per annum of only one for every 275 men (the military forces on November 11, 1918, numbering 4,185,000). As to special courts-martial, for the lesser offenses, the number in the Regular Army for the year ending June, 1917, was 2,970, or one for every 42 men, while for the year ending June, 1918, it was 14,700, or only one for every 165 men on the above annual basis. Moreover, as between the Regular Army and National Guard and the National Army, or new drafted men, the number of general courts-martial for the year ending June, 1918, was 10,363 for the former and only 1,660 for the latter, or one for every 107 men in the Regular Army and National Guard (numbering on May 31, 1918, some 1,112,000, and composed in part of seasoned men), but only one in every 785 men for the National Army (numbering on May 31, 1918, some 1,303,000, and composed entirely of new drafted men), showing conclusively that commanding officers were more lenient and liberal with the men fresh from civilian life.

Turning now to the "trivial offenses" referred to in the above utterance, they are covered by the summary courts-martial, representing the extremely petty disciplinary penalties. The number of trials for the Regular Army, viz, 48,000 in 1917 (rising from an average of 38,000 for 10 years past, due to a proportionate increase in the size of the Regular Army), rose in the year ending June, 1918, to only 212,000, or slightly more than four times the number, although the entire military forces in the year ending June, 1918, rose to 2,415,000, or nineteen times the former size. In short, the petty disciplinary penalties dropped from a ratio of 1 to each 2.7 men to a ratio of 1 to each 11.4 men, or a decrease for 1918 to less than one-quarter of that of 1917.

There could be no more conclusive demonstration that commanding officers though faced with a situation full of inducement to rigor in enforcing discipline among raw and untrained men, did in fact use remarkable consideration and self-restraint in not resorting to the instrumentalities of courts-martial. The facts show, therefore, precisely the opposite of the conditions asserted on the floor of Congress.

5. That the court-martial is composed of and the defense is conducted by men not acquainted with military law.

It would, perhaps, be sufficient in refuting this criticism to point out that the court-martial, though it nominally combines in itself the functions of judge and jury, and though this combination is under military conditions absolutely unavoidable, has, nevertheless, as its essential and predominating function, that of a jury of fact. The court-martial listens to the testimony and makes findings of fact based upon the evidence. In our criminal common law it has always been regarded as a disadvantage that the jury should be technically skilled in the law; and it is a well-known practice of all experienced defenders in criminal cases to challenge and exclude from the jury members of the bar. Whether this belief is a sound one, I do not pretend to say; I only point out that the possession of legal knowledge by the jury is at least not considered vital in ordinary civil justice. In the practice of military justice the legal knowledge necessary to insure an obedience to the requirements of law as to the composition of court, the procedure, and the definition of the offenses charged is expected to be supplied primarily by the commissioned judge advocate, who acts as the judicial adviser of the reviewing authority. And the thorough scrutiny and review in the Office of the Judge Advocate General (a review, as already pointed out, more elaborate and thorough than is ordinarily supplied by any civil system) is especially calculated to insure an observance of all the rules of law. As the entire testimony is reported verbatim, including every point of law raised by objections of counsel, and as the application of all relevant rules of law must lie open to scrutiny on the face of the record, it is obvious that the court-martial's own lack of technical knowledge of law (in so far as it might exist in a given case) is amply made up, and more than made up, by the legal scrutiny supplied in the course of automatic appeal already described.

But in spite of these guaranties of legality for the court's action, the military system, none the less, takes all possible pains to insure an acquaintance with the law by the members of the tribunal. The entire military code, with an elaborate commentary and an appendix of forms, making a volume of 400 pages, and entitled "A Manual for Courts-Martial," is distributed in abundant quantities throughout the Army and forms a part of every military officer's education. Since 1916 more than 250,000 copies of this manual have been printed and distributed; in the month preceding the armistice in November, 1918, a new edition of 50,000 copies, revised to date, were being distributed throughout cantonments and camps in this country and to the divisions in the theater of war. Every officer of the Regular Army, during his four years in the Military Academy, must pass an examination in the course of military law. Every reserve officer who graduated from a training camp in 1917 and 1918 was equally obliged to study and pass an examination upon the Manual for Courts-Martial. Thus, a fair familiarity with the substantive and the procedural portions of military law is established as a part of every officer's military training. Moreover, the regular duties of almost every officer in active service oblige him to take his turn frequently either as a member of the court or as a judge advocate or as counsel for the defense. Thus there are probably few officers in the service who have not had a greater or less practical experience in the use of the military code, and who have not thus familiarized themselves with the operation of the system which they have already studied in the Manual for Courts-Martial.

In the closing portion of this letter I am proposing an expedient which will supply an additional guaranty of technical legal knowledge in the composition of the court in cases especially likely to involve serious, difficult, or complex questions of law. Apart from such exceptional cases I am of the firm opinion that, so far as the members of the court-martial can properly need an acquaintance with the military code they are in fact ordinarily equipped with enough of such knowledge, and that the efficacy of the guaranties for the observance of such rules of law does not depend, in the military system, upon the extent of the court-martial's legal knowledge (for they are essentially jurors of fact), but upon the legal knowledge of the commissioned (staff) judge advocate, who advises the reviewing authority, and of the commissioned (staff) judge advocates who scrutinize the record in the office of the Judge Advocate General by way of automatic appeal.

6. That the judge advocate combines incongruously the functions of prosecutor, judicial adviser of the court, and defender of the accused.

That the position of a judge advocate is a unique one may be conceded. A precise analogy does not exist in the civil system. This is because military conditions are not identical with civil conditions. But the assertion that the judge advocate combines incongruous functions which defeat each other or substantially impair his efficacy as a guardian of the military law must be emphatically denied.

The staff judge advocate is supposed to supply the professional and technical legal knowledge that is requisite to secure the observance of the law in all stages of the trial. Essentially he is a kind of superintendent of justice. From beginning to end his duty is to prevent the occurrence of illegalities. In this respect he aids the accused quite as much as he aids the prosecution; he has no more interest in securing a conviction than in securing an acquittal. He is, by his position, as impartial as is the Comptroller of the Treasury, whose principal function is to see that no moneys are paid out except according to law, irrespective of the persons to whom they are to be paid. In practice, during the present war, a commissioned judge advocate (whose rank is never less than that of major or lieutenant colonel) is attached to the staff of each commander of a division or a department or other large organization having a separate zone of jurisdiction. After a court-martial trial is ended and when the record arrives in the hands of the commanding general as reviewing authority, the judge advocate's main function in military justice is exercised; he reviews the record and advises the commanding general whether the trial has been conducted according to law in every respect; this includes the duty to advise whether the weight of evidence sustains the conviction regardless of legal error. In this aspect he is essentially an appellate judge, and it is his duty to enforce the law as fully on behalf of the accused as on the behalf of the Government. The judge advocate thus attached to the division commander's staff has other duties of legal advice corresponding to those of the Attorney General of the United States as legal adviser of the Government in all civil matters, but in military criminal justice his function is essentially judicial.

The misunderstanding which has led to the above criticism is doubtless based upon a confusion of the staff judge advocate with the trial judge advocate. The latter, who bears the same title, but who is not commissioned as a judge advocate, performs actually the duties of prosecuting attorney in an ordinary criminal case. This trial judge advocate is usually a junior officer and is detailed from any branch of the service (Infantry, Artillery, etc.), but not ordinarily from the Judge Advocate General's branch; i. e., he is not commissioned as a judge advocate, though he may have had legal experience in civil life. He is detailed anew for each separate court which may remain in session for some weeks or months. He therefore usually conducts a series of trials for a certain period in that division. But he is entirely distinct in personality from the staff judge advocate, who later acts as the judicial adviser of the reviewing authority. It may be confidently asserted that (except in a few special cases) no staff judge advocate attached as judicial advisor to the commanding general has acted during the present war as trial judge advocate (or prosecuting attorney) in a court-martial trial. The few exceptions to this statement occurred in special cases (such as the Houston riots and murders in 1917), where a staff judge advocate was specially detailed to conduct the prosecution, and where also the accused were aided by counsel consisting of specially detailed officers of high rank and legal experience or by civil counsel of their own choice, but in such case the judge advocate was brought in from a different department or division.

If this distinction be kept in mind, viz, the distinction between the staff judge advocate regularly attached as legal adviser to the staff of the reviewing authority, and the trial judge advocate specially detailed for the prosecution of general court-martial trials in the various units within the division, it will be perceived that these two functions are in practice exercised by different persons. The trial judge advocate does indeed perform the duty of prosecuting attorney; he is supposed to conduct the prosecution, not indeed with the ruthless partisanship frequently to be observed in civil prosecuting attorneys, yet with the thoroughness suitable to a proper performance of his duties. But the staff judge advocate, in whose hands the record of the trial subsequently arrives and who reviews the record and advises the reviewing authority as to its legality, is a different personage and is in no way hampered by having formerly acted as prosecuting attorney in the same case. Such has been the universal practice in our Army during the present war. It is believed that this plain statement of facts ought to suffice to remove that natural misapprehension which seems to have been founded on a confusion of the terms.

The necessity of furnishing some legal advice by a trained military officer on many complex aspects of law and the impracticability of allowing in the staff organization more than one officer for this purpose does indeed require the staff judge advocate occasionally to give legal advice in a composite capacity. Whether these few anomalous situations can be removed, with due regard to the necessities of military organization, is a problem that has often been discussed. On that point it is enough to say that the system which we now possess has substantially stood the test of time and experience. But so far as concerns the actual administration of military criminal justice, it ought to be plainly understood that military law does not tolerate the anomaly of expecting the same man to be both appellate judge and prosecutor, and that in the practice of the present war (as above pointed out) the trial judge advocate acting as prosecuting attorney in general courts-martial is a different person from the staff judge advocate regularly attached to the staff of the reviewing authority as a judicial officer and quasi appellate judge.

7. That second lieutenants, "knowing nothing of law and less than nothing of court-martial procedure," are assigned to the defense of "enlisted men charged with capital or other most serious offenses."

In commenting on this criticism I may dispose of one part of it, viz, the statement that these officers "know nothing of law and less than nothing of court-martial procedure," by referring to what I have already stated, namely, that graduates of every training camp have studied and passed an examination upon the Manual for Courts-Martial, and that, therefore, the above criticism is upon its face groundless. The roster of Army officers during the present war contains probably thousands of young men who have been admitted to the bar and enjoyed the benefit of a longer or shorter experience as practitioners. While no direct proof by statistics can be adduced, it is common knowledge that the commanding generals in the assignment of counsel (where the accused does not make his own selection) have usually sought to utilize the services of those officers who have already had legal experience. It would be impracticable to propose that no officer shall be assigned to the defense of an accused unless he is already qualified as a civilian lawyer. Given the composition of the officers' roster, all that can be expected under the circumstances is that commanding generals shall do their utmost to select men of those qualifications, if available within the unit; and I do not for a moment doubt that such was the constant endeavor of the appointing authorities.

The other part of this criticism is that in capital or other most serious offenses the defending counsel has been an officer of the lowest commissioned rank.

In so far as it seems to assert that the defending counsel in cases where a capital sentence was actually imposed have been second lieutenants, the complete facts could only be learned by a lengthy collation of all the records. But of the 21 records now available on file in which a capital sentence was imposed the defending counsel were as follows: In four cases a second lieutenant, in nine cases a first lieutenant, in six cases a captain (aided in three cases by a lieutenant), in one case by a chaplain, and in one case by a major.

In so far as the assertion refers, not to offenses in which a capital sentence was actually imposed, but in which the offense under the military code is liable to be punished with death, the assertion is to a large extent correct, although misleading. In time of peace all offenses (except one or two heinous ones, such as murder) are strictly limited by a small maximum period of imprisonment, which for strictly military offenses can not exceed 2½ years for ordinary desertion, and for civil offenses are graded according to the usual civil limitations, such as 10 years for burglary or manslaughter or robbery. But in time of war some military offenses may rise to a degree of danger vital to the safety of the Army, and therefore in time of war the death penalty is reserved in a number of military offenses as a possible maximum penalty. It is, I believe, a fact that the death penalty has been imposed by courts during this war in only 96 cases, of which approximately one-half were for military offenses; and that in all of these cases the death penalty for the military offenses was subsequently commuted or remitted. But it remains true that for the principal military offenses the death penalty is expressly authorized by the Articles of War to be imposed in time of war. In thousands of such offenses the penalty actually imposed (there being no minimum prescribed by the Articles of War) has been only a few months or perhaps a few years of imprisonment. In many of those cases it is true that the defense of the accused has been conducted by officers of the rank of second lieutenants. Just what proportion of cases this represents could not be stated without a complete and special examination of the 20,000 cases of general courts-martial arising since April 6, 1917.

But, assuming that the proportion is a substantial one, I must point out that the situation existing in the camps and in the theater of war presents almost insuperable obstacles to any other practice. The number of officers available for taking part in military trials is necessarily limited, for the active duties of military preparation and operation are obviously paramount. The main object of the Army is victory, not trials. Moreover, in the composition of the court it is plain that the prime requisite is to procure for the court itself the most experienced officers of adequate rank as a guaranty for the wisdom of their judgment. Having regard for both these considerations it therefore becomes a matter of great difficulty, if not impossibility, to secure for the conduct of the defense officers of equally high rank with the court. It is not to be denied that if it were feasible in every case to assign for the defense an officer of equal rank with the senior officer sitting upon the court this would be a desirable measure. But no one who has any acquaintance at all with conditions in the theater of war could suppose for a moment that this is practicable. Even as it is the organization of courts-martial makes already a serious drain on the efficiency of the strictly combatant work of the organization. The problem is a difficult one. It may be that some means can be devised for strengthening systematically the conduct of the defense in courts-martial in respect to the rank and experience of the officers so assigned. But that under the present war conditions it was feasible to obtain officers of higher rank in any considerable number must be denied.

Moreover, it is at this point that the military system offers a guaranty (not found in the civil system) of protection against the consequences of such inadequate defenses as may from time to time be found. The system of automatic appeals, already described, and the thorough scrutiny of the record given in the Office of the Judge Advocate General may be relied upon to supply that protection which in civil courts is usually given only by the skilled scrutiny of counsel for defense in the trial. Whatever point of law might have been made for accused's benefit by counsel's objection, and has failed to be made through his ignorance, can be and is habitually detected and enforced during this appellate scrutiny. The civil doctrine of utilizing only points raised by counsel's exceptions has no place in military appellate procedure. The officers of the Judge Advocate General's Office, as already shown above, scrutinize the record and insure the observance of those fundamental rules of law which ordinarily are watched over by counsel for defense, and if such rules of law are found not to have been observed the record is disapproved for legal error, regardless of whether counsel for defense took notice of it or not. Virtually this appellate review performs over again the functions of counsel for the defense, and, not only in technical duty but in actual spirit, this appellate review seeks to make good those deficiencies of defense which may become obvious to the experienced scrutiny of the appellate officer. It is in this appellate review that I find the most satisfactory assurance that such deficiencies as may have from time to time occurred through the inexperience of officers assigned for the defense have been adequately cured.

8. That a plea of guilty is received from an accused on a charge for which the sentence of death may be imposed.

I find it difficult to give a complete statement of facts in answer to this criticism, because a complete answer would require an examination of all the 20,000 records of general courts-martial since April 6, 1917, and such a complete examination can not be made in the time allotted me.

In what proportion of cases a plea of guilty has been received, and in what fraction of that proportion this offense has been one for which the death penalty might have been imposed, although not actually imposed, is impossible to say, but I firmly believe that the percentage is a small one. The common in-instincts of fairness and justice which form the motive for such a criticism are equally entertained by the same officers, taken recently from civilian life, who sit upon the courts as judges.

But if it be meant in the above assertion that when a plea of guilty has been received it has been customary or even frequent to forego the presentation of evidence by the prosecution, I can confidently assert that such cases have not occurred. The prosecution has seldom failed to adduce the requisite evidence: and whenever it has so failed, the reviewing authority has disapproved the record for such legal error. The Manual for Courts-Martial does not permit (except in the very minor cases) a plea of guilty to exempt a prosecutor from presenting his evidence. I quote from paragraph 154 of the Manual, page 72: it is obvious that if the injunctions of the Manual are observed (and the records show that they have been) a plea of guilty does not signify that the circumstances of the case were not thoroughly examined, with a view to ascertaining both the exact effect of the plea as well as the extenuating circumstances which might affect the sentence:

"In cases where the punishment is discretionary, a full knowledge of the circumstances attending the offense is essential to the court in measuring the punishment and to the reviewing authority on the sentence. In cases where the punishment is mandatory, a full knowledge of the attendant circumstances is necessary to the reviewing authority to enable him to comprehend the entire case and correctly judge whether the sentence should be approved or disapproved or clemency granted. The court should therefore take evidence after a plea of guilty, except when the specification is so descriptive as to disclose all the circumstances of mitigation or aggravation. When evidence is taken after a plea of 'guilty,' the witnesses may be cross-examined, evidence may be produced to rebut their testimony, and the court may be addressed by the prosecution or defense on the merits of the evidence and in extenuation of the offense or in mitigation of punishment. After a plea of guilty, the accused will always be given an opportunity to offer evidence in mitigation of the offense charged, if he desires to do so.

"In each case tried by a general court-martial in which the accused enters a plea of guilty in whole or in part as to any charge or specification the president of the court shall explain to him as to that part:

"First. The various elements which constitute the offense charged, as set forth in Chapter XVII, defining the punitive articles of war; and "Second. The maximum punishment which may be adjudged by the court for the offense to which he has pleaded guilty.

"The accused will then be asked whether he fully understands that by pleading guilty to such a charge or specification he admits having committed all the elements of the crime or offense charged and that he may be punished as stated. If he replies in the affirmative, the plea of guilty will stand; otherwise a plea of not guilty will be entered. The explanation of the president and the reply of the accused thereto shall appear in the record. The same rule will apply in cases tried by special court-martial when the evidence heard is made of record.

"When the accused pleads 'guilty' and, without any evidence being introduced, makes a statement inconsistent with his plea, the statement and plea will be considered together, and if guilt is not conclusively admitted the court will direct the entry of a plea of 'not guilty' and proceed to try the case on the general issue thus made. The most frequent instances of inconsistency are in cases involving a specific intent, as in desertion, larceny, etc. In such cases, where after a plea of guilty the accused makes a statement, the latter should be carefully scrutinized by the court, and if in the case of desertion in any part there is a statement that the accused had no intention of remaining away, that he expected to return when he had earned some money, or that when arrested he was on his way back to his organization, etc, or, in the case of larceny, that he intended to return the property alleged to have been stolen, etc., the court should direct the entry of a plea of 'not guilty,' but the criminality of an intent once formed is not affected by a subsequent change of intent."

9. That commanding generals, as reviewing authorities, send back for reconsideration judgments of acquittal.

This power undoubtedly does exist; and it is occasionally exercised. But only a brief explanation will be needed to show that it by no means signifies (as the criticism would imply) a subjection of the accused to injustice by placing the arbitrary discretion of the commanding officer outside and above the guaranties of lawful procedure.

The reviewing authority, i. e., ordinarily the commanding general who has convened the court, represents essentially a first appellate stage. No sentence of court-martial can be carried into execution until it has been approved by the reviewing authority, i. e., neither acquittal nor conviction is effective until the reviewing authority has scrutinized the record and given it approval. The very object of this institution is to secure the due application of the law, and to surround the accused with an additional protection independent of the trial court. This power to approve or disapprove a finding is given great flexibility by the articles of war; it includes the power to approve a finding of guilty of a lesser offense and the power to approve or disapprove the whole or any part of the sentence. In this respect the military appellate code differs from the usual civil code. Incidentally, this power to disapprove includes the power to disapprove a sentence of acquittal and to return the record for reconsideration by the court. But, intrinsically, nothing more is here implied than the court is to reconvene and reconsider its judgment freely and independently. It is in no sense a measure which subjects the court-martial to the command of the reviewing authority in framing the tenor of its judgment upon such reconsideration; for the court is, under the law, entirely at liberty to adhere to its original decision.

That this power is a useful one, and that it is not in fact in any appreciable number of cases so exercised as to amount to an abuse of the commanding general's military prestige, will, I think, appear from the figures to be gathered from the records. In the first place, the power is exercised in the vast majority of cases solely for the purpose of making formal corrections of the record; for example, to enable the fact to be shown, if it was a fact, that a certain member of the court was present or was qualified or that a witness was sworn, or the like formal correction which will make the record of the trial correspond to the facts. In the second place, the exercise of the power in cases of an initial judgment of acquittal has been rare indeed; and in those few cases the trial court, far from exhibiting a supple obedience to the supposed hint of the commanding officer has, in the great majority of cases, adhered to its original judgment.

For the purpose of ascertaining the facts an examination was recently made in my office of 1,000 cases (taking the first thousand as they came in the files) thus returned by reviewing authorities to trial courts for revision. Out of these 1,000 cases the instances in which the original judgment was one of acquittal numbered 95. Of these 95 acquittals, 39 were returned only for formal corrections. Of the remaining 56, the court adhered to its original acquittal in 38 cases; and in only 18 cases was the judgment of acquittal revoked upon reconsideration and the accused found guilty of any offense. It seems plain, therefore, that in no appreciable number of cases has the exercise of this power resulted in a change of verdict upon reconsideration; and it would be going further than any natural presumption would permit us, if we were to infer that those changes involved substantial injustice to the accused. My own experience in the field can recall more than one case in which the verdict of acquittal was notoriously unsound, and in which the action of the commanding general in returning the case furnished a needed opportunity for doing full justice in the case.

But even though the power is a useful one, and even though the facts show that it is seldom exercised in cases permitting an inference that possible injustice was done, and even though the facts demonstrate that the power does not necessarily signify a subjection of the court-martial to the will of the commanding general, nevertheless it can not be denied that the practice differs radically from the traditions of civil justice. Whether the practice in civil justice is not too scrupulous in favor of the accused, and whether the future may not rather witness some change of civil practice in the direction of the traditional military practice, I will not attempt to say. But the present military practice is one which on first impression is repugnant to the accustomed methods in civil trials, and for that reason I am ready to concede that the time has come to approximate the two methods. In the British system that change was made some years before the onset of the present war. I am ready to recommend a similar change in our own practice. Although the power is a useful one, nevertheless, on the other hand, it does not appear that it is a necessary or fundamental one to the maintenance of military discipline; and in that situation the solution may well be to assimilate the practice as nearly as may be to the usual civil practice. This would mean that wherever the initial judgment is one of acquittal (either of the whole offense or of any particular charge), the reviewing authority should not have power to disapprove the finding of not guilty; and that, for the same reason, the reviewing authority should not have the power to revise a sentence upward.

10. That the judgment of the court is kept secret until after the action of the reviewing authority is taken, even when the initial judgment is an acquittal.

It is obvious that the rule upon which this criticism is founded is a natural consequence of the rule just commented upon, viz, that commanding generals as reviewing authorities may send back cases for reconsideration by the court even after a judgment of acquittal. If the initial judgment of the trial court is subject to change by the reviewing authority, it is obvious that its tenor should not be disclosed until after the reviewing authority has acted and has so notified the trial court. If, therefore, the above rule is to be changed, it would follow that the present rule should also be changed, for the one depends naturally upon the other. In view of what has been said above as to the proposed alteration of the rule permitting the reviewing authority to correct and change a judgment of the trial court, I frankly admit that the corresponding change should be made in the present rule, and that upon a judgment of acquittal, which would therefore be final and not subject to change upon review, there is no reason why an immediate announcement should not be made, precisely as in the case of the verdict of an ordinary civil jury. I am pointing out that the rule here criticized is merely a corollary of the other rule, and that its maintenance under the system hitherto in force has therefore not been subject to criticism.

11. That the sentences imposed by courts-martial are, as a rule, excessively severe.

In considering the severity of sentences (and this topic has been the main theme of the criticisms uttered on the floor of Congress) I must make my comments in the following order:

(a) The sentences as they have actually been imposed;

(b) The reasons for those sentences; and

(c) The measures now taken to give proper mitigation or remission of sentences.

(a) In considering the severity of sentences, it is, of course, necessary to examine separately the different offenses, since obviously the appropriate punishment varies widely for offenses of different moral culpability and different danger to military discipline. Space does not permit me here to set forth the facts for all of the offenses and sentences covered by the general courts-martial since April 6.

I handed to you on February 12 a complete table of data as to the length of sentences for the period October, 1917, to September, 1918, covering the nine principal military offenses of desertion, absence without leave, sleeping on post, assaulting an officer or a noncommissioned officer, disobeying an officer or a noncommissioned officer, mutiny, and disobeying a general order or regulation. As this table is too lengthy for inclusion in this letter, I shall content myself by taking the three most typical offenses: Desertion, absence without leave, and disobeying an officer.

(1) Desertion.—No one can approach the subject of sentences for desertion in time of war without keeping in mind the solemn and terrible warning recorded expressly for our benefit by Brig. Gen. Oakes, acting assistant provost marshal general for Illinois, as set forth in his report printed in the report of the Provost Marshal General for the Civil War (Pt. II, p. 29). In impressive language he lays the following injunction upon us:

"Incalculable evil has resulted from the clemency of the Government toward deserters. By a merciful severity at the commencement of the war the mischief might have been nipped in the bud, and the crime of desertion could never have reached the gigantic proportions which it attained before the close of the conflict. The people were then ardent and enthusiastic in their loyalty, and would have cheerfully and cordially assented to any measures deemed necessary to the strength and integrity of the Army. They had heard of the 'rules and articles of war,' and were fully prepared to see * * * that deserters from the Army would be remorselessly arrested, tried by court-martial, and, if guilty, be forthwith shot to death with musketry.

"This was unquestionably the almost universal attitude of the public mind when hostilities began, and the just expectations of the people should not have been disappointed. Arrest, trial, and execution should have been the short, sharp, and decisive fate of the first deserters. * * * The Government was far behind the people in this matter, and so continued, until long and certain impunity had thrown such swarms of deserters and desperadoes into every State that it was then too late to avert the calamity. * * * I state these things so that, if we have another war the Government may start right * * * put deserters to death, enforce military law, strike hard blows at the outset, tone up the national mind at once to a realization that war is war; and be sure that such a policy will be indorsed and sustained by the people.

"There are other suggestions to be made in respect to deserters, but the one I have already advanced—the nonindorsement of the penalties provided by the military code for the crime of desertion, especially at the beginning—is, beyond all question, the grand fundamental cause of the unparalleled increase of that crime, and of the inability of district provost marshals, with their whole force of special agents and detectives, to rid the country of deserters."

This solemn warning was naturally in our minds at the opening of the present war. But, in spite of its urgency, it was decided to exhibit our faith in the American people, and to place our trust in that loyalty and devotion to duty which we felt sure would characterize the vast majority of to-day's young American manhood. We believed that the "short, sharp, and decisive fate of the first deserters" should not be the extreme penalty as urged by Gen. Oakes. And the view was generally accepted in the Army that terms of imprisonment should be ordinarily deemed the adequate repressive measure for the few who might need it. And it is a fact that of the (approximately) 3,000 convictions for desertion during the war the sentence of death was imposed in only 24 cases, and in every such case it was commuted or remitted.

It must, therefore, be kept in mind at the outset that the refusal to adopt the policy of death sentences for desertion was in itself a repudiation of the policy of extreme severity; and that the practice of limiting desertion sentences to terms of imprisonment is in itself the adoption of a policy of leniency. Reproach for severity must deal with the fact that the policy adopted disregarded both the extreme penalty authorized by Congress and the warnings of the Civil War.

Turning, then, to the recorded facts, we find in the table that the total number of convictions for desertions for the year October, 1917–September, 1918, was 2,025; that the average sentence was 7.58 years; that nearly 24 per cent of these sentences were for less than 2 years; that 64 per cent were for less than 10 years; and that only 35.90 per cent were for a greater period than 10 years. The Article of War reads:

"Any person who deserts shall, if the offense be committed in time of war, suffer death, or such other punishment as the court-martial may direct."

It would seem, therefore, that in point of severity the result of courts-martial sentences for desertion can not be charged with erring on the side of severity.

You will notice that I do not here attempt to account for the justice of individual cases. Certain of the sentences for 25 years, or even for lesser periods, are open to criticism as excessively severe under the circumstances of the individual case. But it must be kept in mind that these trials and sentences were found legally valid by the Judge Advocate General's Office; that the only issue of doubt that could arise concerns the quantum of the sentence; and that the scrutiny of the clemency section in the Military Justice Division of the office may be relied upon to detect cases of excessive severity before any excessive portion of such a sentence has been served. But the excessive severity of an individual sentence is not the question here; that question would call for the scrutiny of the particular case. The question here is of general conditions. What the above figures show in respect to general conditions, or the trend of conditions, is that the practice has been one of relatively moderate penalties instead of the severest one permissible under the law.

(2) Absence without leave.—Absence without leave is an offense which represents, in many instances, cases of actual desertion; but, owing to the movements of the military unit and thus the difficulty of obtaining the necessary technical proof, the actual deserter is frequently convicted of no more than an absence without leave. It is, therefore, plain that the offense of absence without leave may, upon its circumstances, merit an extremely severe penalty, equal to that of desertion. In time of war this offense may lawfully be punished by any penalty short of death; in time of peace a presidential order limits the maximum penalty of six months' confinement.

For the year ending September, 1918, the total convictions for this offense number 3,362; the average sentence was 1.59 years (or only three times the small maximum allowed in peace times); 11 per cent of the offense received no penalty of imprisonment; 67 per cent received a sentence of less than two years' imprisonment; and only 22 per cent received a penalty of more than two years in prison. When it is remembered, as above pointed out, that this offense is in many cases virtually the offense of an actual deserter, it will be seen that the number of the sentences over two years is not disproportionate to the probable ratio of cases individually calling for the higher penalties. An average sentence of 1.59 years for this offense, committed in time of war, can not be deemed an exhibition of severity, where in fact the act of Congress establishing the Articles of War leaves the court-martial absolutely untrammelled (short of the death sentence) in the penalty to be fixed to this offense.

(3) Disobeying an officer.—The offense of disobeying a superior officer is punishable, under the Articles of War, by "death or such other punishment as the court-martial may direct." The total number of convictions for this offense was 785; the average sentence was for 4.34 years; 6 per cent of offenses were punished by no imprisonment; 43.69 were punished by confinement of less than 2 years; and a trifle over 50 per cent were punished by some period greater than 2 years, there being one death sentence and 18 sentences for 25 years or more. Comparing the absolutely unlimited nature of the punishment permitted by the Articles of War to be imposed by the court-martial, and observing that 50 per cent of these sentences were for periods of under 2 years, it can not be that the tribunals appear to be seeking to exercise the maximum of severity allowable, but rather the contrary.

Moreover, interpreting these sentences for the offense of disobedience of an officer, it is worth while to remind the civilian public that little or nothing turns upon the nature of the command itself which is disobeyed. Much has been made in public discussion of one or two instances in which the subject of command was apparently of trivial consequence; for example, a command to an enlisted man to give up some tobacco unlawfully in his possession, or a command to clean a gun. But in military life, obviously it is not the thing commanded that is material; it is the act of deliberate disobedience. Deliberate disobedience in one thing, if unchecked, means deliberate disobedience in any and all things. It was a condition of deliberate disobedience, in small and great things alike, which caused the Russian Army to melt away and transformed Russia into the home of Bolshevism. The military officer does not rule by violence, but by moral sway. He is able to organize his men upon the battle field only because he can be confident that every command of his in matters great or small will result in instant and unquestioned obedience. Hence, an act of military disobedience is a symptom as alarming to the military commander as is the first incipient cancer cell to the surgeon—a warning that the knife must soon be applied. The War Department must invoke and expect the sympathy and support of an enlightened public in realizing that the offense of disobedience is to be ranked among the cardinal offenses of the soldier and requires the most rigid measures for its repression.

In the foregoing comments, it will be noticed that, since a charge of excessive severity implies the habitual resort to a maximum standard allowable under the law, the standard here to be taken must of necessity be the standard set by the Articles of War as adopted by the act of Congress. Judging by this standard, the practices of the court-martial, to any candid observer, must be vindicated from the charge of the habitual employment of severity; rather have they proceeded in a direction of a lenient use of their discretion.

I must freely admit that, in any discussion of the severity of sentences, notions of severity are so widely different that it will be hopeless to satisfy the standards of all varieties of critics. There exists to-day, in some minds apparently, a sentimentality toward offenders of every sort, which we could never expect to satisfy without a virtual undermining of the entire criminal law, whether military or civil. I received recently a letter, complaining of the "inhuman and outrageous punishments administered for trivial matters"; this expression being used of a court-martial sentence of 10 years for conspiracy to rob. In the particular case, four soldiers, out on leave in a city adjacent to a military camp, assaulted with a pistol and violently beat a fellow soldier at midnight in a vacant lot, for the purpose of obtaining his money by force; and upon his raising an outcry they ran away, and his wounds were attended to by the military police. To apply the term "trivial" to this act of cowardly violence, and the term "inhuman" to the sentence of 10 years, indicates such a singular standard of moral judgment that it would be impossible to reach an agreement, in estimating the severity of the sentence, with those who are willing to acknowledge such a standard of judgment. I am assuming, in what I have now to say, that the idea of severity is always to be interpreted in the light of a rational standard of normal judgment based upon the danger and heinousness of the offender's act in comparison with the sentence imposed.

I close this comment with a forceful quotation from a recent editorial in a leading daily journal:

"When a soldier goes absent without leave, deserts his post of duty to see a dying father, he does so because his own personal desires are stronger than his sense of responsibility to his country. It may be a hard thing to give up seeing a dying father, but it is a harder thing to give up running away in the face of the enemy.

"That is what military justice is about. The sole preoccupation of any army, wherever it is, is to train its men and keep them trained to obey the will of the commander under the most trying possible circumstances and serve the will of the Nation. If disobedience had been tolerated in the United States, our Army in Europe would not have captured the St. Mihiel salient or fought six weeks in the Argonne.

"An army to be successful in the field must, from the moment it begins to train at home, have absolute control of its discipline."

(b) The question may still be asked, however, whether even for these serious military offenses those sentences greater than, let us say, 5 or 10 years were necessary for the morale of the Army.

I must premise by pointing out first that these long sentences represent only a minute fraction in the mass of court-martial sentences, and, secondly, that the long periods of years named in those sentences were only maximum, and were therefore nominal only.

As to the first point, I call attention to the total number of sentences for a year, including trials in all grades of courts. These were approximately 240,000, of which the military offenses were at least 200,000 in round numbers. In these 200,000 sentences the vast majority, probably about 185,000, were imposed in summary courts, and those could not by law exceed three months. Another 10,000 approximately, were in special courts, and those could not have exceeded six months. Some 7,000 were in general courts, the only court authorized to impose a sentence of higher than six months. Now, for the year October 1, 1917, to September 30, 1918, the records of this office show that there were only 532 sentences for a period of 15 years or more; that is, less than three-tenths of 1 per cent of the over 200,000 trials for military offenses. And there were only about 2,200 sentences for five years or more, or a trifle more than 1 per cent of the 200,000 sentences for military offenses. If, therefore, anything is found to be wrong about this group of severe sentences, the wrongness can only affect a very small fractional corner in the area of military justice. There may be at this moment 532 cases of smallpox in the population of the metropolis of Manhattan, with more than 4,000,000 inhabitants; but this does not signify that there is any doubt as to the general healthy immunity of the metropolis against that plague.

The second point above mentioned is that these long periods of years named in the sentences were in effect nominal only. There being no minimum number of years, the offender may be released at any time by reduction or remission of sentence on recommendation of the clemency section of this office, where the offense is a purely military one. That this is not merely a possibility, but an actuality, will be seen from the fact later to be cited, that nearly 10 per cent of the 12,000 sentences for the last calendar year have in fact been selected for remission or mitigation, and that in those sentences an average of 90 per cent of the total periods has been cut off; for example, of the 2,035 sentences for desertion, some 577, averaging a sentence of 3.80 years, were selected for reduction, and this average was reduced, on the recommendation of my office, to an average of three months. In other words, the imposition of a 25-year sentence does not signify that 25 years of a sentence will be served; the experience of the year 1918 having shown that of the sentences selected for reduction only 10 per cent of the term is actually served. It is in this sense that I refer to these long-term figures for the maximum duration as merely nominal.

As an illustration conveniently at hand, let me take the four cases cited by Senator Chamberlain as illustrating excessive severity of court-martial sentences; he cited the case of a 25 years' sentence for absence without leave, another of 15 years for the same offense, and two cases of 10 years for sleeping on post. And yet the records of this office show that in two of these four cases the Judge Advocate General had advised that there was no legal objection to their restoration to duty, on December 10 and December 12, 1918, respectively, two weeks or more prior to the date of the Senator's speech in Congress; and the records of The Adjutant General's Office show these men actually restored to duty on December 23, 1918, one full week before the day when the Senator arose to complain of the severity of these cases; and all of this in the course of the normal operation of the system. These illustrations point to what I mean in saying that the long term named in the sentence is merely nominal, in that the offender may be, and in practice frequently is, restored to duty at an early period of a few months or more, totally regardless of the long period named in the sentence.

Why then (it may be asked) was it necessary or wise to name such long maximum terms in the sentence? The answer here must be sought in the necessities of discipline while our Army was being raised, and in the just apprehensions of responsible officers over the fulfillment of their huge task. Half a million men were taken by draft in 1917, fresh from the associations of civil life; nearly another half million were entering by enlistment; and before three-quarters of the year 1918 had passed nearly 4,000,000 men had been taken into the Army and were in the process of training. This training was conducted under circumstances of urgent haste never before known in our history—for the tide of battle was going against the Allies, and the anxieties of the civilized world awaited breathlessly the arrival of our troops. To make good soldiers out of this huge and undisciplined mass, in an average period of three or four months for each contingent, was one of the most extraordinary feats ever accomplished in the history of military training; and it has testified in the highest degree to the adaptability and versatility of the American character. But it required urgent haste, and while it was going on the curtain was not raised upon the future, and the glorious results which now lie before us were still in the realm of doubt.

Our officers, charged with the duty of bringing these undisciplined men into immediate readiness for battle, were weighted with anxiety, day and night, at the possibilities of failure. The one imperative necessity was to inculcate the sentiment of obedience—obedience instant and absolute. For those few—and they were less than 15,000 out of 4,000,000—who committed serious military offenses, and thus showed themselves recalcitrant to the requirements of military discipline, some form of absolute moral compulsion was necessary. Whether that moral compulsion ought to take the shape of a sentence of 2 years or 10 years or 20 years was a matter about which it would have been dangerous to speculate. The situation called for an absolute certainty. The sentences must be such that they imposed for any disobediently disposed soldier a penalty which would be absolutely compelling. When those officers selected occasionally (and the percentage of cases was extremely small) a long-term sentence which should have this imperative significance, they knew that this was only a maximum term and that there was no minimum, and that an early release would be easily earned by those who deserved it. And I can not bring myself to-day, nor, I think, can any man who will reflect on that situation, to question now the wisdom of their judgment. And I will even go so far as to say that probably none of these officers supposed for a moment that these long terms would ever actually be served. It was their business and duty to impose a compelling sense of discipline, and they chose those terms which, in their judgment, would do so. And it was not for them to undermine the effect of their discipline by announcing that none of these sentences need be served a moment longer than the exigency of the war required. They knew that, if the danger should pass and if victory should crown their efforts, the authorities of the Army, and particularly the scrutiny of my office, would see to it that the sentences were appropriately cut down. And I think it can be safely asserted that, so far as there is anywhere an individual long-term sentence that could have been deemed excessive, the man who received that sentence has not yet served a single day of the excessive period imposed, the injustice was never one which could not be corrected before it became in fact an injustice.

How thoroughly my office is now undertaking to apply this corrective in proper cases I will later mention. But I am concerned now, in these days of international safety and of national demobilization, to carry back in retrospect the minds of all reflecting citizens to the period of 1917, when the fate of the world trembled in the balance and the embryo armies of the United States were the hope of civilization for turning that balance in the direction of world rescue. The huge responsibility of preparing these armies almost over night lay upon these men who administered military discipline. How magnificently they discharged that task has been shown by the results of the battle field. I, in common with all other intelligent citizens, shared their anxieties, and I for one can not now remain silent while they are criticised for the conscientious exercise of that judgment in applying the necessary measures. Had they failed, they might have been put to the bar to account for themselves. But they succeeded, and in a manner which has commanded the admiration of the world's veteran soldiers. It is easy to be wise after the fact. But in the light of their superb success let no one now censoriously presume to disparage the soundness of their judgment nor the wisdom of the measures by which they achieved that success.

(c) I said above that I would conclude this part of my comment by mentioning the measures now practically under way for mitigating and remitting the sentences of courts-martial, in the light of the termination of hostilities and the restoration of the national safety.

On the 20th of January you approved a recommendation of mine, dated January 18, proposing the institution of a system of review for the purpose of equalizing punishment through recommendations for clemency. A board of three officers was designated by me in the Office of the Judge Advocate General on January 28. This board of officers, with a large number of assistants, is now examining the record of every sentence of courts-martial under which any soldier is now confined in any prison in the United States. The recommendations of this board will go so far as to remit the entire portion not yet served upon a sentence of confinement or to reduce it to such amount as seems suitable to the present situation in view of the necessities of military discipline. It is expected that at least 100 cases a day will be passed upon by this board. The completion of the work of this board, which can not require more than a few months at the most, will signalize a complete readjustment of all sentences in a manner appropriate to the termination of hostilities and the resumption of peace-time requirements for military discipline. It is certain that every sentence that might now be deemed in excess of the necessary period will be duly reviewed and that no soldier now in confinement will serve any period in excess of that just amount, so far as human powers of judgment are equal to this task.

12. That the sentences imposed by courts-martial are variable for the same offense.

When we come to the question of variability of sentences, we reach a subject which has been the fertile field for complaint and criticism in civil courts for a century past. It is notorious that the independent judgment of different courts and of different juries seems to be characterized by the most erratic and whimsical variety. Such has been the constant burden of complaint in civil justice, and it can hardly be hoped that military justice could escape a similar complaint in some degree. On the other hand, it must always be remembered that here the individual circumstances vary so widely that a variation of sentences is perfectly natural, and that the mere variation of figures in itself signifies very little where the individual circumstances remain totally unknown to the critic. Nevertheless a variability of sentences for the same offense is something which naturally excites attention and caution; and it should be the object of appellate authorities to equalize the penalties for the same offense where no obvious reason for substantial difference is found. How far the revisory authority of the Judge Advocate General and the clemency powers of the Secretary of War have been effectual to secure such equalization will be noted later in this letter. At the present the inquiry of fact is whether there has been such variability and at what points it has taken place.

The table above referred to, and already handed to you, summarizes for the nine principal military offenses the variance of the sentences, first by months of the year covered, and secondly by jurisdictional areas from which the court-martial records come up for revision. In summary of these variances it is here to be noted that such variances obviously exist; that these variances are not in themselves any more striking than those that are found in the sentences of civil courts, as already shown in the other table submitted to you; that in seeking the possible source of these variances it appears very strikingly that there has been a slight but appreciable increase in the number of higher-period sentences as we come down to the later months of the war; and that, so far as jurisdictional areas are concerned, there have been notable variances which seem in some cases to localize the higher-period sentences for certain offenses in certain specific areas.

As illustrating the foregoing inferences it will be sufficient here to take the single offense of desertion. Examining it by months it will be noticed that the long-term sentences of 10 to 15 years, and of 15 to 25 years, and over 25 years increased slightly in their ratio to the whole of the sentences for the month as we approach the later months of the year under examination. For example for the months of October, 1917, to February, 1918, there were no sentences over 25 years, although the number of convictions increased from 55 to 196 (the increase, of course, being due to the much greater ratio in the increase of armed forces). But during the months of April to July, with approximately the same number of convictions, averaging 225, the number of sentences for over 25 years increased from 4 to 9, to 15, and finally to 33. Apparently, therefore, some conditions in the Army changed as the months advanced so as to induce this variance in the direction of higher-period sentences. Just what those conditions were can not even be the subject of speculation without a very careful inquiry; merely the fact is here pointed out.

Again, turning to the jurisdictional areas, we find that the Central Department shows about 9 per cent of sentences for over 10 years, while the Eastern Department shows only 3 per cent; that the Twenty-eighth Division, having 21 convictions, imposed no sentences in excess of 10 years, while the Eightieth Division, with exactly the same number of convictions, imposed 14 sentences greater than 10 years.

As further indicating this variance by jurisdictional areas, a glance at the same table under the offense of absence without leave shows that, in the Twenty-eighth Division, which exhibited the above leniency for desertion, the offense of absence without leave was given a sentence of under 2 years for 127 out of 140 convictions; while the Eightieth Division, which had shown a large majority of long-term sentences for desertion, was, on the other hand, lenient for the offense of absence without leave, imposing 16 sentences of under 2 years, out of 20 convictions. Comparing again the Thirty-sixth and Thirty-ninth Divisions, with substantially the same number of convictions, viz, about 175, one finds that the former imposed about 20 sentences of above 10 years, while the other imposed 101 sentences above 10 years. This same Thirty-ninth Division had also used a majority of higher period sentences for desertion, whereas the Thirty-sixth Division showed for desertion a record that averaged with the other divisions.

It will be seen, therefore, that in many, if not in most cases, the extreme variances may be traced to difference of practice in the different jurisdictional areas. Just what conditions existed which would justify in the individual cases, or in the general trend of cases, this variance between divisions can hardly be the subject even of hypothesis. But it must be obvious to any candid observer that there do exist wide differences of conditions, not only in the racial and educational make-up of the different camps, but also in the morale and necessities of discipline prevailing in different camps. It is well known that the sentences of civil courts for civil offenses vary widely in the different States. For example, in 1910 (Census Report, 1910, "Prisoners and Juvenile Delinquents," p. 50), the percentage of sentences of 10 years or over was 9.7 in the East South Central States, but was only 0.1 in the New England States; in Mississippi it was 22.51, but in California it was only 2.3. This illustration is mentioned merely to suggest that whenever one discovers that variances in sentences have a certain relation to variances in camps or divisions, the subject becomes at once too complex for hasty judgment.

Apart from what is now being done in my office by way of the equalization of sentences by commutation in the way of clemency, I am only concerned here to point out the facts as they are found in the records relative to the action of the courts-martial themselves; and to note that such variances (apart from peculiar individual cases) as are revealed in any noticeable amount, seem to be due most largely to differences of conditions in the different camps, divisions, and other jurisdictional areas; and the greatest caution must be exercised before passing judgment upon such variances as inequitable, without being fully familiar with the conditions operating in those places.

Moreover, I must utter a further caution against the popular presumption that a difference in sentences of different individuals for the same offense signifies necessarily any inequity. The individual circumstances differ so widely that the injustice would consist, not in the variability, but in the rigid identity of the same sentence for the same offense in every individual case. This very matter of variation in sentences is one of the triumphs of modern criminal law. One hundred years ago virtually every criminal code of the civilized world was marked by a rigid fixation of penalties for each variety of offense. It was regarded as one of the great objects of criminal reform in that era to introduce variability of the sentence and adapt it to the circumstances of the individual case. One of the first criminal codes to introduce this reform was that of the State of Louisiana, drafted just a century ago by the great Edward Livingston, recognized as the most eminent jurist of his day; this code received the approval of the jurists of the world; and one of its most remarkable features was its recognition of the variability of sentences for varying individual circumstances. Ever since that day all progress in criminal codes has included this element in an increasing degree. The particular virtue claimed and proved for the indeterminate sentence, which has now been adopted in probably three-quarters of the States of our Union, is that it gives full play for the adaptation of the sentence to the individual case. We must, therefore, always recall that the variability permitted by law is in itself a powerful feature tending to the apportionment of justice according to the circumstances of each case.

The one complementary element necessary in a criminal code in guarding against too great a variability in the action of different courts is the power of ultimate readjustment by some central tribunal. In the language of one of the very Senators who has criticized some of these sentences:

"The sure cure for it all is to have some sort of a tribunal, appellate or supervisory, that shall have the power to formulate rules and equalize these unjust sentences." * * *

Precisely this power of recommendation is now exercised, and long has been, by the Judge Advocate General's Office, in its clemency section. The explanation of this activity brings me to the next point of criticism.

13. That the Judge Advocate General's Office either partakes in the attitude of severity or makes no attempt to check it by revisory action.

The distinct implication running through the critical remarks above quoted is that there exists no central authority that can check, equalize, or correct such severity or variability as may be found to merit such action, and that the Judge Advocate General's Office, charged with the duty of revising these court-martial records, either acquiesces in the result of the court-martial sentences as approved by the reviewing authority or makes no attempt to check any excesses by revisory action.

It is, therefore, necessary to emphasize that the Judge Advocate General's Office not only scrutinizes the court-martial records for the purpose of discovering errors of law and procedure, but also, in the clemency section of the Military Justice Division, occupies itself exclusively with the scrutiny of records for the purpose of recommending for remission or mitigation those sentences which are open to question as to severity or inequality. This power has been exercised habitually ever since our entrance into the war, as well as before that date.

Inquiring into the results to see what the facts show the question presents itself: To what extent has the Judge Advocate General's Office called for a reduction of sentences by a recommendation of clemency to the Secretary of War? And I note in passing that in no instance, so far as I am informed, has such a recommendation of clemency failed to be approved and given effect by yourself.

(a) The extent of such recommendations as to the number of sentences is shown in the following summary, covering the clemency recommendations for the year 1918, as applied to the sentences from October 1, 1917, to September 30, 1918, for the nine principal military offenses:

Total number of such sentences imposed, 7,624; total number of such sentences selected by the Judge Advocate General's Office for reduction, 947; percentage of selected sentences on all sentences, 12.42. I see no reason to doubt that this 12½ per cent is ample enough to cover all the individual cases in which an excessive severity would have been apparent on the face of the record.

The table as placed in your hands shows the reduction in its relation to the sentences of different lengths. The table shows that the largest percentage of reduction occurred in the sentences of medium length, and that the smallest percentages of reduction occurred in the sentences of shortest and of longest periods. This result is perfectly natural and appropriate. The shortest sentences are those in which there would be the least call for reduction by clemency on the ground of excessive severity. The longest sentences are those in which the reduction on the ground of excessive severity would presumably not bring them to an extremely low period and, therefore, in which the time for recommending such reduction had presumably not arrived.

(b) How much reduction did this action effect in the total length of all the sentences acted upon? This will afford some gauge of the thoroughness of the action in the nature of clemency. A table already in your hands shows the number of sentences recommended for reduction, the total years of the original sentences, the total years reduced on recommendation of the Judge Advocate General's office, and the net years of sentence as actually served; and the figures are given separately for the nine principal military offenses, as well as for the total of all offenses, October 1, 1917, to September 30, 1918.

Referring to the table for details as to the specific offenses, I will point out here merely that for all offenses, military and civil, the total reduction effected was a reduction of 3,876 years out of an original period of 4,331 years, or a reduction of 89½ per cent. In other words, action of this office, in effecting reductions in the 1,147 sentences selected on their merits for reduction, cut them down to 10.50 per cent of their original amount. Presenting the same result in another form, the average original sentence, of these 1,147 sentences, was for a period of 3.78 years (or nearly 4 years), and the average sentence served as reduced was only 0.40 of 1 year, or less than 5 months.

These figures as to reduction effected in the length of the sentences, demonstrate that the action of this office was a radical one and must have served to eliminate any excessive severity in those sentences. That the sentences selected for such recommendations of clemency included all of the sentences meriting the term "severe," neither I nor anyone else would be in a position either to affirm or deny without an examination of every record.

How extensive is the scope of reduction now undertaken for all sentences, by the special clemency board recently appointed at your instance has already been told.

14. That the action taken in the Judge Advocate General's office is ineffectual to enforce military law and procedure, because its rulings do not have the force of a supreme court mandate, but are only recommendatory, and are either ignored by the division commanders or vetoed by the Chief of Staff.

This brings me to the question which has formed the principal theme of recent discussion in Congress; and I must divide my comments under three heads covering each one as concisely as accuracy will permit: (a) The question of simple fact, i. e., what actually is the effect of the Judge Advocate General's action; (b) the question of legal theory, i. e., what is the extent of his legal powers under existing law; and (c) what use has recently been made of this question of legal theory by certain parties in disparaging the administration of military justice by the War Department.

(a) The simple question of fact.—The foregoing exposition of the principles of military law and procedure, as enforced through the appellate system culminating in the advisory action of the Judge Advocate General's office, is vain and meaningless to some of the critics of our military system. I find it repeatedly asserted and implied that the commanding officer of the division or department—in technical language the reviewing authority—is not obliged to follow and does not, in fact, follow these recommendations. "Court-martial sentences found, by the reviewing authorities, to be null and void for want of jurisdiction," it is stated, "have been allowed to stand." "The military commander is not obliged either to ask for legal advice or to follow it when he has asked for it and it has been given to him by the responsible law officers of the Army." "Courts-martial should be required to accept the interpretation of the law by a responsible law officer."

The records of courts-martial come to the Judge Advocate General to "revise," and what legal effect this "revision" ought to have in theory is a mooted question of law and policy on which I shall later comment; suffice it here to say that a difference of view exists, and that the judgment expressed by the Judge Advocate General in his appellate capacity is customarily phrased in terms of a recommendation to the commander in the field. But this question, after all, like many questions of fundamental principles, may become practically irrelevant in the light of the facts. The assertion made in the remarks above quoted is an assertion of fact, viz, that the commanding officer does not follow the legal advice which is given him and does not accept the rulings of the responsible law officer.

On the question of fact let the facts themselves answer.

The cases fall necessarily into two groups. One class of cases, coming to the Judge Advocate General for revision under United States Revised Statutes, section 1199, the thirty-eighth article of war, and General Order No. 7, January 1918, require and receive no other revision or approval than that given by the Judge Advocate General. The other class of cases includes sentences of death and of dismissal of officers, which, under the forty-eighth article of war, require confirmation by the President, as well as certain other cases in which error of law has been found but the execution of the sentence has not been suspended by g authority. The former class of records go directly back from Advocate General to the reviewing authority in the field; the latter go from the Judge Advocate General through The Adjutant General of Staff to the Secretary of War, and sometimes to the President. The question of fact is, therefore, in what proportion of cases does purely advisory authority fail to give effect to these revisory rulings of the Judge Advocate General?

In both classes of cases are shown in the following table:

Action of Judge Advocate General's office Apr. 6, 1917-Jan. 1, 1919.

Cases referred for modification or reversal on legal grounds. <sup>1</sup>	Number of cases.	Recommendations given effect.		Recommendations not given effect.
		Number.	Per cent.	Number.	Per cent.
Authority of the Judge Advocate General.....	212	205	96.7	7	3.3
Authority of the Secretary of War.....	279	273	97.8	6	2.2
Total.....	491	478	97.4	13	2.6

Include a few cases in which the Judge Advocate General's office recommended changes in the law.

It appears that out of a total for the period covered of 491 cases recommended by the Judge Advocate General for disapproval on legal grounds, only 13 cases in which the Judge Advocate General's ruling was not followed. Of these cases, 7 were not followed by the reviewing authority and 6 were not followed in the Secretary of War's office.

In view of these facts, I think I am justified in asserting that there is no foundation for the assertion contained in the above-quoted paragraph that the military commander or that any military officer "is free to follow out the dictates of his own discretion regardless of the interpretation of the law by a responsible law officer," nor that he "may disregard the legal advice 'when he has asked for it and it has been given by the responsible law officers of the Army.'" Whatever may be the theory of the function now placed by statute in the Judge Advocate General as the law officer or appellate tribunal for military justice, that theory becomes virtually immaterial in the light of the facts of the period of the war. The state of things supposed by critics does not exist. Virtually the recommendations of the Judge Advocate General are given practical effect in the same manner as the trial and judgment in military justice give effect to the mandate of the supreme court of the United States.

Question of legal theory.—The question of legal theory, stated concisely, is: Is the Judge Advocate General's ruling mandatory, like that of an appellate court, with the effect of compelling the reversal or modification of a court-martial judgment founded upon legal error? Or is it merely advisory, in that the commanding general or the President, as may be, is not bound implicitly to follow and give effect to the ruling?

This question was first presented to this office, during the present war, in 1917, in the now celebrated case of the "Texas mutineers" (C. M. Davis and others, tried at Fort Bliss, Tex., in September, 1917). In this case certain soldiers, having been ordered under arrest by a young officer, for a very short time, were afterwards, while still under arrest, directed to drill; Army Regulations, properly construed, do not authorize noncommissioned officers to be required to attend drill formations while under arrest, and they declined to drill as ordered; for this disobedience they were convicted of mutiny and sentenced to dishonorable discharge and imprisonment of between 10 and 25 years.

It may be at once and unreservedly admitted that this was a genuine case of military justice, and that the injustice was due to an overstrict attitude of the reviewing authority toward discipline; for it is conceded by all that the young officer who gave the order to drill was both tactless and unjustified in his action. It is conceded that the commanding officer who reviewed and approved the sentence was a Regular Army officer of long experience, who failed to appreciate the justice of the situation. That this case illustrates the occasional possibility of the military spirit of discipline overshadowing the sense of law and justice is plain enough. But that it indicates any general condition can not for a moment be asserted. Moreover, this very case serves also to illustrate the essentially law-enforcing spirit which dominates in the office of the Judge Advocate General. The impropriety and illegality of the sentence in this case was immediately recognized when the record arrived in the office for review. An opinion was prepared pointing out the irregularity and injustice and directing that the findings be set aside. But the legality of such a direction was questioned, in the face of a ruling by the Attorney General of the United States, many years ago, that a sentence of court martial, once executed, can not be set aside even by the President himself. This raised the general question of the authority of the Judge Advocate General not merely to recommend for clemency (which would not have been an adequate redress for the convicted men in this case), but to direct the setting aside of the findings, in a judgment of a court-martial, for legal error, where the sentence had been already executed (namely, in this case, the sentence of dishonorable discharge).

The Secretary of War having sustained the doubt as to the authority of the Judge Advocate General to take such radical action, clemency was extended by the President, releasing the men from confinement, and restoring them to duty, within about three months from the date of their conviction. At the same time a new measure was adopted by the Secretary of War, in the shape of General Order No. 7, War Department, 1918, taking effect February 1, 1918, which prevented the recurrence of such instances, by directing that the commanding general, upon confirming a sentence of death or officer's dismissal or dishonorable discharge, should suspend the execution of the sentence, pending a review of the case in the office of the Judge Advocate General. Thus immediate measures were taken, to go as far as could be gone under the law as conceded on all hands, to prevent the recurrence of the situation presented in the Texas mutiny case.

It would be out of place here to set forth at length the arguments pro and con upon this question of legal theory. The basic statute denning the powers of the Judge Advocate General in respect to courts-martial judgments dates from 1862, and provides (U. S. Rev. Stat., sec. 1199) that "the Judge Advocate General shall receive, revise, and cause to be recorded the proceedings of all courts-martial," etc. This word "revise" was construed by the senior officer on duty under me, when dealing with the Texas mutineers' case (above cited), to signify a complete appellate authority empowering the Judge Advocate General to correct and, if appropriate, to set aside, reverse, and annul a court-martial judgment which involved some legal error. But this construction of the statute could not be accepted by me. One reason was that for 55 years my predecessors in office, beginning with Judge Holt, in Lincoln's administration, had failed to advance any such construction enlarging their powers, and that a decision of a Federal court in 1882 had expressly repudiated the propriety of such construction. A second reason was that the assumption of such a power by this office under that statute would equally operate to control not only commanding generals of a division or department but also the President, as Commander in Chief, in those cases where he has the reviewing authority under the forty-eighth article of war, and thus would render the Judge Advocate General virtually a supreme military tribunal independent of the President himself; the ultimate control of the discipline of the Army would become vested in the Judge Advocate General. A third reason was that even the President himself does not under the existing law possess such a power to set aside and annul a sentence of a court-martial when once it has been executed, the absence of such a power in the President having been constantly maintained in a long series of opinions by the Attorneys General of the United States, beginning with Caleb Cushing in 1854. (6 Op. A. G., 514; 10 Op. A. G., 66; 15 Op. A. G., 290; 17 Op. A. G., 303.) It would thus be anomalous and extraordinary to suppose that the Congress had intended to vest the Judge Advocate General with a supreme authority which they had not seen fit to grant to the President himself, the President being the "natural and proper depository of appellate judicial power" for the Army, as pointed out by William Wirt when Attorney General in 1818. Such was the issue of legal theory, and such were the controlling reasons forcing me to refuse to accept the construction of Revised Statutes, section 1199, which would vest that extraordinary power in my office.

But the lack of that power lodged somewhere, and most preferably in the President himself, was certainly to be regretted. The General Order No. 7, effective February 1, 1918, and drafted at my instance and in my office in December, 1917, virtually prevented the recurrence of injustice in most cases by requiring the reviewing authority to suspend execution of the sentence pending the review in my office. But for cases that had occurred prior to that date, and possibly for other occasional cases, a more radical remedy was needed—for example, in the above-cited case of the Texas mutineers, for whom the record of dishonorable discharge remained perforce unrevoked, although they had been already released from confinement and restored to duty.

I was ready and anxious to see the existing law so amended as to remedy this defect by a grant of power from Congress to the President. Far from opposing such remedy, I took prompt measures to secure it. My only negative attitude was to oppose the assumption of that power by myself, through mere construction, sudden and revolutionary, of a statute never before deemed to bear such interpretation.

This attitude on my part has been subjected to the most unwarrantable distortion in recent discussion, and I am therefore obliged now to place before you the facts that (as I hope) furnish my vindication.

(c) The use made of the foregoing controversy.—It has been publicly alleged, first, that I was opposed to the correction of this admitted defect in existing law, and, secondly, that I carried my opposition so far as to secure the revocation of the appointment of my senior officer as Acting Judge Advocate General because of his championship of the view which I opposed.

On the first point, a brief reference to documents long in print will supply the instant refutation. In January, 1918, you yourself, having agreed with my construction of the statute, and having concurred in the view that the situation required remedy, sent a letter, dated January 19, to the chairmen of both the Senate and House Military Affairs Committees, transmitting a bill S. 3692, H. R. 9164 (drafted in my office), amending the section of the Revised Statutes in question so as to enable the President, advised by the Judge Advocate General, to reverse or modify findings and sentences of courts-martial and, in general, to cure the existing defect of power. On February 5, 1918, I testified fully in support of the bill at a hearing before the House Committee on Military Affairs (printed as "Hearings before the Committee on Military Affairs on H. R. 9164," Feb. 4, 5, 22, 1918). During the year that has elapsed since the presentation of that bill neither the Senate nor the House has seen fit to take action upon it. So far as I am informed, it was never even reported out by either committee. I think, therefore, that in mere justice to myself I am entitled to point out that the responsibility for any injustices that may have occurred in the administration of military justice since February, 1918, and the inability to correct injustices prior to that date, due to the defect of appellate powers here in question, can not be laid at the door of the Judge Advocate General.

In January of the present year, however, was introduced a new bill, both in Senate and House, S. 5320 and H. R. 14883 (Cong. Rec., p. 1988, Jan. 23), which again proposed to correct the defect already described, but this time by vesting in the Judge Advocate General (sec. 8) this power to disapprove the whole or any part of a finding or sentence of a court-martial. The expedient proposed in this measure, viz., the grant of power to the Judge Advocate General (not the President), is identical with the construction of Revised Statutes, section 1199, urged by the senior officer on duty in my office in November, 1917, more than a year before. And speeches were now heard on the floor of Congress lamenting the errors due to the defective military law, urging the passage of this bill, and reflecting on the negligence of the War Department in failing to administer complete military justice. I am here concerned only with pointing out, in respect to this particular and conceded defect, that the responsibility surely does not lie with either yourself or myself, for the passage of the earlier bill, S. 3692 and H. R. 9164, introduced just one year before, in January, 1918, would have rendered needless either the bill or the discussion of January, 1919.

As to the second point: I said above that the bill of January, 1919, proposed to lodge this appellate power not in the President but in the Judge Advocate General, exactly as maintained by the senior officer above referred to, in November, 1917, and as repudiated by me at that time. This officer in a letter dated February 17, 1919 (Cong. Rec., p. 3982), Feb. 19), has now attempted to place both you and me in the position not only of having opposed his efforts to correct the defect of the law but even of concurring to cause him to be "relieved of any duties in connection with the administration of military justice," because of his efforts to reform the law.

It is unpleasant to have to defend oneself against such a charge, because to set forth the facts as they were must involve the revelation of a discreditable course of conduct in an officer whose abilities had heretofore possessed my entire admiration and personal confidence. Summarizing the facts as they appear of record, they are these: In October, 1917, I was dividing my time between the duties of Judge Advocate General and Provost Marshal General, usually spending the evenings and often other parts of the day at the former office. On November 3, 1917, the officer in question forwarded to me a memorandum formally superscribed, "Memorandum for Gen. Crowder," and containing the following passage:

"I am at times considerably embarrassed, and besides the transaction of public business is, I think, somewhat impeded and confused by the fact that it is not known to the service at large that you are not conducting the affairs of this office as well as those of the Provost Marshal General, the public conception being that you are, as you legally are, the head of both offices, as in fact you are not. * * * I ought to be designated in orders by the Secretary of War as Acting Judge Advocate General during your practical detachment from the office."

The reference here was to Revised Statutes, section 1132, which authorizes the President "during the absence of the chief of any military bureau" to empower "some officer of the department or corps whose chief is absent to take charge thereof." The letter continued:

"I believe that the conception which the service has of your relation to both offices has succeeded in minimizing the importance of each office and that this has resulted already in considerable disadvantage to yourself and has resulted in no advantage to me. I submit this matter to you wholly disinterestedly personally, but with the absolute conviction that the order ought to issue. If the suggestion should be agreeable to you, I should ask you to join in the memorandum to the Secretary of War asking for its accomplishment."

I am expressing it mildly when I say that the conviction thus communicated was a total surprise to myself. Its formal manner of transmission, when a personal visit from an adjacent room would have sufficed to open the matter frankly and naturally, gave me the impression of being virtually charged with a neglect of duty which others had observed but of which I was myself totally unaware, and showed me that I was hardly in a position to pass an unbiased judgment upon the propriety of my being relieved from titular charge of the office of the Judge Advocate General pursuant to the statute. I therefore resolved, without personal protest or even argument, to leave the matter entirely in the hands of yourself, the natural judge of the proprieties. My reply of November 4 read:

"MY DEAR GEN. ANSELL: It will be entirely agreeable to me to have you take up directly and in your own way with the Secretary of War the subject matter of your letter of yesterday"— and closed with a simple sentence disclaiming knowledge of any supposed embarrassment to public business as alluded to. No further communication passed between us nor between the officer in question and the Secretary of War, for it will be noted that both his original proposal and my reply were expressly directed to his taking up the matter "directly with the Secretary of War." But on November 6, two days later, the officer presented in person to the Acting Chief of Staff a memorandum containing a draft order for his own designation, under Revised Statutes, section 1132, as Acting Judge Advocate General, and asking that the order "be published immediately." This memorandum began: "Doubtless the Judge Advocate General of the Army is 'absent' from this office in the sense of 1132 Revised Statutes, and has been so absent since I have been here in charge," and it ended thus: "I am authorized to say that Gen. Crowder himself is entirely agreeable to my calling this matter to your attention." The Acting Chief of Staff, taking this memorandum at its face value, corroborated as it was by certain representations from the officer, which raise a further question of veracity, on the same day made an order designating the officer as Acting Judge Advocate General; but this order was marked for suspended publication until December 9. Meanwhile neither the order itself nor any information about it from the officer himself or from any other officer was brought to the notice of yourself. On November 17, of your own motion, you addressed to me a personal letter, expressing your disinclination that I should permit my duties as Provost Marshal General to encroach increasingly on my time, and asking whether it would be possible for me to allot my time more liberally to the office of the Judge Advocate General. On November 18, I replied, pointing out that the revision of the Selective Service Regulations, pending during October and November, was now completed and that thereafter I should expect to divide my time in even shares between the two offices. On the same day, November 18, your attention was first called to the unpublished order of November 6, above mentioned, the occasion being the presentation to you by that officer of a list of proposed appointees as judge advocates. Your inquiry of him whether I had been consulted upon those names evoked from him the revelation of the existence of that order, which had been obtained by him under the circumstances above mentioned. Neither you nor myself had up to that time been made aware of its existence. Contrary as it was to your own expressed desire in your letter of November 17 to myself, you promptly directed The Adjutant General to revoke it, and that revocation appears of record in the file of The Adjutant General, dated November 19, the next day.

This chronology, taken from each day's records, makes it plain that the revocation of the order was due solely to the fact that the order was obtained surreptitiously without your knowledge and was contrary to your express and recorded intention; that you revoked it the moment you became aware of its existence; and that I myself was not aware of its existence until you informed me.

Meanwhile, however, the memorandum of the officer in question, arising out of the Texas Mutineers' case, and claiming extraordinary powers for the Judge Advocate General, had been prepared by him in this office, but without bringing it to my knowledge. It bears date of November 10, but in the officer's own handwriting; and there is nothing to show when it was transmitted to your office; for it never passed through my hands, nor did it ever come to my knowledge, in any form, nor was the existence of such a memorandum even suspected by me, until after the completion of the entire chronology above set forth. It was on the evening of Friday, November 23, four days after the above order had been revoked by you, that I first received from your hands the memorandum in question, with the request to consider its legal argument for the power therein claimed. During the days of November 24, 25, and 26 I proceeded with a study of the precedents, calling two skilled judge advocates to my assistance, and on Tuesday, November 27, a brief, so dated, was filed with you by me. This brief exposed the legal fallacies of the above officer's memorandum, pointed out its suppression of material and conclusive authorities to the contrary, and expressed the view to which I have ever since adhered, viz, that the power did not exist under present law, and that the only source of remedy would be a grant of power from Congress. On the same day, November 27, you expressed assent to the views set forth in my brief; and your memorandum concludes: "A frank appeal to the legislature for added power is wiser." This concurrence of views between yourself and myself was reached, I note, on November 27, and not before then.

It is a peculiar coincidence that the above officer's surreptitious act of securing the order designating him as Acting Judge Advocate General took place on November 6; that his brief claiming extraordinary judicial powers for the Judge Advocate General (which he had been preparing, as his letter states, since October 18) was withheld until at least a week later than the signing of the order which placed him in the position, as he supposed, to exercise that extraordinary power; and that although the order itself which placed him in office was so managed as to be kept from your knowledge, yet the memorandum which would have added that power to his office was handed directly to you (not to me), and at a time when you still supposed that I was the incumbent, and not he. The coincidence is so remarkable than an inference of deliberate and ambitious planning for personal power, and only for personal power, is unavoidable.

At the risk of being tedious, I have thus set forth from the records the chronology of this episode; for thus alone could these recent public insinuations—reflecting both on your supposed conduct and on mine—be conclusively dispelled. It must now be clear to all that the actual reason for your revocation of the order designating that officer as Acting Judge Advocate General was that it had been surreptitiously obtained and was contrary to your initial and constant intention; that the memorandum claiming for the Judge Advocate General an unauthorized power to correct court-martial errors was not brought to my notice until four days after the above order had been revoked; that your consensus with me as to the unsoundness of that claim was not reached until a week subsequent to that revocation; that therefore the revocation of that order could not possibly have been motivated, either in your mind or in mine, by our failure to accept his views on the subject of the legal powers of the Judge Advocate General; and, in conclusion, that the assertion or insinuation that his appointment was revoked because of your and my opposition to his views as to the proper method of improving the law, is baseless and unjust to us both.

I must, however, continue for a moment on this subject, because the same officer, in his letter of February 17, 1919 (Cong. Record, p. 3983, Feb. 1919), makes a second charge of a similar sort, which is not only equally baseless but reveals on his part the same singular methods of manipulation. In that letter, setting forth his continued efforts "to break up such a static and intolerable legal situation," he continues:

"In September (1918), upon my insistent recommendation, power was established in the Acting Judge Advocate General in France to make rulings upon matters of the administration of military justice, in our forces in France which would control all commanding generals until overruled by the Secretary of War. This is now being opposed by the commanding general American Expeditionary Forces, and my own action and propriety in procuring the issue of this order is being subjected to question."

The reference is to General Order No. 84, dated September 11, 1918, amending Section II of General Order No. 7, dated January 17, 1918, the latter being the general order, above referred to, which aimed to avoid the recurrence of such dilemmas as that of the Texas mutineers' case, so far as the Judge Advocate General's powers permitted. The facts are in the first place, that this amending General Order No. 84 was also obtained surreptitiously by the above officer; but in the second place, that it has not been opposed by Gen. Pershing. A brief statement will suffice to show this. The original General Order No. 7, in its Section II, applying to the branch Judge Advocate General's Office in France, directed that office to "report" to the reviewing authority any legal errors, "to the end that any such sentence or any part thereof so found to be invalid or void shall not be carried into effect." The amending General Order No. 84 substituted for the above clause this sentence: "Any sentence or any part thereof, so found to be illegal, defective, or void, in whole or in part, shall be disapproved, modified, or set aside, in accordance with the recommendation of the Acting Judge Advocate General (in France)." This amendment was prepared by the officer above referred to. Obviously, its language embodies precisely the grant of mandatory appellate power in the Judge Advocate General for which he had been contending in his brief of November, 1917—a contention which was at that time explicitly repudiated by both yourself and myself; and since February, 1918, the bill above mentioned, curing the defect of law, and granting the power to the President, was still pending in Congress.

Since his return from France in July, 1918, this officer being senior on duty in my office, had the actual supervision of all matters of military justice: the selective draft then requiring my most urgent attention, and the volume of rulings coming from the 50 officers of the military justice division being left entirely for the final signature of the officer in question. He thereupon prepared this amending order, embodying the fundamental principle already expressly repudiated both by you and by me, and took it, not to yourself nor to myself, but directly to the office of the Chief of Staff. The radical nature of the proposed change of rule in this respect was not called to the attention of that office; rather was it represented as involving merely verbal improvements. It issued on September 11; and amidst the mass of other printed general orders it never came to either your attention or mine until recently. Here, then, was a second attempt to introduce into our overseas practice, surreptitiously, the same unsound assumption of power which had been already squarely rejected nearly a year before.

This sudden and inconsidered introduction of such a fundamental novelty was indeed calculated to evoke objection from the reviewing authorities in France, more especially from a commander in the field who had been accorded in unprecedented fashion that independence of military action so wisely exercised by Gen. Pershing. The unwisdom of this act, added to its surreptitiousness, was under the circumstances extreme. But it is not true to assert that the order "is now being opposed by the commanding general American Expeditionary Forces." Had it been opposed or protested this attitude would have been natural enough. On the contrary, no word of such opposition or objection is anywhere on record in my office, nor can any trace of it be found. The only document in which is found any objection on a point of law, on the part of the commanding general in disagreement with the Acting Judge Advocate General in France, is a memorandum of November 14, 1918, raising a question under the thirty-seventh article of war. That article, which applies equally at home and in the field, lays down the usual modern rule forbidding that an erroneous ruling on evidence or procedure shall be ground for disapproval unless it affects the substantial rights of the accused "in the opinion of the reviewing or confirming authority"; and the contention of Gen. Pershing's judge advocate was that under this statute only the reviewing authority can pass upon the question of insufficiency of evidence as a substantial error. There is no mention of General Order No. 84 in the entire document, nor any reference to its contents. Neither in this nor in any other document yet received from Gen. Pershing's headquarters is there any opposition to General Order No. 84. The insinuation that here again the Army—this time the Army in France—is opposing a beneficent measure of reform in military law is baseless.

The foregoing two instances of a groundless charge that I have opposed the reforming efforts of this officer are intimately connected by him with a third instance equally groundless, in which the misrepresentation has been so significant to the public that I must in this place record its refutation. In the same letter of this officer, published in the Congressional Record, February 19, last, page 3983, column 1, the officer is supposed to be exonerating himself from criticism made on the floor of Congress that he "should have gone directly to the President" when balked in his efforts made within the department. Purporting then to explain the "impossibilities of such a course," he gives as an illustration his action when four sentences of death were pending in the department for confirmation and when this office had recommended execution: "I went to the head of the office," meaning myself, of course, presumably, "and orally presented to him my views in opposition. I then filed with him a memorandum in which I did my best to show what seemed to me to be obvious, that these men had been most unfairly tried, had not been tried at all, and ought not to die or suffer any other punishment upon such records. Discovering that these memoranda had not been presented to the Secretary of War, and feeling justified by the fact that I had no other forum in this department, I gave a copy of the memorandum to a distinguished member of the Judiciary Committee of the House and was told by him that he could present the cases to the President himself." The story as thus told is plausible, and purports to condemn the superior authorities of the War Department, and implies that the subsequent commutation was obtained solely by this outside intervention of a Member of Congress. But a simple perusal of the official files now lying before me demonstrate that the charge is a mere fabrication and a cruel one.

These cases of the sentence of death had been pending during March, 1918, in this office. These several officers in the Division of Military Justice had, after scrutiny, found no legal error, and the record in that condition, approved by the very officer who now makes this charge, had been placed in my hands. In the meanwhile, I submitted it informally to more than one other officer, including a judge advocate, not at that time attached to this office, who had taken part in the 1916 revision of the Court-Martial Manual in the chapter upon procedure, witnesses, and evidence, and whose name is well known to the legal profession as an authority on the subject of evidence; the memorandum of the latter disclosed no reason to doubt the adequacy of the proof of the offense. Meantime, also, I had directed further inquiries to be made in my office as to the practice in respect to death sentences for the offense of sleeping on post in the theater of war; for two of the sentences were imposed for the offense of sleeping on post.

On April 5, 1918, my memorandum transmitted the four death cases to Gen. March, Acting Chief of Staff; the memorandum including this statement, "There is a very large question in my mind as to whether clemency should be extended," and calling attention to the express request of the commander-in-chief in France and of his judge advocate (already alluded to above in this letter), that the death sentences should be confirmed. On April 15 the senior officer on duty in my office (the one now making these charges) presented a memorandum to me, at my request, examining the four cases in detail. In the two cases of sentences for refusal to drill this memorandum refers to the plea of guilty put in by the accused; then, treating together the two cases of Sebastian and Cook, sentenced for sleeping on post, the memorandum continues: "The death penalty in each of these cases was awarded for sleeping on post, after a plea of guilty." The memorandum goes on: "These cases were not well tried," setting forth the inadequate composition of the court: "those were mere youth; not one made the slightest fight for his life: each was defended by a second lieutenant; such defense as each had was not worthy the name. Were I charged with the defense of such a boy on trial for his life, I would not, while charged with that duty, permit him to make a plea that meant the forfeit of his life." This memorandum of the officer in question was dated April 15. It was addressed personally to me in rough draft, and was not such a document as is usually prepared, in final form, for transmission beyond the immediate chief. On the very next day a document dated April 16, signed by me personally, was filed with the Chief of Staff; it begins: "Since our interview on the four cases from France * * * my attention has been invited to certain facts of which I had no knowledge at the time of the interview and to which I think your attention should be invited." The memorandum then proceeds in the fourth and concluding paragraph as follows: "Permit me finally to observe, without reopening the case, that it will always be a matter of regret to me that the four cases upon which we were called upon to act were not well tried." The memorandum then continues, using almost literally the language of the above officer's memorandum: "Each of the four defendants was a mere youth, and I am a little impressed by the fact that not one of them made a fight for his life. Each of the men was defended by a second lieutenant who made no special plea for them. I regret exceedingly that in each case the accused was allowed to make a plea of guilty. As counsel for them I should have strongly advised that they plead not guilty." It will be observed that this language is almost a literal reproduction of the language of the above officer's memorandum above quoted and filed with me on the very day before. On the very next day, viz, April 17, the Chief of Staff writes a memorandum to the Secretary of War.

The notable fact of chronology thus is that within 24 hours after receiving the memorandum of the senior officer on duty under me, in opposition to the confirmation of these sentences, I myself drafted and sent to the Chief of Staff a memorandum covering the very points mentioned by the above officer and using, in large part, the identical language. Furthermore, within 24 hours more, or within 48 hours after memorandum in question was dated, the Chief of Staff had filed a memorandum with the Secretary of War. On May 1 the Secretary of War forwarded the records to the President, recommending clemency, and on May 4 the President remitted, by pardon, the sentence of death for the two men sleeping on post and reduced the sentence of the other two men to three years (for refusal to drill), thus following exactly the recommendation of the Secretary of War, and explicitly thanking the Secretary for his careful presentation of the cases.

Whatever, therefore, may have been said to the President during this interval by the Member of Congress, it is obvious that the President's action was taken as the culmination of a careful study of the case within the department and of a series of memoranda initiated in my department and following their due course to the Secretary of War; and that this conclusion was the result of the united efforts of all the War Department officials concerned with that subject in which the rôle of the officer in question was only a minor one, and was at the beginning far from being a humane one.

But the specially notable fact is that I not only incorporated and presented the ideas of the officer in question, but that I was unfortunately thus led into an important blunder of fact through my reliance upon it. In paragraph 4 of my memorandum I stated, as a ground for doubting the thoroughness of the trial, "in each case the accused was allowed to make a plea of guilty." The Chief of Staff, in his memorandum opposing the extension of clemency, pointed out the blunder, as follows: "Referring to paragraph 4 of the memorandum of the Judge Advocate General, I do not find that his statement, 'I regret exceedingly that in each case the accused was allowed to make a plea of guilty,' is a fact; the record shows that two of these men, namely, Pvt. Sebastian and Pvt. Cook, did plead not guilty, and in the cases of the other two men, Privts. LeDoyen and Fishback, although the accused pleaded guilty, the court proceeded to take evidence in the cases in spite of that plea." The significant thing about this error in the officer's memorandum was that I, relying implicitly on his memorandum, was led to repeat the same error in my own memorandum for the Chief of Staff, thus furnishing the latter the opening for his destructive criticism above quoted.

It is now apparent that the statement in the officer's above-quoted letter of February 19, "discovering that these memoranda had not been presented to the Secretary of War," is not only a gross misrepresentation, in that the very ideas and language of his memorandum were incorporated in my own memorandum, but that this document went forward within 24 hours to the Chief of Staff and within 48 hours to the Secretary of War, and that these documents were officially on file and could have been inspected in the file at any moment; so that the officer in question must have gone to the Member of Congress without any attempt to discover the facts; and one year later he has published far and wide a defamatory statement which is contrary to facts as they stare out from the face of official records.

I confess myself unable to comprehend such methods of manipulation in this agitation. Certainly, to cope with them would be endless, and I shall not attempt to continue the refutation of any others of the specific and completely groundless charges reflecting upon my supposed personal attitude.

I close this part of my comments, regretfully entered into by me, with the observation that neither in these nor in any other aspects of this issue of fundamental legal principle has there been exhibited at any time any opposition on my part to measures of real improvement in military law or procedure. The issue here was simply whether the incumbent of my office, whether acting ad interim or for the four-year term of appointment, should be vested with a power which belongs, if anywhere, in the President, and which Congress alone can grant to him. Neither ambition nor any other motive will ever induce me to assent to an illegal and unwise assumption of official power. Apart from this single instance, I have never opposed any action or proposal of the officer in question directed either to the improvement of military justice in general or to the doing of better justice in an individual case; and this for the simple reason that he has never made any such proposals to me. Except for the period of his absence in France for about 90 days in April-July last, he has been, since August, 1917, the senior officer on duty in my office, with ample opportunity to introduce general improvements of procedure or to remedy individual cases; and the moral responsibility for not initiating whatever might have been done and was done lies therefore upon him for the greater part of the war period. How ample was that general opportunity to act, unchecked either by me or by yourself, may be plainly seen by the manner in which General Order No. 84, above mentioned, was promulgated in September, 1918. And how little he did in fact avail himself of individual opportunities may be inferred from the circumstances that in the three cases recently cited on the floor of Congress as cases of excessively severe sentences in which this office is said to have harshly denied an application for mitigation by clemency (C. M. Nos. 113076, 115506, and Robbin's case), the document containing the refusal to recommend clemency bears in each of the three cases the signature of that officer himself.

I would have preferred to be spared the recital of these facts. But even as it is I have refrained from the disposal of other specific criticisms, equally groundless, in which personal mention would have been necessary. I have said no more than seemed unavoidable in refuting these unjust innuendoes, now so widely spread that it is perhaps impossible for the truth ever to overtake them.

(III). Recommendations.—I have not made my position clear, Mr. Secretary, if I have given the impression that in my opinion there is nothing to change or to improve in our system of military justice. My chief concern in this letter has been to remove the slurs that have been cast upon the whole system as such; to refute by plain facts the extreme and exaggerated criticisms that are calculated to undermine, unjustly and needlessly, the public confidence in that system; and to redeem, if I can assist in doing so, the honor of that admirable band of conscientious and able officers who have been called to share in its administration during the last two years. I would like the American people to know confidently and take pride in the fact that we possess a genuine and adequate system of military justice, founded upon the Constitution of our forefathers and the acts of Congress of our contemporaries—administered in the trial courts by officers required to be familiar with it—and thoroughly scrutinized in its appellate stages by professional lawyers whose sole object is to insure conformity to the requirements of law and to secure the just protection of the accused.

That military justice can not be improved in any details could certainly not be maintained by anyone. But neither does anyone maintain that civilian justice is perfect. The experience of the last two years, when carefully studied, will doubtless reveal wise measures by which improvements of the military code can be secured. The same is true of each one of our institutions, civil as well as military, that has passed through the crucible of war time. But it will first be necessary to compare divergent opinions, based on differences of local experience, and of important policies. At the present moment there lies before me a voluminous report, in manuscript, representing the collated result of suggestions of improvement, prepared at my request by each one of the officers on duty in my office, as based on his own observations and experience. In its final form this report will be of the greatest value.

Meanwhile, as it is never my preference to remain content with a defensive or critical attitude, but rather to offer constructive measures where apt and necessary, I venture to select a few proposals, representing those which in my judgment offer the greatest promise of benefit and require the least assistance from statutory change. I refrain from explaining at length in this letter the effect of each proposal: it will be fairly obvious to one familiar with the military system.

The specific proposals are as follows:

1. (a) By general order amend paragraphs 75 and 76 of the Manual of Courts-Martial relating to submission and investigation of charges, so as to require the officer immediately exercising summary court-martial jurisdiction over the command to which the accused belongs either to personally conduct the investigation or else to depute it to an officer of experience, preferably not below the rank of captain, and to confront the accused with witnesses and prepare a summary of the evidence and settle upon it in agreement with the accused, substantially as in the British practice.

(b) Amend paragraph 78 of the Manual "Determination of proper trial court" by a general order providing in substance that the officer exercising court-martial jurisdiction shall not order a case to trial until he has received and considered the written opinion of his staff judge advocate or of this office.

The intent of this proposal is, by laying down with greater particularity the duties and responsibilities of investigating officers and of staff judge advocates, to guard against any possibility of (a) hasty, ill-considered, or arbitrary action by any commanding officer, (b) ordering any person to trial without full and careful, as well as impartial, investigation of the case, and until reasonable probability of his guilt has been shown, or (c) trivial cases going before general courts; and also to insure adequate preparation in all cases ordered to trial.

2. (a) Amend the forty-fifth article of war by striking out the words "in time of peace."

(b) By proper amendment of the Articles of War, so change the composition and increase the importance and the powers of the special court-martial, that (like the British district court-martial) it may award confinement up to two years with accompanying forfeitures of pay and allowances; and may adjudge a suspended sentence of dishonorable discharge, to be suspended until the soldier's release from confinement.

(c) Provide by general order further amending the seventy-eighth paragraph of the Manual for Courts-Martial by way of caution to convening authorities as an expression of the policy of the Government, a direction, substantially in the language of the general order issued January 22, 1919, that "Trial by general court-martial will be ordered only where the punishment that might be imposed by a special or summary court or by the commanding officer under the provisions of the one hundred and fourth article of war would be under all circumstances of the case clearly inadequate."

I believe the changes included in this proposal would tend powerfully to increase the number of special courts-martial, and correspondingly decrease the general courts, as in the British Army; and thereby automatically to reduce the possibility of unduly severe sentences. Striking the words "in time of peace" out of the forty-fifth article of war would enable the President to fix the maximum limits of punishments, in war as well as peace.

3. Recognizing the need, in the trial of serious, difficult and complicated cases of an impartial legal adviser to the trial court, and recognizing also the difficulties involved in the institutions of so far-reaching a change in our system of court-martial procedure, I propose, in order to try out the plan—

(a) A general order, modeled after the practice of the British field general court-martial, of appointing an especially qualified member on the court who is required to be present at the trial of all serious, difficult, and complicated cases, this member to be a member of the Judge Advocate General's Department, if one be reasonably available.

4. Adopt either the amendment to Revised Statutes 1199, proposed by the Secretary of War January 19, 1918, which covers the ground more completely and more flexibly than the now pending bills, and also leaves the final power of ultimate decision in the President as Commander in Chief of the Army; or else adopt the plan embodied in the proposed joint resolution sent to Senator McKellar February 20, 1919, which allows the President to "correct, change, reverse, or set aside any sentence of a court-martial found by him to have been erroneously adjudged whether by error of law or of fact."

This would supply the needed appellate jurisdiction over court-martial sentences, lacking under existing law, and would place it in the Commander in Chief of the Army, who would normally act on the recommendation of his constituted legal adviser in military matters, the Judge Advocate General.

EXTRACT FROM ADJUTANT GENERAL'S CABLEGRAM NO. 663, DATED JANUARY 20, 1918.

Paragraph 3. Order made directing Brig Gen. Walter A. Bethel, judge advocate, assume charge of branch office of Judge Advocate General established in France by War Department General Orders, No. 7, current series, and to perform the duties of Acting Judge Advocate General indicated in said order.

EXTRACT FROM ADJUTANT GENERAL'S CABLEGRAM NO. 666, DATED JANUARY 20, 1918.

Paragraph 1. General Orders, No. 7, these headquarters, publish courts-martial rules of procedure prescribed by President, effective February 1, an outline of which is furnished for your information. Rule 1: Sentence of death or dismissal of officer confirmed by commanding general of territorial department or division not to be executed until review of record in the office of Judge Advocate General or branch thereof. Action to be entered in record and to conclude with recital that the execution of sentence will be directed in orders after the record of trial has been reviewed by Judge Advocate General and that jurisdiction is retained to take additional or corrective action prior to or at time of publication of general court-martial order in case. Rule 2: Sentence of dishonorable discharge not intended to be suspended will not be ordered executed before review of record, as in rule 1, and action to conclude with same recital. Rule 3: When record of trial in cases covered by rules 1 and 2 is reviewed in the office of Judge Advocate General or branch thereof the reviewing authority will be informed as to the legality of his proposed action. Errors and omissions which admit of correction will be indicated. Proper disposition of case suggested. Rule 4: Delay in execution of sentence by reason of these rules to be credited on any term of confinement or imprisonment imposed. Rule 5: Procedure prescribed in rules 1 and 2 to apply to commanding generals in the field when the Secretary of War so decides and orders. Rule 6: Authorizes the Secretary of War to establish branches of the office of Judge Advocate General for review of courts-martial records. Section 2 of the order reads as follows: There is hereby established, in aid of the revisory power conferred on the Judge Advocate General of the Army by section 1199, Revised Statutes, a branch of the office of Judge Advocate General, at Paris, France, or at some other point convenient to the headquarters of the American Expeditionary Forces in French, to be selected by the officer detailed as the head of such branch office, after conference with the commanding general of the American Expeditionary Forces in France. The officer so detailed shall be the Acting Judge Advocate General of the American Expeditionary Forces in Europe, and shall report to and be controlled in the performance of his duties by the Judge Advocate General of the Army. The records of all general courts-martial in which is imposed a sentence of death, dismissal, or dishonorable discharge, and of all military commissions originating in the said expeditionary forces will be forwarded to the said branch office for review, and it shall be the duty of the said Acting Judge Advocate General to examine and review such records, to return to the proper commanding officer for correction such as are incomplete, and to report to the proper officer any defect or irregularity which renders the findings or sentence invalid or void, in whole or in part, to the end that any such sentence or any part thereof so found to be invalid or void shall not be carried into effect. The said Acting Judge Advocate General will forward all records in which action is complete, together with his reviews thereof and all proceedings thereon, to the Judge Advocate General of the Army for permanent file.

WAR DEPARTMENT,
(OFFICE OF THE JUDGE ADVOCATE GENERAL,
Washington, February 13, 1918.

From: The Office of the Judge Advocate General.

To: All department and division judge advocates.

Subject: General Order No. 7, War Department, 1918, its purpose, procedure thereunder, etc.; suggestions as to office administration.

1. The procedure under General Order No. 7, War Department, 1918, was established to enable the War Department to do substantial justice in those cases in which it is found, on reviewing, in this office, the records of trial by general courts-martial, that persons have been improperly or insufficiently charged with, or convicted on insufficient or illegal evidence of, serious crimes or offenses, and dishonorable discharge or dismissal has already become an accomplished fact. Cases of this character are not numerous, but a case occasionally arises in which remedial action by way of remission of sentence with an offer of restoration to duty or reenlistment is, at best, but a futile attempt to do justice so long as a discharge or dismissal which has been finally executed can not be reached and set aside or reversed, but must remain standing forever against the record of the accused. Cases where the death sentence is imposed also fall within this class. Great embarrassment would result if it should be held that a death sentence was illegal after the same had been executed.

The necessity for a new procedure growing out of the circumstances indicated, it goes without saying that it was not intended by the publication of General Order No. 7 to magnify or increase the importance of this office or decrease the importance or responsibility of department or division judge advocates.

2. In order to bring about the necessary cooperation in the enforcement of General Order No. 7, War Department, 1918, the following suggestions are made for your information and guidance:

(a) In all records of trial by general court-martial falling within the purview of General Order No. 7, War Department, 1918, to wit: Cases involving a sentence of death, dismissal of an officer, or dishonorable discharge of an enlisted man, in which it is not intended to suspend the dishonorable discharge, the department or division judge advocate should prepare a review of the evidence in the case. This should be as brief and concise as possible, but should outline clearly the evidence upon which the conviction must rest. A copy of this review or summary of the evidence should be attached to the record to which it pertains and forwarded for file therewith in this office.

(b) In all cases in which the execution of sentence is deferred until the record of trial is reviewed in this office, judge advocates, prior to forwarding the record of trial, will take the necessary data from the same, draft the general court-martial order, give it the date of action by the reviewing authority, and, upon receiving notice from the office of the Judge Advocate General, or any branch thereof, that the record is legally sufficient to support the findings and sentence, cause the general court-martial order to be published in the usual form. This will make unnecessary the return of the record.

(c) The action of a reviewing authority upon a record of trial which is to be forwarded to this office for review before the execution of sentence should be entered in substantially the following form, the necessary changes being made to conform the action to the facts of each particular case:

————— (Place and date.)

In the foregoing case of ——— the sentence is approved (but the period of confinement is reduced to ———). The execution of the sentence will be directed in orders as of this date after the record of trial has been reviewed in the Office of the Judge Advocate General, or a branch thereof, and its legality there determined. Jurisdiction is retained to take any addition or corrective action that may be found necessary prior to or at the time of the publication of the general court-martial order in this case.

_____, Commanding.

(d) When the record of trial in any case is found legally insufficient to support the findings and sentence, the record will be returned for the necessary corrective action, which will be entered on the record in substantially the following form, the necessary changes being made to conform the action to the facts of the particular case:

_____ (Place and date.)

In the foregoing case of _____, under the jurisdiction retained in the action dated _____, the following corrective action is taken:

(Action.)

As thus modified the sentence will be duly executed. _____ is designated as the place of confinement. (Or such final order by way of disposing of the case as the action may require.)

_____, Commanding.

(e) When the additional or corrective action outlined above has been taken, the necessary changes will be made in the general court-martial order prior to the publication of the same. It is needless to say that any prior action which has been changed or nullified by subsequent action will not be included in the general court-martial order as published.

(f) The letter of advice sent from this office will give in each case the court-martial record number given the record upon its receipt in this office. It is desired that the printed copy of the court-martial order be made to carry at the end thereof, in brackets, the number reported by this office, thus: (J. A. G. O. No. ____.) Five copies of the general court-martial order in each case will, when published, be forwarded to this office as promptly as possible.

3. The following suggestions are made with reference to the question of office administration. It is hoped they may be helpful and that their adoption will bring about greater uniformity in the administration of military justice:

(a) Judge advocates should not recommend the reference of charges for trial by general courts-martial until thorough investigation has shown that the charges as laid can be substantiated by sufficient legal evidence.

(b) They should endeavor in every proper manner to limit the number of trials by general courts-martial. No case should be so tried where the offense committed can be adequately punished by a minor court or by administrative punishments imposed under authority of the 104th Article of War.

(c) They should also aim to prevent the trial of cases whenever it appears on investigation that the offender is lacking in mental responsibility. In all cases where it appears probable that the accused is lacking in physical, mental, or moral equipment as an efficient fighting man, the psychiatrist assigned to duty with their commands should be called into consultation. Disposition of the case other than through trial by general court-martial should be made whenever full examination shows this to be proper. Judge advocates should realize, however, that the responsibility for decision in all cases rests upon them and not upon the psychiatrist who may be called into consultation. It should be the latter's duty to advise but not to decide.

(d) As the discipline of the various commands improves it may be possible to reduce trials by general courts-martial to those cases in which it is determined by the methods hereinbefore indicated that the accused who is under general court-martial charges is not a desirable soldier and that his further retention in the service is a waste of time, effort, and money.

(e) When a record of trial by general court-martial has been received in the office of a judge advocate, it becomes his duty to thoroughly study the case and to recommend such punishment as should be approved. Where the accused has within him the elements of service, the following principles should govern in deciding upon the punishment to be awarded in time of war:

(i) Guard houses are breeding places for crime. They are not designed to foster self-respect. Men should be kept out of them in all cases except where restraint is necessary.

(ii) Time spent in confinement is time lost from training. Our task is to turn out in the shortest possible time the greatest possible number of trained men.

(iii) Whenever and wherever possible, men sentenced to undergo confinement or hard labor should be drilled with their organizations and required to serve punishment when other men are resting or off duty.

(f) It is desired that judge advocates make every possible effort to bring offenders who must be tried by general court-martial to trial at the earliest practicable date, to the end that the period between arrest or confinement on the charges and the date of the trial may be reduced to the lowest possible limit.

(g) Judge advocates will also expedite in every possible way the preparation of records of trial, their review of the same, and action thereon by the reviewing authority. They will also endeavor to forward records to this office as nearly as possible on the date on which action is taken by the reviewing authority.

(Signed) E. H. CROWDER,
Judge Advocate General.

Memorandum for the Judge Advocate General.

DEAR GEN. CROWDER: You may recall that about two or three days ago I reported to you the instructions of the Chief of Staff, that before Col. Creager's nomination could be sent in it would be necessary to communicate with Gen. Pershing. As you were familiar with the whole situation I suggested that you prepare a cable, which you stated you would do, provided I would give you the reference to the cable recently sent Gen. Pershing relative to the establishment of a branch of your office in France. I sent you this information day before yesterday, stating that the cable number was our cable 666, and have been expecting to get your draft or a cable from Gen. Pershing, but so far have seen nothing on the subject.

Very truly, yours,

LADD.

To: All judge advocates serving with Expeditionary Forces in Europe.

Subject: Procedure under General Order No. 7, War Department, 1918. Sending of cases to the Acting Judge Advocate General in France.

1. Lieut. Col. E. A. Kreger, judge advocate, United States Army, has been designated as Acting Judge Advocate General for the American Expeditionary Forces in Europe, under the provisions of General Order No. 7, War Department, January 17, 1918.

Acting under the provisions of this order Col. Kreger will establish an office in France and will advise all judge advocates with our Expeditionary Forces in Europe of the location of such office. Under the said order cases in which the sentences imposed require confirmation by the commanding general of the Army in the field before being executed should be sent to such commanding officer for confirmation before being forwarded to the office of the Acting Judge Advocate General for review. Cases which do not require such confirmation should be forwarded from the headquarters of the reviewing officers direct to the office of the Acting Judge Advocate General.

Any additional advice which may be necessary in order to secure the proper enforcement and operation of General Order No. 7, War Department, 1918, will be issued by the Acting Judge Advocate General for the American Expeditionary Forces in Europe direct to the judge advocates concerned.

(Signed) E. H. CROWDER,
Judge Advocate General.

Paragraph 3. For the Judge Advocate General. With reference to your letter February 25. Johnson's promotion along with many others in the various staff departments seems quite out of proportion, and the line and staff officers here feel that such promotions made at home are unfair to men who are serving in France. I have tried to impress this upon the War Department, but the staff departments at Washington evidently continue to press for promotion and men promoted at home are now relatively very far ahead of men serving over here. I hope that the plan proposed in paragraph 1, my cablegram 680, and approved by the Secretary of War will receive earnest consideration and that it will be adopted. This plan will relieve us all of probable equitable commitments to individuals, so many of whom fail to achieve after promotion what was expected of them. I can not too strongly urge the adoption of the plan proposed and think it should apply to all other staffs at home as well as to our forces abroad. In the meantime no further promotions ought to be made at home until the proposed system is adopted or rejected. May I ask that this matter be discussed with Gen. March.

Subparagraph A. With reference to a branch of the Judge Advocate General's office in France to review certain court-martial proceedings after they have been acted upon by the Judge Advocate here, the reason for this is not clear. It submits to review cases [grand jurors] within the jurisdiction of department commander in time of peace and is in direct conflict with broad and liberal character of President's instructions at inauguration of command. Any authority outside of control of the Commander in Chief will cause delay in possibly more cases. Beyond doubt punishment for desertion or misconduct must be almost summary if it is to have deterrent effect. This is practiced in both British and French Armies. Any method that causes delay and possible miscarriage of justice would be unfortunate for us and injurious to the morale of our allies. The circumstances under which we are serving are in no sense comparable to our Civil War conditions, as here we are fighting a strong and virile foreign nation and every possible means must be placed in the hands of the supreme commander to enable him to maintain the morale and integrity of the Army. Any thoughts in the minds of men that they can possibly escape punishment for such misconduct would be disastrous. I am very strongly of the opinion that final authority in these cases should rest with the supreme commander here.

OFFICE OF THE CHIEF OF STAFF.

Washington, April 15, 1918.

Memorandum for the Chief of Staff:

Subject: The establishment of branch of the office of the Judge Advocate General in France.

1. Herewith is a memorandum from the Judge Advocate General, dated April 3, 1918, occasioned by a cablegram from Gen. Pershing protesting against the establishment of a branch of the office of the Judge Advocate General in France. The cablegram reads:

"Paragraph 3, subparagraph A: With reference to a branch of the Judge Advocate General's Office in France to review certain court-martial proceedings after they have been acted upon by the judge advocate here, the reason for this is not clear. It submits to review cases within the jurisdiction of department commander in time of peace and is in direct conflict with broad and liberal character of President's instructions at inauguration of command. Any authority outside of control of the commander in chief will cause delay in possibly more cases. Beyond doubt punishment for desertion or misconduct must be almost summary if it is to have deterrent effect. This is practiced in both British and French armies. Any method that causes delay and possibly miscarriage of justice would be unfortunate for us and injurious to morale of the supreme commander to enable him to maintain the morale and integrity of the Army. Any thoughts in the minds of men that they can possibly escape punishment for such misconduct would be disastrous. I am very strongly of the opinion that final authority in these cases should rest with the supreme commander here." (No. 779, March 24, 1918).

The Judge Advocate General sets out in sequence communications upon the subject of the establishment of the branch office in question. He first explains General Orders, No. 7, War Department, January 17, 1918, the effect of which is to take from department and division commanders the power of final action in cases where sentences involve death, dismissal of an officer, or dishonorable discharge of a soldier, and to require records in such cases to be examined by the Judge Advocate General's office, or a branch thereof. In order to expedite matters in France, a branch office of the Judge Advocate General's office has been established in Paris, as directed in General Orders, No. 7.

2. On January 20, 1918, Gen. W. A. Bethel, judge advocate, American Expeditionary Forces, was directed to assume charge of the branch office established in France. On the same date there was cabled to Gen. Pershing a digest of paragraph 1 of General Orders, No. 7, and section 2 of the order was quoted in full. On February 20 Gen. Pershing was cabled in effect, as follows: That it was proposed to promote Lieut. Col. E. A. Kreger, judge advocate, to brigadier general and place him in charge of the branch office of the Judge Advocate General in France, established by General Orders, No. 7. If desired, Gen. Bethel could remain in charge of the said branch and Gen. Kreger detailed on the staff of the commanding general. Recommendation was requested.

Gen. Pershing replied, under date of February 25, that he desired Gen. Bethel to remain on his staff and that so much of the cablegram as spoke of Gen. Bethel remaining in charge of the branch office was not understood, and that the cablegram of January 20 appeared to supersede paragraph 169, Special Orders, No. 15, War Department, January 18, 1918, just received in the mail; that Gen. Bethel had not established a branch office and would not do so pending further instructions, and in regard to cablegram of January 20 it was desired to know when the officers might be expected who were to establish the branch office, as cases were being held for action.

Paragraph 169, Special Orders, No. 15, War Department, 1918, is, in effect, as follows: That Gen. Bethel would assume charge of the branch of the office of the Judge Advocate General established in France and would perform the duties of Acting Judge Advocate indicated in General Orders, No. 7. It is not understood by the War Plans Division how the cable of January 20 could appear to supersede paragraph 169, Special Orders, No. 15, War Department, 1918.

3. The Judge Advocate General next sets forth the reasons for the issuance of General Orders, No. 7. All that is necessary to say in this connection is that the Judge Advocate General states that "experience during the present war has led to the conclusion that in a substantial number of cases reviewing authorities have approved and carried into execution sentences based upon proceedings which are invalid or which so palpably prejudiced the substantial rights of the accused that the sentences could not be carried into execution without outraging that sense of justice which characterizes the administration of all American law, military as well as civil." He then proceeds to explain how General Orders, No. 7, was intended to prevent such action. The Judge Advocate General states that inasmuch as Gen. Pershing was fully informed of the establishment of a branch office prior to the time the order went into effect, it is not understood why the objection he now raises should have been so long delayed; that it is not believed that the general is fully informed as to the purposes and the function of the branch office in question, and that when he is, he will not persist in the objection which is raised; and the Judge Advocate General recommends the sending of a cablegram to Gen. Pershing worded as follows:

"The order establishing a branch of the office of the Judge Advocate General in France was promulgated after the most thorough consideration on the part of the War Department. The existence of this order has already justified itself in preventing the execution of one illegal death sentence, not coming, however, from your command. The operation of the order has not delayed the administration of military justice in this country, and the establishment of the branch office in France will prevent delay in the administration of military justice in cases arising within your forces. It is believed that when its purposes and operation are thoroughly understood it will no longer be objectionable to you. Your suggestion that it may result in miscarriages of justice is not concurred in, since it is believed that it will operate to prevent miscarriage of justice by assuring that legality without which no serious sentence should ever be carried into execution."

4. The War Plans Division sees no reason why the cablegram as set forth by the Judge Advocate General should not be sent, and inasmuch as it is known that Gen. Kreger is now in France, the War Plans Division is of the opinion that the cablegram should be added to by stating: "It is desired that conference be had with Gen. Kreger."

5. In this connection it may be stated that the War Plans Division is at present considering Senate 3692, which is an amendment to section 1199, Revised Statutes. The effect of General Orders, No. 7, will be considered in the memorandum submitted upon S. 3692.

WAR DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE JUDGE ADVOCATE GENERAL,
Washington, April 1, 1918.

Memorandum for Gen. Crowder:

1. Gen. Pershing's cablegram No. 779, March 24, 1918, from London to The Adjutant General, Washington, is as follows:

"Paragraph 3, subparagraph A: With reference to a branch of the Judge Advocate General's Office in France to review certain court-martial proceedings after they have been acted upon by the judge advocate here, the reason for this is not clear. It submits to review cases within the jurisdiction of department commander in time of peace and is in direct conflict with broad and liberal character of President's instructions at inauguration of command. Any authority outside of control of the commander in chief will cause delay in possibly more cases. Beyond doubt punishment for desertion or misconduct must be almost summary if it is to have deterrent effect. This is practiced in both British and French armies. Any method that causes delay and possibly miscarriage of justice would be unfortunate for us and injurious to morale of our allies. The circumstances under which we are serving are in no sense comparable to our Civil War conditions, as here we are fighting a strong and virile foreign nation, and every possible means must be placed in the hands of the supreme commander to enable him to maintain the morale and integrity of the Army. Any thoughts in minds of men that they can possibly escape punishment for such misconduct would be disastrous. I am very strongly of the opinion that final authority in these cases should rest with the supreme commander here."

The first thing to be noticed is that notwithstanding the fact that Gen. Pershing was advised of the establishment of this branch office of the office of the Judge Advocate General as early as January 20 last, and was in due course advised of Gen. Kreger's promotion and detail in charge of the branch office, he has voiced no objection until now. A conclusion so long delayed should weaken the confidence the department might otherwise have had in Gen. Pershing's judgment upon the matter. On January 20 the department, in a cablegram (A. G. O. 666), communicated to Gen. Pershing, paragraph 2 of General Orders, No. 7. That paragraph, which is unmistakably explanatory of the purpose of establishing the branch office and the scope of its jurisdiction, is verbatim as follows:

"II. There is hereby established, in aid of the revisory power conferred on the Judge Advocate General of the Army by section 1199, Revised Statutes, a branch of the office of the Judge Advocate General, at Paris, France, or at some other point convenient to the headquarters of the American Expeditionary Forces in France, to be selected by the officer detailed as the head of such branch office, after conference with the commanding general of the American Expeditionary Forces in France. The officer so detailed shall be the acting judge advocate general of the American Expeditionary Forces in Europe, and shall report and be controlled in the performance of his duties by the Judge Advocate General of the Army.

"The records of all general courts-martial in which is imposed a sentence of death, dismissal, or dishonorable discharge, and of all military commissions originating in the said expeditionary forces, will be forwarded to the said branch office for review, and it shall be the duty of the said Acting Judge Advocate General to examine and review such records, to return to the proper commanding officer for correction such as are incomplete, and to report to the proper officer any defect or irregularity which renders the findings or sentence invalid or void, in whole or in part, to the end that any such sentence or any part thereof so found to be invalid or void shall not be carried into effect. The said Acting Judge Advocate General will forward all records in which action is complete, together with his review thereof and all proceedings thereon to the Judge Advocate General of the Army for permanent file.

"By order of the Secretary of War."

And on the same day paragraph 3 (A. G. O., cablegram 663) was communicated to Gen. Pershing, as follows:

"Paragraph 3. Order made directing Brig. Gen. Walter A. Bethel, judge advocate, assume charge branch office of Judge Advocate General established in France by War Department General Orders, No. 7, current series, and to perform the duties of Acting Judge Advocate General indicated in said order."

On February 2 paragraph 2 (A. G. O., cablegram No. 816) was communicated to Gen. Pershing, as follows:

"Paragraph 2. Recently approved tables of organization provides for one additional brigadier general, Judge Advocate General's Department. It is proposed to promote Lieut. Col. E. A. Kreger and detail him in charge of branch office of Judge Advocate General established by our 666. In the event you so desire, Lieut. Col. Walter A. Bethel, Judge Advocate General's Department, may remain in charge of the said branch office and Kreger be detailed on your staff in his stead. Cable recommendation."

In due course the department received paragraph 3 of Gen. Pershing's cablegram No. 644, dated February 25, 1918, as follows:

"Paragraph 3. With reference to paragraph 2, of your cablegram 816 desire that Walter A. Bethel (Brigadier General) remain judge advocate on my staff. So much of your cablegram as speaks of Walter A. Bethel's remaining in charge of branch office not understood. Paragraph 3 your cablegram 663 of 20th appears to supersede paragraph 169, Special Orders, No. 15, War Department, January 18, just received in mail. Brig. Gen. Walter A. Bethel has not established branch office and will not do so pending further instructions. With reference to paragraph 3 your cablegram 663 desire to know when officers may be expected to arrive to establish branch office as cases are being held for his action."

It has to be observed that Gen. Pershing states that he had just received and had his attention invited to paragraph 169, Special Orders, No. 15, War Department, current series, when he sent his cablegram No. 644 of February 25. That paragraph is as follows:

"Until further orders Brig. Gen. Walter A. Bethel, judge advocate, National Army, will assume charge of the branch of the Office of the Judge Advocate General established in France by the War Department, General Orders, No. 7, January 17, 1918, and will perform the duties of Acting Judge Advocate General indicated in the said order."

The action taken was the result of the most thorough consideration at the War Department; it was organic in character and required by law. Even if it were within the power of administration to do so, the revocation of such orders would constitute a serious reflection upon the administrative capacity of the department.

2. But Gen. Pershing's objection is based upon a misconception of the law establishing the relation of the Office of the Judge Advocate General to the military authorities, of whatever rank, empowered to convene general courts-martial. He has ignored section 1199, Revised Statutes, which not only empowers but requires the Judge Advocate General of the Army to revise all proceedings of courts-martial. This is a substantial function which is established by law and can not be dispensed with by administrative direction. All cases are to be reviewed and revised in this department. Besides, in the numerous cases contemplated by the forty-eighth article of war it is there supposed that final action can not be taken by any military authority but that the confirmation of the President is required. As to sentences of death imposed for rape, murder, mutiny, desertion, or spying, the President, speaking through the War Department, has expressed his will as Commander in Chief that the final authority to carry such sentences into execution, imposed by the forty-eighth article of war by a commanding general in the field or a commanding general of a territory, department, or division, shall not be exercised until an independent review of the proceedings has been made by the Judge Advocate General of the Army in the exercise of the revisory power conferred upon him by law or by an officer acting for him, such as the acting judge advocate general for the expeditionary forces. It is obviously absurd to exercise a revisory power after the execution of death sentences or other sentences finally separating an officer or member of the Military Establishment therefrom.

3. Gen. Pershing says:

"Beyond doubt punishment for desertion or misconduct must be almost summary if it is to have deterrent effect."

By misconduct, of course, he means something distinguishable from murder, rape, mutiny, desertion, or spying. It must be observed that sentences of death for such misconduct can not be carried into execution by any commander in the field. Our law requires in such cases the final confirmation of the President.

4. Gen. Pershing says:

"Any method that causes delay and possible miscarriage of justice would be unfortunate for us and injurious to the morale of our Allies."

Beyond argument the law clearly requires final confirmation by the President in many cases where Gen. Pershing, mistakenly, thinks he has the authority. Since all proceedings are required to be revised by this office, it must be patent that the location of a branch office in France for the purpose of that revision, carrying, as it does, the full authority of this office in such revision, makes not for delay but for expedition. Gen. Pershing's reference to possible miscarriage of justice is not understood. That review by an authority charged with that duty can result in a miscarriage of justice when justice can not be administered without such review is beyond apprehension. If Gen. Pershing means that the review by a representative of this office, whereby substantial and prejudicial errors of law are detected and corrected and legal correctness is secured and assured, will prevent the carrying into effect of illegal sentences which otherwise he would be able to carry into effect, then the need of that revision is much emphasized. It would indicate that in the administration of military justice mere summariness of execution of a sentence is to be preferred to a reasonable assurance of its legality.

5. Our law contemplates military situations in which crime may be punished on the spot and with death; but when the offense is once submitted to judicial processes established by the law of the land applicable to our forces universally, those processes can not be destroyed by considerations of summaries without violating the law and sacrificing the quality of justice. The law requires correctness to be determined by an independent review by this office or its representatives; its representative has been placed at Gen. Pershing's right hand, not that the required procedure be delayed, but, on the other hand, expedited.

Neither do I understand the last sentence but one of Gen. Pershing's cablegram, reading:

"Any thoughts in the minds of men that they can possibly escape punishment for such misconduct would be disastrous."

If Gen. Pershing means that men ought not to escape punishment awarded as a result of a trial that is found to be fundamentally illegal, his attitude could hardly fail to shock the ordinary sense of justice. On the other hand, it is conceivable that the morale of the command would be improved when assured that they will be punished only according to law and not according to hasty and ill-advised judgment. Certainty and correctness of punishment are to be desired rather than mere summariness. The implication that the review of this office must necessarily result in men escaping deserved punishment imposed according to law is thoroughly unjustified.

Memorandum for the Chief of Staff.

Subject: Cablegram to Gen. Pershing.

1. I recommend, therefore, that substantially the following be dispatched to the commanding general American Expeditionary Forces:

"You evidently misapprehend your own jurisdiction in relation, in some cases, as those under the forty-ninth article of war, to that of the President, and in all cases to the power and duty of the Judge Advocate General of the Army, under section 1199, Revised Statutes, to revise court-martial proceedings with a view to assuring that they are free from prejudicial error. The order establishing the branch office was thoroughly considered by the department; you were advised of it immediately; and in none of your previous communications have you expressed any objection. The order, therefore, must be complied with. Doubtless it will not, when its purposes are thoroughly understood, be objectionable to you. Delay necessitated by the review required by law of the Judge Advocate General is reduced to a minimum by the establishment in France of the representative of the Judge Advocate General; such delay is inevitable, can not be hurtful, and will assure that legality without which no sentence should be executed."

[321.4 Branch Office. J. A. G. O. Apr. 4, 1918.]

APRIL 3, 1918.

Memorandum for the Chief of Staff.

Subject: Cablegram from Gen. Pershing in re establishment of branch of the office of the Judge Advocate General in France.

1. Gen. Pershing's cablegram No. 779, March 24, 1918, from London, to The Adjutant General, Washington, is in part as follows:

"Paragraph 3, subparagraph A. With reference to a branch of the Judge Advocate General's Office in France to review certain court-martial proceedings after they have been acted upon by the judge advocate here, the reason for this is not clear. It submits to review cases within the jurisdiction of department commander in time of peace and is in direct conflict with broad and liberal character of President's instructions at inauguration of command. Any authority outside of control of the Commander in Chief will cause delay in possibly more cases. Beyond doubt punishment for desertion or misconduct must be almost summary if it is to have deterrent effect. This is practiced in both British and French Armies. Any method that causes delay and possibly miscarriage of justice would be unfortunate for us and injurious to morale of our Allies. The circumstances under which we are serving are in no sense comparable to our Civil War conditions, as here we are fighting a strong and virile foreign nation, and every possible means must be placed in the hands of the supreme commander to enable him to maintain the morale and integrity of the army. Any thoughts in the minds of men that they can possibly escape punishment for such misconduct would be disastrous. I am very strongly of the opinion that final authority in these cases should rest with the supreme commander here."

This cablegram from Gen. Pershing makes it necessary to review and set out in sequence previous communications on this subject. General Order No. 7, War Department, current series, was published under date of January 17, 1918. On January 20, 1918, a cablegram was transmitted by The Adjutant General to Gen. Pershing containing a digest of section 1 of General Order No. 7 and section 2 of the said order in full. The cablegram as sent reads as follows:

"Paragraph 1, General Orders, No. 7, these headquarters, publish court-martial rules of procedure prescribed by President, effective February 1, an outline of which is furnished for your information. Rule 1. Sentence of death or dismissal of officer confirmed by commanding general of territorial department or division not to be executed until review of record in the office of Judge Advocate General or branch thereof, action to be entered in record, and to conclude with recital that the execution of sentence will be directed in orders after the record of trial has been reviewed by Judge Advocate General, and that jurisdiction is retained to take additional or corrective action prior to or at time of publication of general court-martial order in case. Rule 2. Sentence of dishonorable discharge not intended to be suspended will not be ordered executed before review of record, as in rule 1, and action to conclude with same recital. Rule 3. When record of trial in cases covered by rules 1 and 2 is reviewed in the office of the Judge Advocate General or branch thereof the reviewing authority will be informed as to the legality of his proposed action. Errors and omissions which admit of correction will be indicated. Proper disposition of case suggested. Rule 4. Delay in execution of sentence by reason of these rules to be credited on any term of confinement or imprisonment imposed. Rule 5. Procedure prescribed in rules 1 and 2 to apply to commanding generals in the field when the Secretary of War so decides and orders. Rule 6. Authorizes the Secretary of War to establish branches of the office of Judge Advocate General for review of court-martial records.

"II. There is hereby established, in aid of the revisory power conferred on the Judge Advocate General of the Army by section 1199, Revised Statutes, a branch of the office of the Judge Advocate General, at Paris, France, or at some other point convenient to the headquarters of the American Expeditionary Forces in France, to be selected by the officer detailed as the head of such branch office, after conference with the commanding general of the American Expeditionary Forces in Europe, and shall report to and be controlled in the performance of his duties by the Judge Advocate General of the Army.

"The records of all general courts-martial in which is imposed a sentence of death, dismissal, or dishonorable discharge and of all military commissions originating in the said Expeditionary Forces will be forwarded to the said branch office for review, and it shall be the duty of the said Acting Judge Advocate General to examine and review such records, to return to the proper commanding officer for correction such as are incomplete, and to report to the proper officer any defect or irregularity which renders the findings or sentence invalid or void, in whole or in part, to the end that such sentence or any part thereof so found to be invalid or void shall not be carried into effect. The said Acting Judge Advocate General will forward all records in which action is complete, together with his review thereof and all proceedings thereon to the Judge Advocate General of the Army for permanent file.

"By order of the Secretary of War."

On the same date, January 20, 1918, cablegram 663 was sent to Gen. Pershing, paragraph 3 of which reads as follows:

"Paragraph 3. Order made directing Brig. Gen. Walter A. Bethel, judge advocate, assume charge branch office of Judge Advocate General established in France by War Department, General Orders, No. 7, current series, and to perform the duties of Acting Judge Advocate General indicated in said order."

On February 20, 1918, cablegram No. 816 was sent to Gen. Pershing, paragraph 2 of which reads as follows:

"Paragraph 2. Recently approved tables of organization provides for one additional brigadier general, Judge Advocate General's Department. It is proposed to promote Lieut. Col. E. A. Kreger and detail him in charge of branch office of Judge Advocate General established by our 666. In the event you so desire, Lieut. Col. Walter A. Bethel, Judge Advocate General's Department, may remain in charge of said branch office and Kreger be detailed on your staff in his stead. Cable recommendation."

The department received in reply paragraph 3 of Gen. Pershing's cablegram 644, dated February 25, 1918, as follows:

"Paragraph 3. With reference to paragraph 2 of your cablegram 816, desire that Walter A. Bethel (brigadier general) remain judge advocate on my staff. So much of your cablegram as speaks of Walter A. Bethel's remaining in charge of branch office not understood. Paragraph 3, your cablegram 663 of 20th, appears to supersede paragraph 169, Special Orders 15, War Department, January 18, just received in mail. Brig. Gen. Walter A. Bethel has not established branch office, and will not do so pending further instructions. With reference to paragraph 3, your cablegram 663, desire to know when officers may be expected to arrive to establish branch office, as cases are being held for his action."

It is to be observed that Gen. Pershing states in this cablegram that he had just received paragraph 169, Special Orders 15, War Department, January 18, by mail, and that paragraph 3 of cablegram No. 663, January 20, appears to supersede the said paragraph 169, Special Orders 15, War Department, 1918. Paragraph 169 of Special Orders 15, War Department, 1918, is as follows:

"Until further orders Brig. Gen. Walter A. Bethel, judge advocate, National Army, will assume charge of the branch of the office of the Judge Advocate General established in France by the War Department, General Orders, No. 7, January 17, 1918, and will perform the duties of Acting Judge Advocate General indicated in the said order."

A comparison of paragraph 3 of cablegram No. 663 with paragraph 169 of Special Orders 15, just cited, shows that it was not intended to supersede the order but to convey advance information that the order had been issued.

2. The action of the War Department in establishing a branch of the office of the Judge Advocate General in France was taken only after the most thorough consideration. It was organic in character and believed to be necessary in the administration of military justice. The revocation of the order establishing this branch office does not seem to be called for, and it is believed that if Gen. Pershing fully understood the purpose and operation of this order his cablegram cited at the beginning of this memorandum would not have been sent.

Under section 1199, Revised Statutes, the Judge Advocate General is required to revise all proceedings of courts-martial. Acting under this authority, this office reviews not only those cases which require the action of the President before the sentences imposed may be carried into execution, but also all cases in which the action of a lesser reviewing authority is final in and of itself. Experience during the present war has led to the conclusion that in a substantial number of cases reviewing authorities have approved and carried into execution sentences based upon proceedings which are invalid or which so palpably prejudiced the substantial rights of the accused that the sentences could not be carried into execution without outraging the sense of justice which characterizes the administration of all American law, military as well as civil. To prevent action in such cases from becoming final before the records of trial are reviewed in this office, General Order No. 7, current series, was published. Its purpose is to prevent a sentence of death, dismissal of an officer, or dishonorable discharge of an enlisted man from being finally executed prior to review of the record of trial in this office. Action in all such cases under General Order No. 7 has been expedited in this office, and every effort is made to reduce delays in the administration of military justice to a minimum. The beneficial effects of this order are pointedly shown by one case which is now under consideration in this office. The accused was charged and convicted of murder, was sentenced to death, and the sentence of death would undoubtedly have been promptly executed by the reviewing authority in question had not General Order No. 7 been in force and effect. The review in this office has disclosed the fact that, although the record of trial had been passed by the department judge advocate, there was no evidence in the record upon which a conviction of anything more than manslaughter could be predicated, and for this offense the death penalty is not authorized. In one case at least, therefore, General Order No. 7 has already served to prevent the execution of an illegal death sentence.

It goes without saying, I think, that however careful or conscientious a judge advocate serving on the staff of a commanding general may be, he can not give a case which has passed through his hands, and which he has recommended for trial, the same unbiased consideration which is given by an officer who is wholly independent of such commanding general and who is directly responsible to the Judge Advocate General for the accuracy of his opinions. What has happened elsewhere may well happen in our Expeditionary Forces in France. Serious errors of the nature indicated above might well be overlooked by judge advocates serving in the field and result finally in the execution of unjust and illegal sentences if an independent review is not to be had prior to such execution. These considerations indicate the necessity for such an independent review in all cases covered by General Order No. 7 before final execution of sentences. In order to minimize the delay a branch of the Judge Advocate General's office was located in France, with the same powers of review as exist in this office. There is every reason to believe that the operation of this branch office will in no way interfere with the administration of military justice, that it will in no way weaken the discipline of our forces, and it will not, in any case, result in a miscarriage of justice or create in the mind of any soldier the belief that it was established in order to enable him to escape punishment for misconduct. On the other hand, there is reason to believe that the office may result, as it was intended to result, in certain cases, in preventing serious miscarriages of justice.

Inasmuch as Gen. Pershing was fully informed of the establishment of this branch office prior to the time that the order went into effect, it is not understood why the objection which he now voices should have been so long delayed; but, as stated above, it is not believed when he is fully informed as to the purposes and functions of the branch office in question he will insist upon the objections he has raised. On the other hand, it is believed that he will recognize the necessity for its establishment and the useful purpose which it was designed to serve. In our governmental system it is as necessary that punishment be legal as that it be swift and summary. It is, therefore, recommended that a cablegram be sent to Gen. Pershing in terms as follows:

The order establishing a branch of the office of the Judge Advocate General in France was promulgated after the most thorough consideration on the part of the War Department. The existence of this order has already justified itself in preventing the execution of one illegal death sentence, not coming, however, from your command. The operation of the order has not delayed the administration of military justice in this country and the establishment of the branch office in France will prevent delay in the administration of military justice in cases arising within your forces. It is believed that when its purposes and operation are thoroughly understood it will no longer be objectionable to you. Your suggestion that it may result in miscarriages of justice is not concurred in, since it is believed that it will operate to prevent miscarriages of justice by assuring that legality without which no serious sentence should ever be carried into execution.

Judge Advocate General.

APRIL 5, 1918.

Brig. Gen. WALTER A. BETHEL,
American Expeditionary Forces, France.

MY DEAR BETHEL: I am going to spend the necessary time out of a very busy day in an attempt to clear up the situation in respect of the establishment in France of a branch of the Judge Advocate General's Office, regarding which matter there seems to have been more or less misapprehension at your headquarters. You are, of course, familiar with the cable correspondence which has passed on the subject. For your convenience in reference, however, I inclose a copy of a memorandum that I have had prepared for the Chief of Staff, in which that correspondence is reviewed and set out in sequence.

First, let me say that it is difficult for me to understand why, upon receipt of the two cablegrams of January 20, 1918, one cabling Gen. Pershing the contents of General Order No. 7 and the other designating you as Acting Judge Advocate General, the branch office of the Judge Advocate General was not immediately established. I assumed that it was in operation from that time and continued of this view until the receipt of Gen. Pershing's cablegram of February 25, 1918, wherein he says:

"Brig. Gen. Walter A. Bethel has not established branch office and will not do so pending further instructions."

This leads me to comment upon the situation which is presented by Gen. Pershing's cablegram, No. 779, which seems to imply some dissent from the action here taken in establishing the branch office. He appears to view it as a possible obstruction to the administration of military justice and as a mistake of judgment.

I wish you would assure Gen. Pershing (whom I would address directly but for the reason that I know he has no time to read letters) that every thought of this office, and I believe every thought of the War Department, is directed toward the discovery of ways and means to help him in his enormous task; that our idea was to expedite and not delay, and that he will understand better the occasion for this order if he will consider the following:

Prior to the issue of General Order No. 7 it had become apparent that due to the large increase in commissioned personnel, which included many officers with little or no experience in court-martial practice, a large number of proceedings were coming in which exhibited fatal defects. A congressional investigation was threatened, and there was talk of the establishment of courts of appeal. The remedy for the situation was immediate executive action which would make it clearly apparent that an accused did get some kind of revision of his court-martial proceedings other than the revision at field headquarters where these prejudicial errors were occurring. At this point permit me to say that very few errors have been discovered in cases coming up from your headquarters. It was primarily with reference to errors occurring at field headquarters other than in France that this step was taken.

Accordingly we formulated the scheme of General Order No. 7. The Secretary of War gave personal consideration to the matter and on three or four occasions discussed it exhaustively with this office. He finally approved the order and contemplated, as I did, the establishment of the branch office promptly upon the receipt of our two cables of January 20. I may say here that at other headquarters the scheme has worked beautifully. It has silenced all criticism, and I believe that no invalid sentences are now beyond the reach of remedial action.

Your own intimate knowledge of court-martial procedure makes it quite unnecessary for me to enter upon a lengthy discussion of the merits of the new system, which I feel quite sure will not fail to commend itself to you as a substantial step in the right direction. As stated in my memorandum to the Chief of Staff, it is believed that had Gen. Pershing fully understood the purpose and operation of General Order No. 7, his cablegram No. 779 of March 24, 1918, would not have been sent. I trust that the cablegram which I have recommended be sent him in reply, a draft of which is contained in the concluding paragraph of the inclosed memorandum, will serve to convince him of the wisdom and propriety of the issue of this order and that the procedure it contemplates will materially aid rather than obstruct the prompt and efficient administration of military justice in the American Expeditionary Forces.

With best wishes, I am,
Very truly, yours,

E. H. CROWDER,
Judge Advocate General.

OFFICE OF THE ACTING JUDGE ADVOCATE GENERAL,
AMERICAN EXPEDITIONARY FORCES IN EUROPE,
G. H. Q., A. E. F., France, April 15, 1918.

Maj. Gen. E. H. CROWDER,
Judge Advocate General, United States Army,
War Department, Washington, D. C.

DEAR GENERAL: As indicated in my report of March 31, made pursuant to paragraph 827, Army Regulations, I arrived at general headquarters American Expeditionary Forces, and reported for duty on March 26.

Before my departure from Washington an unsigned draft of an order appointing me Acting Judge Advocate General for the American Expeditionary Forces in Europe came into my hands. The arrival of an official copy of such an order has been expected from day to day, but thus far none has been received. Maj. Rand and myself were assigned to station here upon our arrival and at once took up the work of the branch of the Judge Advocate General's Office; but, pending the arrival of my orders, Gen. Bethel remains in charge of the office and the duties of the office are being performed in his name.

Gen. Pershing being absent from headquarters at the time of my arrival, I had a preliminary conference with Gen. Harbord, Chief of Staff, and Gen. Bethel, with reference to the location of the office. I indicated a desire to be governed in the matter by Gen. Pershing's wishes. Various considerations, among which were the existing means of communication by mail and telegraph between general headquarters and the headquarters of the various commanding officers exercising general court-martial jurisdiction, the desirability of keeping in close touch with the Judge Advocate of the Expeditionary Forces, and the fact that the office had been temporarily established at general headquarters, led me to the conclusion that it should remain where it is. In that conclusion Gen. Harbord appeared to concur; and I felt justified in assuming that he reflected the views of Gen. Pershing with reference to the matter. In the course of an interview I had with Gen. Pershing at a later date my impression that to have the office located here would be satisfactory to him was confirmed.

In conformity with your suggestions I indicated to Gen. Pershing the reasons for the establishment of the office, outlined its functions, endeavored to make clear that its existence would in no wise affect the exercise of discretionary powers by officers having general court-martial jurisdiction, and expressed a desire to be really helpful in the administration of military justice throughout the command.

The establishment of the office appears to have been looked upon in some quarters here with a certain degree of apprehension—possibly because the brief cablegrams on the subject did not serve clearly to disclose the functions of the office. At any rate it appeared to me that there was an impression that the establishment of the office was without precedent—represented an innovation, and that its existence might serve to curtail the exercise of the powers of commanding officers invested with general court-martial jurisdiction. The apprehension does not, in my opinion, exist now to the extent that, apparently it did exist three weeks ago, and it shall be my endeavor to bring about the entire disappearance.

While in England I had a conference with Maj. White, the Judge Advocate on duty at Gen. Biddle's headquarters in London. Since my arrival here I have had an opportunity to confer with Col. Hull and Col. Winship, and to discuss with them personally the relation of this office to the various headquarters exercising general court-martial jurisdiction, and, of course, the matter has been fully discussed with Gen. Bethel.

Though I hope soon to receive the order assigning me to duty in charge of this office, I am inclined to the opinion that it has been well to have the administration of the office controlled, for a short time after its establishment, by the Judge Advocate of the Expeditionary Forces, because that would naturally aid in allaying the apprehension that, due no doubt to misunderstanding, appears at first to have existed as to the purpose in view in establishing the office.

Very sincerely, yours,

E. A. KREGER.

GENERAL HEADQUARTERS AMERICAN EXPEDITIONARY FORCES,
JUDGE ADVOCATE'S OFFICE,
France, May 5, 1918.

Gen. E. H. CROWDER,
War Department,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR GENERAL: I received your letter of April 5 yesterday, relating to the establishment of the branch office here. I expect to lay a number of cases before Gen. Pershing either this afternoon or to-morrow and shall take pleasure in reading to him the paragraphs of your letter relating to the reason for the establishment of the branch office.

Now, as to the misunderstanding between the War Department and these headquarters. First let me say that I am responsible for Gen. Pershing's cablegram No. 644 of February 24, 1918, but not No. 779 of March 25 protesting against the establishment of the branch office. The misunderstanding came about in the following way. War Department cablegram No. 663 (par. 3) as received here stated that Capt. John B. Richardson, Infantry, had been ordered to establish the branch office in France. This cable came at the same time as the cable announcing the contents of General Order, No. 7. We accordingly awaited Capt. Richardson's arrival and held cases for his action. Not until about a month later did we learn that the War Department had ever contemplated putting me in charge of the branch office temporarily. The first intimation of that fact was received when a copy of Special Orders No. 15 directing me to assume charge of the branch office came to me by mail. On comparing Special Orders No. 15 with the cable directing Capt. Richardson to take charge of the office it was seen that the cable bore date two days later than the order and the only reasonable conclusion under the circumstances was that the War Department had first determined to place me in charge of the office and had almost immediately thereafter decided that Capt. Richardson should establish the office. That is why I said in our 644 that the instructions in the cable appeared to supersede the Special Order No. 15. When War Department cable No. 816 was received saying it was proposed to place Kreger in charge of the office but that I might remain in charge of the office if Gen. Pershing should so desire, the word "remain" indicated to me that the War Department supposed that I had established the office and I felt it necessary to clear up the misunderstanding at once and accordingly drew and had sent Gen. Pershing's cable No. 644 of February 24. I need hardly say that we were more than anxious to have pending cases disposed of and had the first cable informed us that I was to take charge, the office would have been established promptly on its receipt. Not until Kreger's arrival was it ever known here that there was a mistake in the Richardson cable. When he told me that he had never heard of Richardson, I wondered how the Richardson cable came to be sent and found that Richardson's signal number is 17068 while mine is 1768.

With these facts before you I think it will be clear to you why the branch office was not immediately established. Without them our action here is, of course, inexplicable.

On receipt of the contents of General Orders, No. 7, by cable I submitted a long memorandum (Feb. 5) paragraphs 2 and 3 of which were as follows:

"2. I may say that although the order was a surprise to me, on reading it carefully I think its purpose is clear. Section 1199 of the Revised Statutes, to which reference is made in the order establishing the branch office, provides:

"The Judge Advocate General shall receive, revise, and cause to be recorded the proceedings of all court-martials, courts of inquiry, and military commissions, and perform such other duties as have been performed heretofore by the Judge Advocate General of the Army."

"The powers and duties of the Judge Advocate General comprised in the above word 'revise' have never been judicially construed, nor had the War Department, prior to the outbreak of the present war, ever arrived at a positive determination as to just what the word signifies. I remember that the Judge Advocate General expressed doubt as to this point two or three years ago. In time of peace the matter had not the importance that it may have now. No sentences of death or dismissal could be carried into effect without the confirmation of the President, and of course in the meantime the record was reviewed by the Judge Advocate General. Sentences of dishonorable discharge were carried into effect in large number by department commanders before the records were reviewed in the Judge Advocate General's Office, but where serious injustice had been done either as a result of illegal action or otherwise, clemency was freely exercised by the President on the Judge Advocate General's recommendation.

"It is evident from the cable received that the War Department now construes the word 'revise' as requiring, or at least making proper, an examination of the record of trial by the Judge Advocate General's Office before a sentence which permanently affects the status of a military man takes effect and is beyond recall. The order requires that before the sentence take effect the Judge Advocate General's Office, or one of its branches, examine the record to see whether or not there is a fatal error in the proceedings. The reviewing authority indorses his action as usual upon the record, but the same is tentative until the legality of the sentence has been passed upon by the Judge Advocate General's Office, whereupon, on notification to the reviewing authority that the same is legal, the action is published and takes effect.

"I think it is not improbable that this order was brought about by the execution of 13 Negro soldiers in Texas recently, almost immediately after their trial. While I have no conclusive information on the point, I infer from what I saw as to the reports in the bulletins of these cases that the execution took place before the records had reached Washington. It is not improbable that there were certain errors in the trials. The statements made in this paragraph, however, are only a surmise on my part.

"3. With reference to your proposed cable recommending that I be made Acting Judge Advocate General of the American Expeditionary Forces and that Capt. Richardson be ordered to report to me as assistant, I advise that the same be not sent. I do not regard the order itself as any reflection on myself or on these headquarters, but as having been issued merely for the purpose of giving what the War Department conceives to be the proper effect to section 1199, Revised Statutes. The War Department evidently takes the view that the revision should be made by the Judge Advocate General's Office, and the judge advocate's office of these headquarters is not, and can not in my opinion be made, a part of the Judge Advocate General's Office.

"Very sincerely,

"W. A. BETHEL."

From: The Office of the Judge Advocate General.

To: Brig. Gen. Edward A. Kreger.

Subject: Report dated March 31, 1918.

1. In the second paragraph of your report of March 31, 1918, you state that no order has been received appointing you Acting Judge Advocate General for the American Expeditionary Forces in France. Special Order, No. 31, dated March 5, 1918, paragraph 146, is as follows:

"Lieut. Col. Edward A. Kreger, judge advocate, is appointed Acting Judge Advocate General for the American Expeditionary Forces in Europe, and will assume charge of the branch of the office of the Judge Advocate General of the Army established in France by General Orders, No. 7, January 7, 1918, War Department, relieving Brig. Gen. Walter A. Bethel, National Army, of the temporary charge of said branch."

This special order was mailed to you through the commanding general American Expeditionary Forces on March 12, 1918. The same information was cabled to Gen. Pershing earlier in March. It is expected that before this communication reaches you the entire matter will have been satisfactorily adjusted.

By direction of the Judge Advocate General:

H. M. MORROW,

Lieutenant Colonel, Judge Advocate, Executive Officer.

General Orders, No. 84.

WAR DEPARTMENT,
Washington, September 11, 1918.

I. By direction of the President the commanding officer Camp Joseph E. Johnston, Jacksonville, Fla., is empowered, under the eighth article of war to appoint general courts-martial whenever necessary. [250.4, A. G. O.]

II. Paragraph 5, section IV, General Orders, No. 149, War Department, 1917, is amended so as to prescribe that enlisted men assigned to supply trains will wear the Motor Transport Corps hat cord. [320.2, A. G. O.]

III. Section IV, General Orders, No. 64, War Department, 1918, is rescinded and the following substituted therefor:

1. Hereafter quartermasters of all forts, posts, camps, and other military stations within the continental limits of the United States under the jurisdiction of department and Coast Artillery district commanders will forward requisitions for needed supplies through their commanding officers direct to such general supply depots as are designated by the Quartermaster General from time to time. A copy of requisition will, at the same time, be sent to the department or Coast Artillery district quartermaster by all forts, camps, posts, and military stations under jurisdiction of the department or Coast Artillery district commander.

2. The depot quartermaster of a general supply depot to which a fort, post, camp, or other military station is assigned for supplies is responsible for the proper supply of the station, and is authorized to transfer surplus stocks, to prevent accumulation of shortages, from one station to another, after assuring himself that the future needs of the troops at station from which supplies are transferred and those of incoming troops are provided for. He is also authorized to correspond with and call upon quartermasters direct for reports as to status of supplies at their stations.

3. For all forts, posts, camps, or other military stations under the jurisdiction of the department and Coast Artillery district commanders, the depot quartermaster will promptly report to the department or Coast Artillery district quartermaster, in the district in which the requiring troops are stationed, for the information of the department or Coast Artillery district commanders, the action taken by him on the requisitions of such forts, posts, camps, or other military stations. The depot quartermaster will also keep the department and Coast Artillery district quartermasters advised of the surplus supplies transferred from one post, camp, or other place to another, as far as such transfer affects the department or Coast Artillery district concerned.

4. Instructions in conflict with the foregoing provisions are revoked. [300.42, A. G. O.]

IV. The last subparagraph of section II, General Orders, No. 7, War Department, 1918, is amended to read as follows:

The records of all general courts-martial and of all military commissions originating in the said Expeditionary Forces will be forwarded to the said branch office for review, and it shall be the duty of the said Acting Judge Advocate General to examine and review such records, to return to the proper commanding officer for correction such as are incomplete, and to report to the proper officer any defect or irregularity which renders the finding or sentence illegal or void in whole or in part. The execution of all sentences involving death, dismissal, or dishonorable discharge shall be stayed pending such review. Any sentence, or any part thereof, so found to be illegal, defective, or void, in whole or in part, shall be disapproved, modified, or set aside, in accordance with the recommendation of the Acting Judge Advocate General. The said Acting Judge Advocate General will forward all records in which action is complete, together with his review thereof and all proceedings thereon, to the Judge Advocate General of the Army for permanent file. [250.47, A. G. O.]

GENERAL HEADQUARTERS AMERICAN EXPEDITIONARY FORCES,
France, July 5, 1918.

From: The Office of the Acting Judge Advocate General.

To: The Judge Advocate General of the Army, War Department, Washington, D. C.

Subject: United States v. Delbert L. Moss, private, Thirty-second Aero Service Squadron, Signal Corps. (A. J. A. G. O., 201-92.)

1. The record of trial in case mentioned above is going forward to your office under separate cover. The papers listed below accompany the record:

Statement of service; review by judge advocate of trial jurisdiction; review by this office, in duplicate; letter of advice from this office, in duplicate; supplementary review by judge advocate of trial jurisdiction; copy of memorandum by reviewing authority; and general court-martial order, five copies.

2. Pvt. Moss was tried on April 17, 1918, by a general court-martial convened by order of the commanding general, Service of the Rear, now Services of Supply, American Expeditionary Forces, upon three charges, under each of which two specifications were laid. The second charge and the specifications thereunder read as follows, viz:

"Charge II: Violation of the ninety-fourth article of war.

"Specification 1: In that Pvt. Delbert L. Moss (21196), Thirty-second Aero Service Squadron, did, at Third Aviation Instruction Center, on or about the 1st day of March, 1918, feloniously take, steal, and carry away one pair of russet shoes, value about $4.95, property of the United States, furnished and intended for the military service thereof.

"Specification 2: In that Pvt. Delbert L. Moss (21196), Thirty-second Aero Service Squadron, did, at Third Aviation Instruction Center, on or about the 1st day of March, 1918, wrongfully and knowingly sell to Pvt. Ray Van Arsdale, Twenty-sixth Aero Squadron, Signal Corps, one pair of russet shoes, value about $4.95, property of the United States, furnished and intended for the military service thereof."

The court found Moss guilty of one specification under Charge I, of one under Charge III, of both of the specifications under Charge II, and of each of the three charges, and adjudged a sentence legally justifiable without reference to the second charge and the specifications thereunder. The reviewing authority, on April 28, 1918, approved the sentence and designated a military prison camp as the place of confinement, but held in abeyance the order directing execution of the sentence, pending review of the record in this office pursuant to the requirements of General Order 7, War Department, 1918.

3. On May 11, 1918, the record was returned to the reviewing authority by this office, together with a copy of the review by this office and a letter of transmittal, carrying the following recommendations:

"(a) That the findings of guilty as to the charge and specifications relating to larceny and wrongful sale of Government property (Charge II and the specifications thereunder) be disapproved; and

"(b) That the reviewing authority consider whether or not, in view of the illegality of the findings respecting Charge II and the specifications thereunder, the entire sentence adjudged by the court should be approved and carried into execution."

Subsequently the record was returned to this office with a general court-martial order showing approval of the sentence and directing execution thereof, but containing no reference to the approval or disapproval of any particular findings. A memorandum, dated May 28, 1918, prepared by the judge advocate of the Services of Supply, in which he disagrees with the review and recommendations of this office and a copy of a memorandum bearing the initials of the reviewing authority, and reading, "Adhere to the original action and direct the execution of the sentence," also accompanied the record.

4. With reference to the conclusions stated in the review by this office (see pars. 7, 8, and 9), let me say that though ready to admit the force of the argument in the counter memorandum of May 28, I am not convinced that this office made a mistake. I am unwilling to hold that any presumption of fact arising from another presumption that Army Regulations are obeyed to the letter can take the place of evidence to support an essential element of an offense charged as a violation of the ninety-fourth article of war. I attached no great importance to the use by the witness Griel of the expression "my shoes," as he might have so referred to the property in question, even if it had been issued to him by the Government. It was not upon affirmative evidence of property in Griel, but upon the absence of evidence of property in the United States that my conclusion was based. The inspection of the shoes by the court, even if it showed that they were of the make and character issued to enlisted men, could not have supplied this deficiency, for such shoes can be and no doubt have been bought by soldiers from manufacturers and dealers, and the change of shoes in the United States referred to by Griel may well have been such a purchase.

If my advice in this case was erroneous, I shall be glad to be so informed by your office in order that I may not repeat the error in other cases.

5. My immediate concern, however, is not with the question of the soundness of the advice given by this office, but with the question of what effect should have been given to such advice by the reviewing authority, and with the portion of the counter memorandum of May 28, which deals with that point. In construing General Order No. 7, War Department, 1918, the writer of the memorandum states that:

"If the commanding general concurs in the conclusion here reached, he should approve the findings and sentence in spite of the recommendation to the contrary of the Acting Judge Advocate General. That recommendation is not controlling but merely advisory."

And again:

"The reviewing authority is required to wait until he shall receive that advice before finally deciding on his action, but there is nowhere any indication that he is to regard that advice as final."

It has been my belief that the purpose in view in the creation, by General Order 7, of this branch of your office was to prevent final approval of illegal findings and the execution of illegal sentences in the classes of cases described in that order; and I am unable to see how that purpose is to be fully accomplished if reviewing authorities are to be free to disregard the advice of this office with respect to the legality of findings and sentences. It may be that the writer of the memorandum of May 28 is right and that the purpose of General Order 7 will be regarded as having been sufficiently attained by delaying the execution of sentences until the records shall have been reconsidered by the reviewing authority in the light of views expressed by this office. As to this I do not urge my opinion, but submit the question to your office for decision.

6. Your instructions in the premises are requested for my guidance; and, if the opinions of this office with respect to the legality of findings and sentences are to be regarded by reviewing authorities as controlling, it is recommended that they, as well as this office, be advised to that effect.

(Signed) E. A. KEEGER,
Acting Judge Advocate General.

"Charge: Violation of the fifty-eighth article of war.

" Specification: In that Pvt. Noel F. Peters, 25891, Four hundred and sixty-sixth Aero Squadron, Signal Corps, did, at Thrd Aviation Instruction Center, American Expeditionary Forces, on or about the 24th day of February, 1918, desert the service of the United States, and did remain absent in desertion until he was apprehended at Toulouse, France, on or about the 10th day of March, 1918."

He pleaded not guilty. The court found him guilty as charged and sentenced him to be dishonorably discharged, to forfeit all pay and allowance due or to become due, and to be confined at hard labor, at such place as the reviewing authority may direct, for 10 years. On May 31, 1918, the reviewing authority approved the sentence and designated a penitentiary as the place of confinement, but held in abeyance the order directing the execution of the sentence, pending review of the record in this office pursuant to the requirements of General Order 7, War Department, 1918.

3. On June 20, 1918, the record was returned to the reviewing authority, with a copy of a review by this office. The letter of transmittal contained the following statement and recommendation:

" This office is of the opinion that the record is not legally sufficient to support a conviction of desertion, but that it is legally sufficient to support a conviction of absence without leave, in violation of the sixty-first article of war. The record is accordingly returned with the recommendation that the supplementary action suggested by the review be taken."

On July 8, 1918, the record was returned to this office, together with a general court-martial order evidencing approval of the sentence and ordering its execution, but making no special reference to the finding of guilty of desertion. A memorandum, dated July 1, 1918, by the judge advocate of the Services of Supply, in which he disagrees with the office review, and upon which is indorsed a note by the reviewing authority, reading, in part, as follows:

" I am satisfied that the original action was sound. Let it stand." accompanies the record.

4. The counter memorandum of July 1 has not convinced me that the conclusion arrived at in the review by this office (see pars. 6, 7, and 8) is unsound. That memorandum discusses at length the probable guilt of the accused. This is beside the point. The conclusion stated in the office review is not based upon the ground that the accused is innocent, but upon the ground that he had not had a fair trial because of the admission of a great mass of incompetent and highly prejudicial testimony. It was pointed out that a sharp issue of fact as to the intention of the accused man was involved, and that the case was not one in which, if the illegal evidence had been excluded, the court would nevertheless have been compelled to a finding of guilty.

In the counter memorandum it is said that "the accused by the continued dilatory discharge of his duties convinced his superior officers that he was discontented with the service." This is not convincing. Expressions of dissatisfaction with the services are, to be sure, competent evidence of an intention to depart from it (M. C. M., p. 134); but if such dissatisfaction can be shown by the soldier's misconduct, the door is opened wide to proving as many other acts of misconduct as the prosecution can gather in proof of the offense charged, which is, of course, contrary to well recognized legal principles.

The writer of the counter memorandum appears to regard the office review as inconsistent in that it condemns a conviction for desertion and yet approves a conviction for absence without leave (see his par. 11). The reason for the distinction is plain. The accused raised no issue as to his absence without leave. On the contrary, he admitted it (see his testimony in the record, pp. 32-34). He said that he went absent from his company on the evening of February 23, at 7.30; that he did not go to Paris, because he feared the military police would arrest him; that he expected to remain away four or five days and that upon his return he would be punished and transferred. His admission that he feared arrest and expected some punishment is tantamount to saying that he had no permission to be absent and is a clear corroboration of the other testimony in the case (see office review, par. 5) that he was absent without leave. The issue of an intention permanently to remain away was, however, sharply contested; and it was for that reason, among others, that the review of this office held that the illegal testimony had prejudiced the substantial rights of the accused.

The point made in the office review that the admission of certain testimony relating to a previous trial and conviction of the accused, introduced in the course of the presentation of the prosecution's case and therefore, before the court had arrived at a finding, was illegal and prejudicial to the accused, is dismissed by the writer of the counter memorandum of July 1 with no comment, except an indication of his failure to understand it.

In the countermemorandum there is mention of a marginal annotation made at page 25 of the record. That annotation is no part of the office review, but was made by Maj. Rand as an aid to his memory in dictating the office review. The incident referred to in the marked portion of the testimony is discussed in paragraph 7 of the office review, near the bottom of page 5, where the point is made that the declarations of the accused in December were made with reference to a particular disappointment, and were for that reason remote not only in point of time but in point of relevancy to the offense for which he was being tried.

If my advice in this case was erroneous, I shall be glad to be so advised, to the end that I may not repeat the error in other cases.

5. My immediate concern, however, is not with the question of the soundness of the advice given by this office, but with the question of what effect should have been given to such advice by the reviewing authority. That question is not discussed by the judge advocate of the trial jurisdiction in his countermemorandum pertaining to this case, but was discussed by him in his memorandum relating to the case of Pvt. Delbert D. Moss. (A. J. A. G. O., 201-92.) The following extract from a letter addressed to you with reference to the Moss case is quoted as especially pertinent in connection with this case, viz:

"It has been my belief that the purpose in view in the creation, by General Order 7, of this branch of your office was to prevent final approval of illegal findings and the execution of illegal sentences in the classes of cases described in that order; and I am unable to see how that purpose is to be fully accomplished if reviewing authorities are to be free to disregard the advice of this office with respect to the legality of findings and sentences. It may be * * * that the purpose of General Order 7 will be regarded as having been sufficiently attained by delaying the execution of sentences until the records shall have been reconsidered by the reviewing authority in the light of my views expressed by this office. As to this I do not urge my opinion, but submit the question to your office for decision."

6. Your instructions in the premises are requested for the guidance of this office; and if the opinions of this office with respect to the legality of findings and sentences are to be regarded by reviewing authorities as controlling, it is recommended that they as well as this office be advised to that effect.

7. Being still of the opinion that the record in this case is legally insufficient to support the findings and sentence, and that the advice of this branch of the Office of the Judge Advocate General with reference to the legality of a finding or sentence reviewed here should be given the same effect as if the advice had been given by the Office of the Judge Advocate General of the Army, I recommend that the sentence be declared null and void and that Peters be restored to duty.

GENERAL HEADQUARTERS, AMERICAN EXPEDITIONARY FORCES,
France, July 14, 1918.

Maj. Gen. E. H. CROWDER,
Judge Advocate General, United States Army,
War Department, Washington, D. C.

DEAR GENERAL: To your cablegram reading "Cable total number of officers and enlisted men Judge Advocate General's Department needed in your office until January next" I have replied:

"Reference paragraph 8, your cablegram 1644. Entire personnel now authorized, seven officers and eight enlisted men, will be needed in this branch by January if jurisdiction remains unchanged. I recommend that branch be required to review all general court cases arising in American Expeditionary Forces. If this recommendation be approved, additional force of three officers and four enlisted men will be needed by January. Recommend promotion Maj. William Rand to lieutenant colonel. Letter follows."

The terms of General Order 7, War Department, 1918, are not altogether clear with respect to cases in which the execution of sentence of dishonorable discharge is suspended. Paragraph 2 of section 1 requires that the execution of sentences in cases involving dishonorable discharge be deferred pending review in the office of the Judge Advocate General, or a branch thereof, only when the reviewing authority does not intend to suspend the execution of the dishonorable discharge until the soldier's release from confinement. The second paragraph of Section II requires that the records of all general court-martial cases in which is imposed a sentence of death, dismissal, or dishonorable discharge, and of all military commissions originating in the Expeditionary Forces be forwarded to this branch for review, and apparently does not limit the jurisdiction of the branch to cases in which the dishonorable discharge is to be executed at once, except as such limitation is to be inferred from the clause "to the end that any such sentence or any part thereof found to be invalid or void shall not be carried into effect." which, in connection with Section I of the order, seems to indicate that when it is not the intention of the reviewing authority to carry the dishonorable discharge into effect at once the record need not be sent to this branch for review. In practice the order was so construed before my arrival here and has continued to be so construed, as cases involving suspended sentences of dishonorable discharge have not been sent here. I have discussed the matter with Gen. Bethel. He holds the view that General Order 7 neither requires nor authorizes records involving suspended sentences of dishonorable discharge to be sent to this branch. However, we are agreed that such records should be reviewed here. It may well happen that within a comparatively short time after trial the conduct of a soldier in whose case a sentence of dishonorable discharge has been suspended will lead the reviewing authority to direct the execution of the dishonorable discharge. If the necessary examination were made here an opinion indicating that the record in any case of that kind is legally insufficient to support the sentence may reach the reviewing authority in time to prevent the issue of a dishonorable discharge certificate, thus avoiding a complication that may arise if the record must go to Washington for examination. I should be very glad to have the doubt resolved in favor of the more extensive jurisdiction, either by authoritative interpretation of General Order 7 by your office or by a new general order.

Before I left Washington I understood that you expected, after this branch had been established for some little time, to consider the advisability of requiring it to review the records of all cases tried by general courts-martial in the American Expeditionary Forces. I have considered the matter and have discussed it with Gen. Bethel. We are agreed that it would be advisable to have all such records examined here: First, in order that illegal sentences may either not be carried into effect at all or their execution arrested at the earliest possible moment; and, second, because the examination of a portion only of the cases arising in the command does not give the branch the general view of the administration of military justice that would put it in a position most effectively to aid in carrying into effect the views and policies of your office and of the War Department. It is accordingly recommended that in the near future orders be issued requiring this branch to review, before transmission to your office, the records of all cases tried here by general courts-martial. This recommendation is not to be understood as suggesting that the execution of sentences be held in abeyance pending review by this branch in any cases other than those in which General Order 7 now requires such action.

The number of cases in which the execution of sentences of dishonorable discharge has been suspended has been comparatively small thus far. However, I am led to believe that the proportion of such suspensions will increase. I think that the personnel authorized on April 3—7 officers and 8 enlisted men—will be ample to meet requirements until January next under General Order 7 as now construed, and also sufficient to meet requirements if in addition to the classes of cases now coming here for review those in which dishonorable discharges are suspended are also sent here. At the time Lieut. Col. Wallace arrived I was about to request you to send over another officer. The present indications are that the three officers now regularly assigned to duty in the branch can handle the work for some weeks to come. In the course of two or three weeks more I expect to be in a better position than at present to suggest to you the time at which it will be advisable to have additional officers arrive here for duty in the branch.

An order requiring the examination here of all general court-martial cases arising in this command would increase very considerably the amount of work to be done by the branch. Less than one-half of the cases arising in the command are now coming here for review. However, it is believed that a considerable portion of the cases which involve neither death, dismissal, nor dishonorable discharge are of such a nature as not to require the preparation of a formal written review and that therefore the proposed enlargement of the duties of the branch would not, in the course of the next five or six months, call for an additional force in excess of three officers and four enlisted men. It is upon that theory that my cabled reply to your cable was based. If the suggested enlargement of the duties is ordered, one officer should be sent over for duty in the branch very soon after the change shall become effective. Applications can be made for others as the need for their services arises.

If you approve of my recommendation that additional personnel be authorized, to be applied for as needed, it is recommended that the distribution of the increase to grades be as follows: One colonel, one lieutenant colonel, one major, one regimental sergeant major, one battalion sergeant major, and two sergeants or corporals. With few exceptions the officers exercising original general court-martial jurisdictions over here are major generals. No doubt in the near future such jurisdiction will be exercised also by lieutenant generals. Chiefs of staff, who are often consulted by commanders with reference to the administration of military justice, even though the judge advocate possesses the full confidence of his commander, are of the grade of colonel or above. In order that the opinions expressed in reviews may have the benefit of the added weight that is usually given the opinion of an officer of rank, it is believed that the authorized personnel of this branch, if it is to review all general court-martial cases arising in the command, should include the number of colonels and lieutenant colonels contemplated in my recommendation.

If the jurisdiction of the office is broadened and an additional officer is ordered over here almost at once, any one of the following-named officers would be entirely satisfactory to me: Col. H. A. White, Col. J. J. Mayes, Lieut. Col. H. M. Morrow, Lieut. Col. Charles B. Warren, Lieut. Col. E. G. Davis, Lieut. Col. Guy D. Goff, Lieut. Col. William O. Gilbert, Lieut. Col. Neal Power, Maj. Grant T. Trent. I have named these officers because I have worked in cooperation with all of them, and because before I left Washington I understood from each that he desired an early opportunity to serve in France. At the suggestion of Maj. Rand the name of Maj. E. M. Morgan is added to the list. The filing of this list is, of course, not to be understood as suggesting the exclusion of others from consideration. It is understood that the requirements of the service may make it advisable for you to send some other officer.

Maj. William Rand has done excellent work here. He served here as the sole assistant from the time I took charge of the branch until the arrival of Lieut. Col. Wallace. As the grade of lieutenant colonel is now represented in the branch, I think he, as the oldest assistant, should be promoted to that grade.

Attention is invited to my letters of July 5 and 11 with reference to the question presented in cases of Pvts. Delbert L. Moss and Noel F. Peters. The records in those cases, and also the letters mentioned in the preceding sentence, were forwarded to you by ordinary mail. A copy of each of the letters, accompanied by copies of inclosures except the records, will go forward under the same cover with this letter, which will be sent by the next courier leaving here for the United States and may therefore reach your office before the original letters and the records sent by ordinary mail arrive.

Very sincerely,

E. A. KREGER.

JUNE 21, 1918.

The Office of the Judge Advocate General.

The Acting Judge Advocate General, American Expeditionary Forces in Europe.
Modification of General Order No. 7, War Department, January 17, 1918, and disposition of papers relating to completed trials by general courts-martial.

1. Section 2 of General Order No. 7 of the War Department, January 17, 1918, provides that:

"The records of all general courts-martial in which is imposed a sentence of death, dismissal, or dishonorable discharge, and of all military commissions originating in the said expeditionary force, will be forwarded to the said branch office for review. * * *

The order makes no provision for review by your office in any other cases than those described. It follows that records of trials, in which there is imposed confinement or forfeiture or other punishment without dishonorable discharge or dismissal, are not reviewed by any officer other than the judge advocate for the court-martial jurisdiction prior to their receipt in this office. The result will be in a case involving, for instance, confinement at hard labor for six months that the punishment will be executed before the case is reviewed by the Judge Advocate General's Office. Of course, in that event the legality of the sentence becomes, so far as the accused is concerned, of little more than academic interest.

2. This office desires an expression from you upon the advisability of so amending section 2 of the General Order referred to as to require all cases tried by general court-martial in American Expeditionary Forces to be sent to your office for review and subsequent transmission to this office for file.

3. The filing of original charges and accompanying papers relating to completed trials by general court-martial in the offices of judge advocates of general court-martial jurisdiction creates a burdensome mass of records to be preserved and transported by those offices. Your view is desired upon the advisability of requiring these charges and accompanying papers to be forwarded with the proceedings of the trial for file either in your office or in this office.

JUDGE ADVOCATE'S OFFICE,
France, July 17, 1918.

Memorandum: For the Adjutant General.

Subject: Increase of jurisdiction of the European branch office of the Judge Advocate General's office.

1. You have referred to me for remark the following recommendation contained in a cable prepared by Gen. Kreger for transmission to the War Department:

"I recommend that branch be required to review all general court cases arising in Amex forces."

2. Under War Department orders issued in January the Judge Advocate General's Office, or one of its branches, reviews the records of general court trials in the following cases before the sentence takes effect:

- (1) Death sentence.
- (2) Dismissal of officers.
- (3) Dishonorable discharge when not suspended.

Other sentences take effect immediately upon the approval of the reviewing authority. The European branch reviews, for the Judge Advocate General's office, the records in cases of the three sentences named above, but all other records, sentences involving forfeitures, ordinary confinement, and dishonorable discharge where suspended go to the Judge Advocate General's office in Washington for review, resulting, of course, in much delay. If such a sentence is held to be invalid, the action setting it aside for invalidity can only take effect after considerable part of it has been served. Or, if it is desirable to reconvene the court for correction of the error, it is generally impracticable to do so after so long a period. It would, therefore, in my opinion, be much better administration for the European branch to make review of all court-martial cases here in Europe rather than a part. The only objection I see is that it would add probably two or three officers to the office force of the European branch, and also two or three soldiers. I have heard of but two records being found defective in the Judge Advocate General's office, one from the Service of Supply and the other from the Forty-first Division, but there may have been others, since in these matters the Judge Advocate General may correspond with the division commanders direct.

3. I see no reason for taking any exceptions to Gen. Kreger's recommendation.

W. A. BETHEL,
Brigadier General, National Army, Judge Advocate.

ACTING JUDGE ADVOCATE GENERAL'S OFFICE.
GENERAL HEADQUARTERS AMERICAN EXPEDITIONARY FORCES.

France, July 11, 1918.

To the JUDGE ADVOCATE GENERAL OF THE ARMY.

War Department, Washington, D. C.:

1. In connection with the first question raised in the foregoing communication, attention is invited to the following extract from a cablegram filed for transmission on July 14, 1918, viz:

"For the Judge Advocate General. Reference paragraph 8 your cablegram 1644 * * * I recommend that branch be required to review all general court-martial cases arising in Amex forces. * * *"

And the following extract from a letter addressed to you, under date of July 14, 1918, viz:

"Before I left Washington I understood that you expected, after this branch had been established for some little time, to consider the advisability of requiring it to review the records of all cases tried by general courts-martial in the American Expeditionary Forces. I have considered the matter and have discussed it with Gen. Bethel. We are agreed that it would be advisable to have all such records examined here: First, in order that illegal sentences may either not be carried into effect at all or their execution arrested at the earliest possible moment; and, second, because the examination of a portion only of the cases arising in the command does not give the branch the general view of the administration of military justice that would put it in a position most effectively to aid in carrying into effect the views and policies of your office and of the War Department. It is accordingly recommended that in the near future orders be issued requiring this branch to review, before transmission to your office, the records of all cases tried here by general courts-martial. This recommendation is not to be understood as suggesting that the execution of sentences be held in abeyance pending review by this branch in any cases other than those in which General Order 7 now requires such action."

After mailing the letter of July 14 I learned that the transmission of the cablegram had been delayed in order that Gen. Bethel might have an opportunity to express his views respecting the proposed extension of the jurisdiction of this branch. A copy of Gen. Bethel's memorandum, dated July 17, 1918, as well as a complete copy of my letter of July 14 is inclosed herewith. The cablegram referred to above, which went forward on July 20, is quoted in full in the letter of July 14. I see no reason for modifying the views expressed in the cablegram and letter and therefore confirm the recommendation therein made that this branch be required to review, before transmission to your office, the records of all cases tried by general courts-martial in the American Expeditionary Forces.

2. In connection with the second question raised in the foregoing communication it is recommended that instructions be issued—

(a) Requiring the original charges in each case tried by general courts-martial to be appended to the record of trial, and (b) authorizing the transmission to the Judge Advocate General's Office of all papers relating to the case, either with the record but not appended thereto, or at a subsequent time if the temporary retention of the papers with the command in which the trial of the case takes place is necessary or desirable.

I think it desirable that the original charges be appended to the record, to remain with it permanently. The other papers, i. e., the statement of evidence, the indorsement referring the charges for investigation, the report of the investigating officer, the indorsements of intermediate commanders (M. C. M. secs. 75, 76), and the carbon copy of the voucher for the payment of the reporter (M. C. M., sec. 114) have, at best, only a temporary value for record purposes, until all disciplinary measures incident to the transactions which form the subject matter of the trial, or incident to the trial itself, have been disposed of. I see no reason for permanently burdening the files of the Judge Advocate General's Office, or the files of this branch, with those papers. If forwarded with the record but not appended thereto, or if subsequently forwarded, they may, on reaching your office, be filed separately and in due time disposed of pursuant to the provisions of the acts of February 16, 1889 (25 Stat., 672), and March 2, 1895 (28 Stat., 933), which seems to prohibit the destruction of such papers save as prescribed in said acts (Dig. Ops., J. A. G., 1912-1917, pp. 218, 548).

If the foregoing suggestions be considered favorably, the Manual for Courts-Martial (par. (b), sec. 79, and par. 3 (b), p. 334, and perhaps other paragraphs and sections) should be amended so as to prohibit placing upon the charge sheet any indorsement other than that of the convening authority referring the charges for trial.

August 29, 1918.

Memorandum for the Chief of Staff.

Subject: Modification of General Order No. 7, War Department, January 17, 1918.

1. The European branch of the Judge Advocate General's office, by authority of the above designated order, reviews for legality alone the record of general court trials in the following cases before the sentences take effect:

- (1) Death sentences.
- (2) Dismissal of officers.
- (3) Dishonorable discharge when not suspended.

All other cases go to the office of the Judge Advocate General at Washington for the review which the statute and good administration require, resulting necessarily in much delay. Obviously, such a review, the sole purpose of which is to determine whether the sentence as a matter of law is valid or invalid, can not seasonably be made here. Both Gen. Kreger, in charge of the branch office in Europe, and Gen. Bethel, judge advocate, American Expeditionary Forces, recommend the extension of the duties of the branch office there to include the review of all general court trials. Gen. Kreger summarizes his view thus:

"I have considered the matter (the matter here in question) and have discussed it with Gen. Bethel. We are agreed that it would be advisable to have all such records examined here: in order that illegal sentence may either not be carried into effect at all, or their execution arrested at the earliest possible moment, and because examination of a portion only of the cases arising in the command does not give the branch the general view of the administration of military justice that would put it in a position most effectively to aid in carrying into effect the views and policies of your office and of the War Department. It is accordingly recommended that in the near future, orders be issued requiring this branch to review before transmission to your office the records of all cases tried here by general courts-martial. This recommendation is not to be understood as suggesting that the execution of sentences be held in abeyance pending review by this branch in any cases other than those in which General Order 7 now require such action."

And Gen. Bethel thus:

"Other sentences (that is, those which are not now required to be reviewed by the branch office) take effect immediately upon the approval of the reviewing authority. The European branch reviews for the Judge Advocate General's office the records in cases of the three sentences named above. (That is, death sentence, dismissal of officers, and dishonorable discharge not suspended); but all other records, sentences involving forfeiture, ordinary confinement, and dishonorable discharge, where suspended, go to the Judge Advocate General's office in Washington for review, resulting, of course, in much delay. If such a sentence is held to be invalid, the action setting it aside for invalidity can only take effect after considerable part of it has been served, or if it is desired to reconvene the court for correction of an error, it is generally impracticable to do so after so long a period. It would, therefore, in my opinion, be much better administration for the European branch to make the review of all courts-martial cases."

2. I concur in the views of these two officers, and recommend that the above designated order be amended, so as to require all cases tried by general courts-martial in the American Expeditionary Forces to be reviewed, to determine their legality, by the Acting Judge Advocate General of those forces. The substantive portion of a draft of order to accomplish this purpose is herewith.

DRAFT OF AMENDMENT.

The concluding unnumbered paragraph, on page 3, General Orders, No. 7, War Department, January 17, 1918, is hereby amended to read as follows:

"The records of all general courts-martial and of all military commissions originating in the said expeditionary forces will be forwarded to the said branch office for review, and it shall be the duty of the said Acting Judge Advocate General to examine and review such records, to return to the proper commanding officer for correction such as are incomplete, and to report to the proper officer any defect or irregularity which renders the finding or sentence invalid or void in whole or in part. Any sentence or any part thereof so found to be invalid or void shall be set aside, and the execution of all sentences of death, dismissal, or dishonorable discharge shall be stayed pending said review. The said Acting Judge Advocate General will forward all records in which action is complete, together with his review thereof and all proceedings thereon, to the Judge Advocate General of the Army for permanent file."

Subject: Amendment of General Order No. 7, War Department, January 17, 1918.

1. Herewith is a memorandum for the Chief of Staff from the Acting Judge Advocate General, dated August 29, 1918, recommending amendment of General Order No. 7, War Department, January 17, 1918.

2. Under General Order No. 7 as it now stands, the European branch of the Judge Advocate General's Office reviews for legality alone the records of general court trials before sentence takes effect in the following cases:

- (a) Death sentence.
- (b) Dismissal of officers.
- (c) Dishonorable discharge when not suspended.

All other cases go to the office of the Judge Advocate General at Washington.

3. The amendment recommended by the Acting Judge Advocate General is designated to authorize the records of all cases tried in France to be reviewed by the European branch of the Judge Advocate General's Office. Gen. Bethel's and Gen. Kreger's opinions are set forth in the Acting Judge Advocate General's memorandum. The change recommended is reasonable and should make for good administration.

JUDGE ADVOCATE'S OFFICE,
France, November 14, 1918.

Subject: Jurisdiction of the Acting Judge Advocate General, American Expeditionary Forces.

1. The following matter is submitted in the belief there should be a decision by the War Department as to the authority of the Acting Judge Advocate

General, American Expeditionary Forces, to hold a court-martial sentence, duly approved by the proper authority, invalid on the ground that the evidence is not sufficiently convincing of guilt. The Acting Judge Advocate General has held in a number of cases, in which evidence prejudicial to the accused was improperly admitted, there was such evidence in the case as to substantially compel a conviction. Thus in the case of Sergt. Jacob J. Sonnenshein, Company F, Three hundred and sixth Infantry, the Acting Judge Advocate General said August 12, 1918:

"That all of this evidence was utterly irrelevant to the offense charged need not be argued. It remains to be considered what effect must be attributed to it. The court evidently considered it important, because in one instance it insisted upon the details, and the judge advocate thought it had some weight, because he went so far as to object to the attempt of the accused to explain why he had not resented the attacks upon his person and upon his character. Under these circumstances can a reviewer say that the substantial rights of the accused do not appear to have been prejudiced within the meaning of the thirty-seventh article of war? I think not. It is true that such prejudice is not necessarily to be implied from the admission by the court of illegal testimony. It is also true that the absence of such prejudice is not to be implied from the fact that even if the illegal testimony had been excluded enough legal evidence remained to support a conviction. The reviewer must, in justice to the accused and in compliance with the spirit of the thirty-seventh article of war, seek further and reach the conclusion that the legal evidence of itself substantially compelled a conviction. Then, indeed, and not until then, can he say that the substantial rights of the accused were not prejudiced by testimony which under the law should have been excluded."

In the case of Pvt. Noel F. Peters, Four hundred and sixty-sixth Aero Squadron, he said June 20, 1918:

"This is not a case in which, if the incompetent evidence were excluded from consideration the court would still as reasonable men have been compelled to the same conclusion. On the contrary, with the great mass of incompetent testimony, and in view of the closely contested question of fact on the subject of intent, I do not see how it can be said that the substantial rights of the accused were not injuriously affected within the meaning of the thirty-seventh article of war."

In the case of Thomas M. Murphy, cook, Company A, Second Supply Train, he said, July 18, 1918:

"What effect shall be given to these grave errors? Did they prejudice the substantial rights of the accused? The rule of military administration is not that error necessarily imports prejudice. On the contrary, to invalidate the proceedings, prejudice must appear (A. W., 37). It is impossible, however, to examine the minds of the members of the court and determine how far illegal testimony has been effective in producing a conviction of guilt. A reviewer is required to examine the record to ascertain first, whether, with the illegal testimony excluded, enough legal evidence remains to support the conviction. This is, of course, a prime essential, but it is not enough. He must further examine and be able to say that the legal evidence of guilt in the record, weighed against the defense, substantially compels a finding of guilty."

And in the case of Sergt. Joseph Kovacs, Bakery Co. No. 320, Q. M. C., he said, September 25, 1918:

"It is not doubtful that the reception of illegal evidence may render void the subsequent finding and sentence. The thirty-seventh article of war clearly so contemplates. When such an error has or when it has not injuriously affected the substantial rights of the accused are legal and strictly judicial questions, which in some cases may be delicate and difficult to answer. They can never be answered by the direct testimony of the members of the court, and there is no method of probing the state of their minds or of estimating the balance of their judgments. Prejudice is not, of course, to be presumed. On the other hand, it is not to be avoided by the presence in the record of sufficient legal evidence to justify a conviction. Such a holding would nullify the requirement of military justice that the legal rules of evidence are to be observed (M. C. M., sec. 198). Yet some rule of administration of general application must be adopted. It appears to me that the rule followed by this office is the only safe and sound guide, namely, that the reception, in any substantial quantity, of illegal evidence must be held to vitiate a finding of guilty unless the legal evidence in the record is of such quantity and quality as practically to compel, in the minds of conscientious and reasonable men, the same conclusion (U. S. v. Noel Peters, A. J. A. G. O., 201-116; U. S. v. Claude Wilson, A. J. A. G. O., 201-176)."

2. I deem it unnecessary to discuss here whether or not the rule as stated by the Acting Judge Advocate General is the rule of the courts in the United States exercising criminal jurisdiction, or whether or not it is the rule that the officer who approves or confirms the sentence should adopt as a guide. I do not believe that the Acting Judge Advocate General has any authority to decide as a matter of law what shall be the effect of competent testimony or what weight is to be given it or to determine what competent evidence shall and what shall not be deemed sufficiently convincing to support a conviction. Congress has recently made specific provision for the determination of the effect of the improper admission or rejection of evidence in the thirty-seventh article of war, as follows:

"The proceedings of a court-martial shall not be held invalid, nor the findings or sentence disapproved in any case on the ground of improper admission or rejection of evidence or for any error as to any matter of pleading or procedure unless, in the opinion of the reviewing or confirming authority, after an examination of the entire proceedings, it shall appear that the error complained of has injuriously affected the substantial rights of the accused."

This expression of the law is so clear as to require no comment. It can not be doubted that the reviewing or confirming authority mentioned in the thirty-seventh article of war is the officer authorized to approve or confirm the sentence. Decision as to the effect of the improper admission of evidence, therefore, rests with him and must be decided by him and can not be decided by any other person.

3. Full copies of the decisions of the Acting Judge Advocate General, American Expeditionary Forces, are not submitted herewith for the reason that they are on file in the office of the Judge Advocate General.

OFFICE OF THE ACTING JUDGE ADVOCATE GENERAL,
ACTING JUDGE ADVOCATE GENERAL IN EUROPE,
France, November 16, 1918.

From: The office of the Acting Judge Advocate General.

To: The Judge Advocate General of the Army, War Department, Washington, D. C.

Subject: Jurisdiction of the Acting Judge Advocate General for the American Expeditionary Forces.

1. Late yesterday afternoon Brig. Gen. W. A. Bethel, judge advocate of the American Expeditionary Forces, handed me a copy of a communication dated November 14, addressed by him to the commander-in-chief of the American Expeditionary Forces, with reference to the subject stated above. A copy of the communication is inclosed herewith.

2. My views concerning the effect of the improper admission of testimony prejudicial to the accused are expressed in reviews prepared in this office in the cases of Peters (201-116), Sonnenshein (201-148), Murphy (201-156), Wilson (201-176), Bird (201-212), and Kovacs (201-246). Gen. Bethel has quoted portions of the reviews in three of these cases. The record in each of these cases, except that of Kovacs, has gone forward to your office, each accompanied by a copy of our review. The record in the Kovacs case has not been received back from the reviewing authority. When the record is received back with the final orders of the reviewing authority all the papers in that case will go forward to you.

3. It will be noted that in five of the six cases mentioned in the preceding paragraphs the improper admission of testimony prejudicial to the accused was held to be fatal to the validity of the sentence adjudged, and in one case, that of Wilson, it was held that the legal evidence was sufficient substantially to compel the findings recorded by the court and, therefore, that the improperly admitted testimony did not serve to invalidate the findings and sentence of the court. The conclusion arrived at in the Wilson case was arrived at also in other cases of lesser importance reviewed in this office. The disposition of the office has been not to hold a sentence invalid because of the improper admission of testimony, unless it seemed clear that the substantial rights of the accused actually had been prejudiced thereby.

4. Attention is invited to the fact that in the case of Private Bird, Gen. Bethel agreed with this office that the record was legally insufficient to support the findings of the court. Attention is also invited to the fact that the point upon which the cases mentioned in Gen. Bethel's letter turned is discussed in Wigmore on Evidence (vol. 1, pp. 69-79), and that the test adopted by this office to determine the effect of error in the admission of testimony has the approval of Col. Wigmore.

5. Upon the two questions raised by Gen. Bethel's communication Lieut. Col. Rand has prepared a memorandum, of which a copy is inclosed herewith. I concur in his conclusions.

6. Until another rule to determine the effect of the improper admission of testimony prejudicial to the accused is authoritatively prescribed, I feel bound to follow the one we have adopted.

7. Gen. Bethel's communication in effect calls into question the legal validity of General Order 7, War Department, 1918, as amended by Section IV, General Order 84, War Department, 1918. In my opinion that order is well founded upon section 1199, Revised Statutes, and upon the power of the President, acting through the Secretary of War, to order a sentence to be executed only in mitigated form, or to forbid its execution entirely. However, it seems entirely unnecessary for me to discuss the validity of the order in question. That, no doubt, was fully considered by your office and by the Secretary of War before the order was issued.

OFFICE OF THE ACTING JUDGE ADVOCATE GENERAL,
AMERICAN EXPEDITIONARY FORCES IN EUROPE,
France, November 16, 1918.

Memorandum for Gen. Kregar.

Subject: Jurisdiction of the Acting Judge Advocate General.

I have carefully considered the copy of a communication of November 14, 1918, from the judge advocate of the American Expeditionary Forces to the commander in chief dealing with the above subject.

I have nothing to add to the expression of my views quoted in that letter from several reviews of general court-martial cases by this office. Indeed, I do not understand that Gen. Bethel disputes them as stating the proper rule for the exercise of appellate jurisdiction (see first sentence of par. 2 of his letter). What he questions is the exercise of any appellate jurisdiction by this office in cases falling within the terms of the thirty-seventh article of war. His argument is a brief one, viz, that the terms of article 37 are so explicit as to require no argument in support of his contention. I can not agree with him, for the following reasons:

A. The prohibition of the thirty-seventh article of war is directed to the reviewing or confirming authority and its meaning is as if it began, "The proceedings of a court-martial shall not be held invalid nor the findings or sentence disapproved by the reviewing or confirming authority * * * unless in his opinion," etc. I do not think that this article added to or subtracted anything from the existing law. It merely stated the prevailing rule governing the treatment on appeal of error in criminal cases (section 1025, R. S.).

Or, if I am wrong, and the prohibition is directed to the whole military hierarchy from the President down, then the President, the Secretary of War, and the Judge Advocate General are "reviewing" authorities (section 1025, R. S.).

In either view there is nothing in the language or intendment of the article which makes the opinion of the military commander final.

B. Why does Gen. Bethel limit his protest to cases where the error is in the reception or rejection of evidence? The article deals also and similarly with errors of pleading and procedure, and his contention for the finality of opinion of the commander must apply equally to such errors. A case might arise in which an attempted specification of murder under the ninety-second article of war failed to allege the death of the victim of the assault, although the proof showed it. This would be an error in pleading, and a finding of guilty of murder would be unsupported by the specification. Or a case might arise in which the members of the court were not sworn, and therefore the sentence was illegal. This would be an error of procedure. Would Gen. Bethel contend that because in the opinion of the commanding general these errors did not injuriously affect the substantial rights of the accused the sentences must stand? If so, he necessarily contends that the approval of a commanding general in all cases is final, since evidence, pleading, and procedure cover practically the whole field of error except jurisdiction.

C. I can not distinguish as to the point made by Gen. Bethel between the thirty-seventh and the forty-sixth, forty-seventh, and forty-eighth articles of war. The three last named give reviewing and confirming authorities (commanding officers) the power to approve or disapprove sentences and findings. This function, beyond any dispute, is to be performed in accordance with the officer's honest opinion of the legality of the proceedings and sentence. Is that opinion, as expressed in the approval or disapproval, to be final? If not, why not? And why may not finality be claimed for that opinion under articles 46, 47, and 48 with as much reason as under article 37? Yet it is the unquestioned practice of the Secretary of War to review these approvals and disapprovals through the Judge Advocate General of the Army and to take appropriate action to provide remedy in cases where they are found to be illegal (section 1199 R. S.).

D. With all due respect for Gen. Bethel's opinion, I consider the above considerations so conclusive as to the true intent of article 37 that I have refrained from mention of General Orders, No. 84, War Department, September 11, 1918. The jurisdiction of your office and of the main office in Washington was plain enough before that. But there can be no possible question now. Errors in evidence, in pleading, and in procedure are illustrations (and very comprehensive illustrations) of the causes which render findings and sentences illegal. And General Orders, No. 84, paragraph 4, in explicit terms directs that—

"Any sentence or any part thereof so (by the review of your office) found to be illegal, defective, or void, in whole or in part, shall be disapproved, modified, or set aside, in accordance with the recommendation of the Acting Judge Advocate General."

E. Even if Gen. Bethel be right and the discretion lodged in the commanding officer is final and beyond review, there is nothing to prevent the President, through the Secretary of War, from issuing instructions that no general court-martial sentence which your office has held to be illegal shall be executed.

F. I have no pride of authorship in and claim no originality for the officer reviews quoted by Gen. Bethel. I am prepared to surrender the rule of administration therein described at any time for a better one. It is, however, clear to me that the necessity for some general rule—the application of some consistent and permanent test—is imperative. The effect of illegal evidence upon the substantial rights of an accused is no more to be left to the individual judgment of a judge advocate reviewer in each case than to the individual judgment of a military commander. The rule which we follow, viz, that substantial uncured error must be held to have injuriously affected the rights of the accused (plaintiff in error or appellant) unless the competent and legal evidence is of such weight as to be compelling, is the rule adopted by courts of appeal in criminal cases. Until a better rule is suggested, I recommend that you follow it (Wigmore, vol. 1, pp. 69-79).

I am aware that the question when evidence is or is not compelling is sometimes a difficult and delicate one. It is, of course, essentially a question of fact, but one of those questions of fact which courts habitually take from the jury and reserve to themselves, as when they decline to submit cases to juries or set aside verdicts. In effect they then decide that a given finding of fact is not permissible to reasonable men. Such questions of fact are decided by the Supreme Court of the United States. When it holds unconstitutional a legislative act it decides not merely that the act is forbidden by the Constitution, but, in addition, that there is no reasonable ground to believe that it is not.

Such a question of fact has very recently been decided by Gen. Bethel himself in the case of Pvt. John Bird (A. J. A. G. O., 201-212), in which, speaking for the commander in chief of the American Expeditionary Forces, to whom an appeal had been taken by the commanding general of the 92d Division, The Adjutant General advised the reviewing authority that it was the unanimous opinion of a number of legal experts, in which the judge advocate, American Expeditionary Forces, concurs, "that there is no evidence disclosed by this record of the specific intent to commit rape."

The possible difficulty and delicacy of the question of the effect of error and its essentially legal and judicial nature confirm me in the belief that it is not the intention of Congress that it shall be finally decided by a military commander, who may or may not have a legal education or any capacity derived from training or experience, to decide such a question.

General Orders, No. 41.

WAR DEPARTMENT,
Washington, March 25, 1919.

I. Review of records of general courts-martial.—The last subparagraph of section II, General Orders, No. 7, War Department, 1918, as amended by section IV, General Orders, No. 84, War Department, 1918, is further amended to read as follows:

The records of all general courts-martial and of all military commissions originating in said Expeditionary Forces will be forwarded to the said branch office for review, and it shall be the duty of the said Acting Judge Advocate General to examine and review such records, to return to the proper commanding officer for correction such as are incomplete, and to report to the proper officer any defect or irregularity which renders the finding or sentence illegal or void, in whole or in part, to the end that any such sentence or any part thereof so found to be illegal or void shall not be carried into effect. The execution of all sentences involving death, dismissal, or dishonorable discharge shall be stayed pending such review. The said Acting Judge Advocate General will forward all records in which action is complete, together with his review thereof and all proceedings thereon, to the Judge Advocate General of the Army for permanent file.

II. Duties of board of appraisers.—Subparagraph (a), paragraph 4, section II, General Orders, No. 30, War Department, 1918, is amended to read as follows:

4. (a) To determine, by appropriate methods, just compensation for all property of whatever kind, real, personal, and mixed, or for the use, possession, or occupation of any such property (1) which shall hereafter during the existing emergency be ordered, requisitioned, commandeered, or otherwise summarily taken over according to law, through, by, or by direction of the Secretary of War for the direct and special use of the Army, or which was taken otherwise than by requisition, commandeering, or other summary process issued according to law, and without valid agreement fixing compensation therefor; or (2) which has heretofore, during the present emergency, been thus taken termination of just compensation for which has not been considered under consideration by a special board of assessors.

EXHIBIT 109.

Office memorandum, August 6, 1918.

There is hereby created in the Military Justice Division of this office a board of review, to consist of such, and as many, officers of that division as the chief thereof, after conference with the head of the office, shall designate. The duties of such board will be in the nature of those of an appellate tribunal, and shall be performed with due regard to their character as such. It shall be the duty of the board, under the general direction of the head of this office and the chief of division, to review all proceedings of all general courts-martial received in this office which at present are reviewed in writing. The preliminary review of any such case, after having been made and prepared by the officer to whom the record has been assigned, will be transmitted to the board of review, and thereupon the members of said board will proceed to consider the preliminary review jointly and concurrently in the manner similar to that employed by appellate tribunals in reaching and expressing their decisions. The board may adopt the preliminary review as its own, may modify or rewrite such review, or may direct that it be modified or rewritten so as to express their views. When a majority or more of the board agrees upon a review, the review shall show the names of those who concur, but not of any who may dissent, and the review thus agreed upon shall be transmitted to the chief of division, with the record. Any dissenting member may indicate the reasons for his dissent, either orally or in writing to the chief of division, and in important cases, and where he so desires, to the head of the office.

The members of the board may consult freely with the officer preparing the preliminary review and the head of the division, and may discuss the case with the head of the office when that course is agreeable to him. It is preferable, however, not to discuss the case with others. When practicable, the board will be assigned sufficient room space, clerical force, and any other aid necessary and available.

Office memorandum.

The board of review, Military Justice Division, created therein by office memorandum of August 6, 1918, is hereby divided into two divisions to be known as "The Board of Review, First Division," and "The Board of Review, Second Division." The present personnel of the board will constitute the first division. The chief of the Military Justice Division will, immediately after consultation with the head of the office, designate the personnel of the second division. The organization, constitution, procedure, powers, and duties of each division will be as prescribed in said office memorandum. Each division will function separately and independently of the other and upon cases assigned it by the chief of division, who will endeavor to see that cases of the same or similar character be referred as far as practicable to the same division.

OFFICE OF DIVISION JUDGE ADVOCATE,
France, January 15, 1918.

Memorandum for the division commander.

Subject: Trial by general court-martial of Pvt. Jeff Cook, Company G, Sixteenth Infantry.

1. Pvt. Jeff Cook, Company G, Sixteenth Infantry, was tried before a general court-martial on December 29, 1917, for violation of the thirty-sixth article of war.

Specification: In that Pvt. Jeff Cook, Company G, Sixteenth Infantry, being on guard and posted as a sentinel, in time of war in the face of the enemy, at France, on or about the 5th day of November, 1917, was found sleeping on his post.

2. The evidence of record discloses that the accused was posted as a sentry on the outpost of the first line, right behind the barbed-wire entanglements, at about 4 p. m., November 5, 1917, with a man next to him. It was a three-man listening post, having three men on it, of whom two men were always on guard, one slept one hour and then relieved one of the other two. In this way a man was on guard two hours and off one hour, from 4 p. m. till about 6 a. m. The accused had been on this guard duty about three nights. In the early hours of the morning of the 6th of November, 1917, probably about 3.30 o'clock, the corporal in charge of the post came around and found the accused leaning up against the bank, asleep, picked up his gun, shook him and he looked up and "I asked him what was the matter," and he said: "Nothing; just tired." When asked where his gun was he said he did not know. The testimony of the corporal is corroborated by the men on sentry duty next to the accused. The accused testified that he could not sleep at night, when off duty for one hour every two hours; and that during the day they were chopping wood in the dugout where he was and he could not get any sleep; that he was drowsy but not asleep on post; that he had been in the service seven months.

3. While not in evidence, Col. J. L. Hines, the commanding officer of the accused, who forwarded the charges recommending trial by general court-martial, gave in his indorsement as "Extenuating circumstances: Youth and failure of soldier to take the necessary rest while off duty on first occupation of trenches."

4. The court found the accused guilty and sentenced him "to be shot to death with musketry," two-thirds of the members present concurring.

5. This is the second death sentence imposed in this division for sleeping on post. We are in the face of a vigilant, relentless, and ingenious enemy. Realizing, as I do, that any lack of vigilance on the part of a sentinel in the front-line trenches may reasonably bring disaster and dishonor upon our military forces and death for the offending sentinel's comrades, I can not escape the conclusion that, as a deterrent, the sentence of the court is necessary. The warning of Gen. Frye, the distinguished Union Provost Marshal General of the Civil War, should be given careful consideration at this time. In the printed report of the operations of his office it is stated in effect that if the extreme penalty for desertion had been imposed in the early stages of the Civil War, the later scandal and danger for the country that arose out of this crime, as well as the death sentences that subsequently became necessary, would no doubt have been averted.

6. Attention is invited, in connection with the consideration of this case, to the accompanying cases of:

(a) Pvt. Forest D. Sebastian, Company G, Sixteenth Infantry, in which, under practically the same conditions, the death sentence is imposed;

(b) Pvt. Herbert Tobias, Company —, Eighteenth Infantry, in which a sentence of 10 years' imprisonment was imposed, the court giving as its reason for the light sentence, "The extreme penalty was not voted because of the following extenuating circumstances: The extreme youth of the accused, his age being 16 years. The fact that the accused was posted in a communicating trench, and not in front-line trenches. 3. Though * * *."

(c) The cases of Pvts. Dewey G. Brady, William Hindman, and Adam Flain, all of Company G, Sixteenth Infantry, who were acquitted.

7. I recommend that the sentences be approved and the record forwarded for action under the provisions of the forty-eighth article of war.

Memorandum for the division commander.

Subject: Trial by general court-martial of Pvt. Forest D. Sebastian, Company G, Sixteenth Infantry.

1. Pvt. Forest D. Sebastian, Company G, Sixteenth Infantry, was tried before a general court-martial on December 29, 1917, for violation of eighty-sixth article of war.

Specification: In that Forest D. Sebastian, private, Company G, Sixteenth Infantry, being on guard and posted as a sentinel, in time of war, and in the face of the enemy, at France, on or about the night of November the 3d and 4th, 1917, was found sleeping on post.

2. The evidence of record discloses that the accused, who had been on gas guard the night before, was posted about 6 p. m. on the evening of November 3, 1917, as a sentinel in the front-line trenches with another private of his squad a few feet on the left of him. He was on the outpost, a double sentry post, four men to each post. Two men were supposed to be on two hours, and then to be relieved by the other two. The two men off were allowed to sit down and supposed to sleep if they could. At about 7 or 8 o'clock the corporal in charge of the post came around and found the accused leaning on the trench, which was nearly as high as his shoulders, asleep; took his rifle away, took him, and asked him where his rifle was. The accused replied, "I don't know; you have it." The corporal then gave it back to him, telling him not only the danger he was in but that the men were depending on him. He returned between 10 and 11 and found the accused asleep again. The corporal took his rifle, told the sentry on his left to wake the accused later and to send him to him (the corporal). When the accused came he gave him his rifle, and the accused stated "he was ashamed he had done that way, and he knew he should not have done it." The sentry next to the accused on the left corroborated the testimony of the corporal and stated that after the accused went to sleep the first time he warned him, as he did not want to see him get into trouble. He further stated that the accused was pretty tired from being on gas guard the night before. The sentry who was on gas guard with the accused the night before testified that chances to sleep in the daytime were scarce, and that the accused had had very little sleep, if any, during the day after being on gas guard.

3. While not in evidence, Col. J. L. Hines, the commanding officer of the accused, who forwarded the charges recommending trial by general court-martial, gave in his indorsement as "extenuating circumstances: youth, and failure of soldier to take the necessary rest while off duty on first occupation of trenches."

(c) The cases of Pvts. Dewey G. Brady, William Hindman, and Adam Klein, all of Company G, Sixteenth Infantry, who were acquitted.

OFFICE OF DIVISION JUDGE ADVOCATE.

France, January 17, 1918.

Memorandum for the division commander.

Subject: Trial by general court-martial of Pvt. Olon Ledoyen, Company B, Sixteenth Infantry.

1. Pvt. Olon Ledoyen, Company B, Sixteenth Infantry, was tried before a general court-martial on January 3, 1918, for violation of sixty-fourth article of war.

Specification: In that Pvt. Olon Ledoyen, Company B, Sixteenth Infantry, having received a lawful command from First Lieut. Fred M. Logan, his superior officer, to get his equipment and fall in for drill, in France, on or about the 14th day of December, 1917, did willfully disobey the same.

2. The accused pleaded guilty to the specification and charge. The court found the accused guilty and sentenced him to be shot to death with musketry.

3. The evidence of record shows clearly that the accused defiantly, after full opportunity to obey, and after he had been warned that willful disobedience would lead to court-martial and a heavy sentence, committed a willful, deliberate act of disobedience.

Lieut. Logan ordered the accused, Pvt. Fishback and two others to get their packs and get ready for drill with their squad. On the refusal of the four he warned them, and two thought better of their refusal and obeyed his order. The accused, however, and Fishback persisted in their insubordination, and Ledoyen said: "I refuse to go to drill." The accused in his defense made the following statement:

"Lieut. Logan had us out on the hill the day before and we nearly froze to death, and the next day I was so stiff that I could not drill."

The accused entered the service February 3, 1917, and had been convicted by a summary court of minor breaches of discipline on four different occasions.

4. It would be difficult to find a more exaggerated case of defiance and insubordination unaccompanied by violence that the one here shown, nor one which was calculated to have a more hurtful effect on others. We have undertaken a task, the accomplishment of which requires unhesitating and implicit obedience to orders, and no insubordination can be tolerated. The time must inevitably come—if this is not the appropriate one, which it would seem to be—when the death sentence must be imposed for willful disobedience of orders.

There is already unmistakable evidence cropping out in cases coming to this office of the willingness on the part of soldiers to accept long terms of confinement in order to avoid further service, hardships, and consequent dangers which they have not earlier fully realized. Insubordination will undoubtedly be resorted to as the readiest means, and one to which they probably consider the least obloquy will be attached in later life, for accomplishing their purpose. They will no doubt feel that, at the end of the war their sentences to a long term of confinement, if such has been imposed, may reasonably be expected to be terminated through the exercise of clemency. With all the reluctance that I must be credited with feeling in recording a recommendation that goes to the length of taking a man's life, I am nevertheless constrained, under the realization that an example must be had for its deterrent effect in such cases, to recommend that the sentence be approved and the record forwarded for action under the provisions of the forty-eighth article of war.

France, February 8, 1918.

From: The commander in chief.

To: The Judge Advocate General of the Army.

Subject: Trials by general court-martial requiring the action of the President.

1. I am forwarding you herewith for the action of the President four records of trial by general court-martial, in each of which cases the court has sentenced the accused to death and the sentence has been approved by the commanding general of the First Division, American Expeditionary Forces, the authority who appointed the court. In two cases the accused are convicted of willful disobedience of orders and in the other two of sleeping on post while sentinels in the front trenches and when face to face with the enemy. Each of these cases is reviewed by Lieut. Col. Blanton Winship, judge advocate of the First Division. I recommend that the sentences in these cases be confirmed and that I be advised by cable of such action.

2. The fact that these men are clearly guilty of offenses punishable under the law with death is not the only or, indeed, the principal reason for my recommendation. I believe that for purely military offenses the penalty of death should not be inflicted unless there is a military necessity therefor. It is absolutely necessary for the safety of our army that sentinels on the outposts keep continuously on the alert, and it is just as necessary for our success as a fighting force that orders be obeyed, especially among troops in contact with the enemy. Indeed, I regard the two soldiers who willfully disobeyed orders without excuse or extenuation as more deserving of the extreme penalty than the two who slept on post, and I believe the execution of the sentences is quite as necessary in their cases as in the others. I recommend that execution of the sentences in all these cases in the belief that it is a military necessity and that it will diminish the number of like cases that may arise in the future.

United States v. Stanley G. Fishback, Company B, Sixteenth Infantry.

Review of record of trial by general court-martial convened at headquarters of the First Division, American Expeditionary Forces, France, January 3, 1918.

1. Stanley G. Fishback, private, Company B, Sixteenth Infantry, was arraigned and tried by general court-martial convened at the headquarters of the Sixteenth Infantry, a part of the First Division, American Expeditionary Forces, France, on January 3, 1918, charged with a violation of the sixty-fourth article of war, which, so far as material in this case, reads:

"Any person subject to military law who * * * willfully disobeys any lawful command of his superior officer shall suffer death or such other punishment as a court-martial may direct."

The single specification laid under the sixty-fourth article of war reads:

"In that Pvt. Stanley G. Fishback, Company B, Sixteenth Infantry, having received a lawful command from First Lieut. Fred M. Logan, his superior officer, to go get his equipment and fall in for drill, in France, on or about the 14th day of December, 1917, did willfully disobey the same."

2. Second Lieut. Black, Sixteenth Infantry, acted as counsel for the accused upon the trial. The accused pleaded guilty to the specification and to the charge. After the plea of guilty was entered the judge advocate read the several paragraphs of the manual that set out the gist of the offense with which the accused was charged and of which he had pleaded guilty. Whereupon, in accordance with the requirements of subdivision (d), paragraph 154, Manual for Courts-Martial, 1917, the president of the court made the following explanation to the accused:

"You, Pvt. Fishback, the accused, have plead guilty to the specification and to the charge, and in pleading guilty you admit that you have committed all the elements of the offense with which you are charged, the penalty for which in time of war is death or such other punishment that the court-martial may direct. In pleading guilty you stop all means that may be taken to prove yourself not guilty, although, of course, there may have been extenuating circumstances, and you make it not necessary for the judge advocate to bring witnesses before the court to prove your guilt. In pleading guilty you throw yourself upon the mercy of the court to adjudge to you the extreme penalty which I have mentioned. Having been warned in this manner, do you still wish to plead guilty?"

After this explanation was made by the president of the court, and in response to the concluding sentence, which is in the form of a question addressed to the accused, the accused answered, "Yes, sir."

3. Notwithstanding the plea of guilty, which legally established the guilt of the accused of the offense charged, First Lieut. Fred M. Logan, Sixteenth Infantry, was sworn as a witness in behalf of the prosecution. This is the officer who signed the charges and whose order was wilfully disobeyed by the accused. The testimony of this witness is short, and inasmuch as it is the only testimony in the case it will be quoted in full:

Q. Do you know the accused? If so, state who he is?—A. Yes, sir. Stanley Fishback, private, Company B, Sixteenth Infantry.

Q. State your name, rank, and organization.—A. Fred M. Logan, first lieutenant, Sixteenth Infantry.

Q. On or about the 14th day of December, 1917, did you give Pvt. Fishback an order?—A. I did.

Q. What was that order?—A. To get his equipment and fall in for drill with his squad.

Q. And he knowingly disobeyed and refused to do it?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Did you give him this order in person?—A. I did.

Q. Did he make any reply to the order?—A. Either he or Ledoyen made the reply that they refused to go to drill.

Q. Did the accused later get his pack and go to drill?—A. No, sir; not that day.

Q. Did you immediately order him into confinement?—A. He was under guard then and placed in confinement later.

Q. Are you the accused's superior officer, his company officer?—A. I was that day.

Q. And it was a lawful order that you gave him in the performance of a military duty?—A. It was.

The defense had no testimony to offer and no statement to make. The court made the following explanation to the accused:

"Pvt. Fishback, you are to understand that you have the right to take the stand as a witness in your own behalf, in which case you will be cross-examined the same as any other witness. You also have the right to make a statement, either written or verbal, under oath, or not under oath; a statement which may bring out extenuating circumstances. Having been instructed thus, have you anything to offer?"

In response to the concluding sentence, which was in the form of a question addressed to the accused, the accused answered: "No, sir."

The court was then closed and found the defendant guilty of the specification and of the charge, was opened to receive evidence of previous convictions which will be hereafter referred to, was again closed, and sentenced the accused to be shot to death with musketry.

4. The record recites that two-thirds of the members of the court concurred in the sentence. This recital is in accordance with the statutory requirement that a sentence of death shall not be pronounced except by a vote of two-thirds of the members of the court-martial, and it properly must be construed as a recital that at least two-thirds of the members concurred. And even though all of the members of the court had concurred in pronouncing the death sentence it would not have been proper to have so stated in the record as such recital would disclose the way in which each member of the court voted and would serve to identify each member as voting for such sentence.

5. The court was convened by Maj. Gen. R. L. Bullard, commanding the First Division of the Expeditionary Forces. The sentence was approved by him and forwarded to the commander in chief of the Expeditionary Forces for action under the provisions of the forty-eighth article of war.

The record was reviewed by Lieut. Col. Blanton Winship, judge advocate of the First Division, who, in a memorandum addressed to Maj. Gen. Bullard, recommended that the sentence be approved, among other things saying:

"This case is on all fours with that of Pvt. Olen Ledoyen, Company B, Sixteenth Infantry, and attention is invited to the memorandum filed in that case. For the reasons therein stated it is recommended that the sentence be approved and the record forwarded for action under the provisions of the forty-eighth article of war."

Gen. Pershing reviewed this case in connection with three other cases in which the death sentence had been pronounced, coming from the First Division, and after referring to these four cases in his communication of February 8, 1918, transmitting the record in the trial of the case now being discussed and the records in the other three cases, said:

"I recommend that the sentences in these cases be confirmed, and that I be advised by cable of such action.

"The fact that these men are clearly guilty of offenses punishable under the law with death is not the only or, indeed, the principal reason for my recommendation. I believe that for purely military offenses the penalty of death should not be inflicted unless there is a military necessity therefor. It is absolutely necessary for the safety of our Army that sentinels on the outposts keep continuously on the alert, and it is just as necessary for our success as a fighting force that orders be obeyed—especially among troops in contact with the enemy. Indeed, I regard the two soldiers who willfully disobeyed orders without excuse or extenuation as more deserving of the extreme penalty than the two men who slept on post, and I believe the execution of the sentence is quite as necessary in their cases as in the others. I recommend the execution of the sentences in all these cases in the belief that it is a military necessity and that it will diminish the number of like cases that may arise in the future."

6. Evidence of three previous convictions were considered by the court and the record thereof attached as Exhibits 1, 2, and 3 to the record of trial. These exhibits disclose the following:

(a) In France on July 18, 1918, the accused was found guilty of a violation of the sixty-first article of war, in two specifications thereunder. The first specification alleged that on or about the 17th day of July, 1917, the accused failed to repair at the fixed time to the properly appointed place for morning drill. The second specification alleged that on or about the 17th day of July, 1917, the accused without proper authority visited a certain city in France.

(b) In France on September 5, 1917, the accused was found guilty of a violation of the sixty-first article of war, in two specifications thereunder. The first specification alleged that on or about September 4, 1917, he failed to repair at the fixed time to the properly appointed place of assembly for drill. The second specification alleged that on or about the 5th day of September, 1917, he failed to repair at the fixed time to the properly appointed place of assembly for drill.

(c) In France on November 13, 1917, the accused was found guilty of a violation of the ninety-sixth article of war, in one specification thereunder which alleged that on or about November 12, 1917, having received a lawful order from Corpl. John W. Leach, Company B, Sixteenth Infantry, to report for fatigue, the said corporal being in the execution of his office, the accused failed to obey the same.

7. The court was appointed December 15, 1917, by General Orders, No. 162, of the First Division. Nine officers were detailed as members of the court of the following grades: One colonel, one major, one captain, and six first lieutenants. There were also appointed a judge advocate of the grade of first lieutenant, and an assistant judge advocate of the grade of second lieutenant. When the court convened on January 3, 1918, for the trial of the cause there were present six members of the court, the judge advocate, and the assistant judge advocate. Three members of the court were absent, reported sick. The accused challenged Maj. Phillip Remington, one of the members of the court, upon the ground that he had investigated the charges and had formed an opinion. Maj. Remington admitted the challenge and was excused. The accused was then asked if he objected to being tried by any of the remaining members of the court, to which he replied in the negative. The court was then organized by the members of the court, the judge advocate and the assistant judge advocate being sworn. Five members of the court sat upon the trial of the following grades: One colonel and four first lieutenants. No recommendation for clemency by the members of the court or by any other officer or person appears in the record.

8. The accused enlisted at Columbus Barracks, Ohio, February 17, 1917. His age at that time, as given in the enlistment papers, was 19 years and 2 months. He had no previous military service. The charge sheet gives the date of his arrest as December 13, 1917, which would be the day prior to the date of the alleged offense.

9. The court was lawfully constituted. The proceedings were regular. The record discloses no errors. The findings and sentence are supported by the record and are authorized by law.

10. It is recommended that the sentence be confirmed and carried into execution. With this in view there is herewith inclosed for your signature a letter transmitting the record to the President for his action thereon, together with an executive order designed to carry this recommendation into effect, should such action meet with your approval.

United States v. Olon Ledoyen, private, Company B, Sixteenth Infantry.

Review of record of trial by general court-martial convened at Headquarters of the First Division, American Expeditionary Forces, France, January 3, 1918.

1. Olon Ledoyen, private, Company B, Sixteenth Infantry, was arraigned and tried by general court-martial, convened at the Headquarters of the Sixteenth Infantry, a part of the First Division, American Expeditionary Forces, France, on January 3, 1918, charged with a violation of the sixty-fourth article of war, which so far as material in this case reads:

"Any person subject to military law who * * * willfully disobeys any lawful command of his superior officer, shall suffer death or such other punishment as a court-martial may direct."

The single specification laid under the Sixty-fourth article of war reads:

"In that Pvt. Olon Ledoyen, Company B, Sixteenth Infantry, having received a lawful command from First Lieut. Fred M. Logan, his superior officer, to get his equipment and fall in for drill, in France, on or about the 14th day of December, 1917, did willfully disobey the same."

2. Second Lieut. Black, Sixteenth Infantry, acted as counsel for the accused upon the trial. The accused pleaded guilty to the specification and to the charge. After the plea of guilty was entered the judge advocate read the several paragraphs of the Manual that set out the gist of the offense with which the accused was charged and of which he had pleaded guilty. Whereupon in accordance with the requirements of subdivision (d), paragraph 154, Manual for Courts-Martial, 1917, the president made the following explanation to the accused:

"You, Pvt. Ledoyen, the accused, understand that in pleading guilty to the charges and specifications here you admit that you committed all the elements of the acts with which you are charged, and that you committed them of your own free will, and that you were not forced into doing it by any influence. By pleading guilty you make it not necessary for the judge advocate to prove these charges against you, the extreme penalty for which in time of war is death, or such other punishment as the court-martial may direct. In pleading guilty you throw yourself upon the mercy of the court to adjudge you this penalty. Having been thus informed do you wish your plea of guilty to stand?"

After this explanation was made by the president of the court and in response to the concluding sentence, which is in the form of a question addressed to the accused, the accused answered—"Yes, sir."

3. Notwithstanding the plea of guilty, which legally established the guilt of the accused of the offense charged, First Lieut. Fred M. Logan, Sixteenth Infantry, was sworn as a witness in behalf of the prosecution. This is the officer who signed the charges and whose order was willfully disobeyed by the accused. The testimony of this witness is short, was given in answer to questions propounded by the judge advocate and the court, and inasmuch as it is the only testimony in the case it will be quoted in full:

Q. State your name, rank, and organization.—A. Fred M. Logan, first lieutenant, Sixteenth Infantry.

Q. Do you know the accused; if so, state his name, rank, and organization.—A. Olen Ledoyen, private, Company B, Sixteenth Infantry.

Q. On or about the 14th day of December, 1917, did you give Pvt. Ledoyen an order?—A. I did.

Q. He did not obey that order, did he?—A. No, sir; he did not. He refused and stated that he refused.

Q. What was the order?—A. He was ordered to get his pack and get ready for drill with his squad.

Q. Was there any reason why he would not obey?—A. No, sir. He did it willfully and was warned at the time.

Q. Did you give him the order in person?—A. I did.

Q. Did he say anything in regard to why he disobeyed?—A. No, sir.

Q. You may state any further facts or circumstances surrounding the case.—A. At that time, when he was ordered to get his pack and report for drill with his squad, he refused and stated that he would not go to drill. I then told him of the consequences of such an act and gave him another opportunity to go get his pack and drill and he again refused, saying: "I refuse to go to drill."

Q. You warned him of the consequences of his acts?—A. Yes, sir.

Questions by the court:

Q. State as nearly as you can remember the exact words that you used in warning the accused of the consequences of his act.—A. I told him that he was liable to trial by general court-martial, which might impose a very heavy penalty. There were four who first refused to go to drill and two reconsidered and went to drill later. I asked the accused if he understood what he was doing and he and Pvt. Fishback still refused to drill.

Q. Did the accused know that a court-martial might impose a death penalty for his act?—A. I think not. I do not believe that I told him that.

Q. You stated a heavy sentence?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Did this man offer any reason as to why he refused to drill?—A. No, sir.

Q. Was it simply a positive, flat refusal with no excuses?—A. Yes, sir.

The defense had no testimony to offer, but made the following verbal unsworn statement:

Lieut. Logan had us out on the hill the day before and we nearly froze to death and the next day I was so stiff that I could not drill.

The court was then closed and found the defendant guilty of the specification and of the charge, was opened to receive evidence of previous convictions which will be hereafter referred to, was again closed, and sentenced the accused to be shot to death with musketry.

4. The record recites that two-thirds of the members of the court concurred in the sentence. This recital is in accordance with the statutory requirement that a sentence of death shall not be pronounced except by a vote of two-thirds of the members of the court-martial, and it properly must be construed as a recital that at least two-thirds of the members concurred. And even though all of the members of the court had concurred in pronouncing the death sentence, it would not have been proper to have so stated in the record, as such recital would disclose the way in which each member of the court voted and would serve to identify each member as voting for such sentence.

5. The court was convened by Maj. Gen. R. L. Bullard, commanding the First Division of the Expeditionary Forces. The sentence was approved by him and forwarded to the commander in chief of the Expeditionary Forces for action under the provisions of the forty-eighth article of war.

The record was reviewed by Lieut. Col. Blanton Winship, judge advocate of the First Division, who, in a memorandum addressed to Maj. Gen. Bullard, recommended that the sentence be approved, among other things saying:

"It would be difficult to find a more exaggerated case of defiance and insubordination unaccompanied by violence than the one here shown, nor one which was calculated to have a more hurtful effect on others. We have undertaken a task, the accomplishment of which requires unhesitating and implicit obedience to orders, and no insubordination can be tolerated. The time must inevitably come—if this is not the appropriate one, which it would seem to be—when the death sentence must be imposed for willful disobedience of orders."

Gen. Pershing reviewed this case in connection with three other cases in which the death sentence had been pronounced, coming from the First Division, and after referring to these four cases in his communication of February 8, 1918, transmitting the record in the trial of the case now being discussed and the records in the other three cases, said:

"I recommend that the sentences in these cases be confirmed and that I be advised by cable of such action.

"The fact that these men are clearly guilty of offenses punishable under the law with death is not the only, or, indeed, principal reason for my recommendation. I believe that for purely military offenses the penalty of death should not be inflicted unless there is a military necessity therefor. It is absolutely necessary for the safety of our Army that sentinels on the outposts keep continuously on the alert, and it is just as necessary for our success as a fighting force that orders be obeyed, especially among troops in contact with the enemy. Indeed, I regard the two soldiers who willfully disobeyed orders without excuse or extenuation as more deserving of the extreme penalty than the two men who slept on post, and I believe the execution of the sentences is quite as necessary in their cases as in the others. I recommend the execution of the sentences in all these cases in the belief that it is a military necessity and that it will diminish the number of like cases that may arise in the future."

6. Evidence of four previous convictions were considered by the court and the record thereof attached as exhibits 1, 2, 3, and 4 to the record of trial. These exhibits disclose the following:

(a) In France on July 21, the accused was found guilty of the following charges and specifications:

(1) Violation of the sixty-first article of war.

The first specification alleged that Pvt. Ledoyen absented himself without proper authority from 6 a. m., July 17, 1917, to about 5 p. m., July 17, 1917.

The second specification alleged that Pvt. Ledoyen absented himself without proper authority from about 6:30 a. m., July 18, 1917, until about 5 p. m., July 18, 1917.

The third specification alleged that Pvt. Ledoyen absented himself without authority from about 7 a. m., July 19, 1917, until about 6 p. m., July 21, 1917.

(2) Violation of the ninety-sixth article of war.

The first specification alleged that Pvt. Ledoyen upon being received from the guard and ordered by Corp. Carey, Company B, Sixteenth Infantry, to go to his quarters and prepare for inspection, did fail to obey said order.

The second specification alleged that Pvt. Ledoyen did on the 17th, 18th and 19th days of July, 1917, visit a certain town in France in violation of standing orders.

(b) In France on August 22, 1917, the accused was found guilty of a violation of the sixty-first article of war with two specifications thereunder. The first specification alleged that on or about the 21st day of August, 1917, he did, without proper leave, go from the properly appointed place for drill after having repaired thereto for the performance of said duty. The second specification alleged that on or about the 22d day of August, he failed to repair to the properly appointed place of assembly for drill.

(c) In France on September 5, 1917, the accused was found guilty of a violation of the sixty-first article of war, in two specifications thereunder. The first specification alleged that on or about the 3d day of September, 1917, he failed to repair at the fixed time to the properly appointed place for drill. The second specification alleged that on or about the 4th day of September, 1917, he failed to repair at the fixed time to the properly appointed place of assembly for drill.

(d) In France on December 10, 1917, he was found guilty of violation of the ninety-sixth and sixty-first articles of war. The specification under the ninety-sixth article of war alleged that upon receiving a lawful order from Edd Record, sergeant, Company B, 16th Infantry, to get up and stand reveille, the sergeant in the execution of his office, he did then fail to obey the same. The specification under the sixty-first article of war alleged that on or about the 8th day of December, 1917, the accused failed to repair at the fixed time to the properly appointed place of assembly for drill.

7. The court was appointed December 15, 1917, by General Order No. 162 of the First Division. Nine officers were detailed as members of the court, of the following grades: One colonel, one major, one captain, and six first lieutenants. There were also appointed a judge advocate of the grade of first lieutenant, and an assistant judge advocate of the grade of second lieutenant. When the court convened on January 3, 1918, for the trial of the accused, there were present six members of the court, the judge advocate, and the assistant judge advocate. Three members of the court were absent, reported sick. The accused challenged Maj. Phillip Remington, one of the members of the court, upon the ground that he had investigated the charges and had formed an opinion. Maj. Remington admitted the challenge and was excused. The accused was then asked if he objected to being tried by any of the remaining members of the court, to which he replied in the negative. The court was then organized by the members of the court, the judge advocate, and the assistant judge advocate being sworn. Five members of the court sat upon the trial, of the following grades: One colonel and four first lieutenants. No recommendation for clemency by the members of the court or by any other officer or person appears in the record.

8. The accused enlisted at Columbus Barracks, Ohio, February 3, 1917. His age at that time, as given in the enlistment papers, was 18 years and one month. He had had no previous military service. The charge sheet gives the date of his arrest as December 13, 1917, which would be the day prior to the date of the alleged offense.

The record in the case of Pvt. Stanley G. Fishback, Company B, Sixteenth Infantry, who was convicted of disobeying an order of similar import given by the same officer at the same time as the order disobeyed by Pvt. Ledoyen, also states that Pvt. Fishback was put under arrest on December 13, which would be the day preceding the disobedience. The record in the trial of Pvt. Fishback contains a statement of the prosecuting witness that Fishback was under guard at the time the order was given, and it also appears in that record that he and Ledoyen were together at the time the order was given.

9. The court was lawfully constituted. The proceedings were regular. The record discloses no errors. The findings and sentence are supported by the record and are authorized by law.

10. It is recommended that the sentence be confirmed and carried into execution. With this in view there is herewith inclosed for your signature a letter transmitting the record to the President for his action thereon, together with an executive order designed to carry this recommendation into effect should such action meet with your approval.

EXHIBIT 118.

WAR DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE JUDGE ADVOCATE GENERAL,
Washington, April 4, 1918.

In the First Division, American Expeditionary Forces, France.

United States v. Jeff Cook, private, Company G, Sixteenth Infantry.

Review of record of trial by general court-martial convened at headquarters First Division, American Expeditionary Forces, France, December 29, 1917. Action of the President.

1. Jeff Cook, private, Company G, Sixteenth Infantry, was tried on December 29, 1917, by general court-martial convened at the headquarters of the Sixteenth Infantry, a part of the First Division, American Expeditionary Forces,

France, charged with a violation of the eighty-sixth article of war, which, so far as material to this case, reads:

"Any sentinel who is found * * * sleeping upon his post * * * shall, if the offense be committed in time of war, suffer death or such other punishment as a court-martial may direct."

The single specification laid under this article reads:

"In that Pvt. Jeff Cook, Company G, Sixteenth Infantry, being on guard and posted as a sentinel in time of war, in the face of the enemy, in France, on or about the 5th day of November, 1917, was found sleeping on his post."

The charge was signed by John T. Baker, first lieutenant, Sixteenth Infantry.

Second Lieut. R. P. Cooper, Sixteenth Infantry, acted as counsel for the accused. The Government was represented by a judge advocate and an assistant judge advocate. Before being arraigned the accused was given an opportunity to challenge any member of the court, and upon being asked whether he objected to being tried by any member of the court present answered in the negative. The members of the court, the judge advocate, and the assistant judge advocate were then sworn and the defendant arraigned, a plea of not guilty entered, evidence taken, the accused found guilty of the specification and the charge, and sentenced to be shot to death with musketry.

Lieut. Col. Blanton Winship, judge advocate of the First Division, reviewed the record before its consideration by the division commander, and recommended that the sentence be approved. Among other things, he said:

"This is the second death sentence imposed in this division for sleeping on post. We are in the face of a vigilant, relentless, and ingenious enemy. Realizing as I do that any lack of vigilance on the part of a sentinel in the front-line trenches may reasonably bring disaster and dishonor upon our military forces and death for the offending sentinel's comrades, I can not escape the conclusion that, as a deterrent, the sentence of the court is necessary."

Maj. Gen. R. L. Bullard, commanding the First Division, approved the sentence without comment and forwarded the record for action under the forty-eighth article of war.

Gen. Pershing reviewed this case in connection with three other cases, all arising in the Sixteenth Infantry, in which the death sentence had been pronounced by the same court, and after referring to these four cases, in his communication of February 8, 1918, transmitting the records of the trials, said:

"The fact that these men are clearly guilty of offenses punishable under the law with death is not the only or, indeed, the principal reason for my recommendation. I believe that for purely military offenses the penalty of death should not be inflicted unless there is a military necessity therefor. It is absolutely necessary for the safety of our Army that sentinels on the outposts keep continuously on the alert, and it is just as necessary for our success as a fighting force that orders be obeyed, especially among troops in contact with the enemy. Indeed, I regard the two soldiers who willfully disobeyed orders without excuse or extenuation as more deserving of the extreme penalty than the two who slept on post, and I believe the execution of the sentences is quite as necessary in their cases as in the others. I recommend the execution of the sentences in all these cases in the belief that it is a military necessity and that it will diminish the number of like cases that may arise in the future."

2. The accused enlisted May 11, 1917, at Fort Logan, Colo., with no previous service. His age at that time, as given in the enlistment papers, was 18 years and 11 months. His residence is stated to be Wilburton, Okla. No evidence of any previous convictions for any offense, either civil or military, was submitted to the court.

3. The following is in brief the evidence offered by the Government in its case in chief:

Corpl. Marcus Walentic, Company G, Sixteenth Infantry, testified that the accused was in his squad, and was by the witness posted as a sentinel on November 5; he was posted on an outpost of the first line, about 50 yards from the dugout; the accused was on duty with Pvt. M. J. Clark, Company G, Sixteenth Infantry; the witness visited the sentinels about every 45 minutes; he visited the sentinels probably between 3 and 4 o'clock in the morning, and—

Q. What did you see when you visited Pvt. Cook?—A. I found Pvt. Cook and Pvt. Clark, and Pvt. Cook was asleep.

Q. What makes you think he was asleep?—A. I picked up his gun and shook him, and he looked up, and I asked him what was the matter, and he said, "nothing, just tired," and then I said, "Where is your gun?" and he looked around and said he did not know.

Q. When you came up to Pvt. Cook, was he standing up?—A. He was leaning up against the bank.

Q. Where was his gun?—A. Lying on the parapet.

On cross-examination, by counsel for the defense, he testified in substance that the accused was standing up; that his gun was in front of him on the parapet, within probably 10 or 12 inches away to the right; that the witness came up to the accused on the left, and when witness picked up the gun the accused made no move, but had his hands folded and his face down, and when witness shook the accused the latter looked up and said he was pretty tired. When questioned by the court the witness stated that the accused was posted in an old trench just back of the barbed wire; that the sentinels had no permission to sit down.

Pvt. M. J. Clark, Company G, Sixteenth Infantry, testified that he was posted as a sentinel with the accused at the time of the alleged offense; that they went on duty at 4 o'clock in the afternoon, and their tour of duty continued until about 6 the next morning, with one hour off and two on during this time; that they were on what is called a double-sentry post, two soldiers being on duty as sentinels at the same time and place; that at the time Corpl. Walentic made the inspection when he claimed the accused was asleep, the accused and the witness were standing up on the fire step facing toward the enemy lines, and that the accused was leaning against the bank or wall of the trench. It appeared subsequently in the record that the trench was about shoulder high, and the normal position of a sentinel when on duty was to lean over against the wall of the trench with his head down so as be exposed as little as possible; and if this was done the rifle would be to the right, resting on the parapet. The accused was in this position at the time of the alleged offense. He had his head down. The witness further testified that when Corpl. Walentic came up he took the rifle of the accused from the parapet, and—

Q. Had you awakened Cook (the accused) before this time?—A. No, sir.

Q. Did you notice that he was asleep before the corporal came up?—A. No, sir. The corporal came up and told me to get down, and that was all, and I had not noticed him before, and the corporal got up and took the gun.

On cross-examination by counsel for the accused, the witness testified that they went on duty at 4 o'clock p. m., and were relieved at 6 a. m.; that during that period they got no sleep, although relieved at intervals by other sentinels during the night. Regarding this matter, he said:

A. No, sir; we was relieved, but never got any sleep, as we did not have any place to sleep.

Q. What did you do when you were relieved?—A. We went in and sat down.

Q. Describe how you and the accused were posted. Were you on the firing step?—A. Yes, sir; we were posted looking over the bank, over the front, at the enemy. He stood on one side of me.

In answer to a question by the court, the witness stated in substance that he believed the accused was asleep.

Lieut. Baker, who signed the charge, testified as follows: That he knew the accused; that he did not know exactly where the sentinels were posted; that Corpl. Walentic had two posts, and the accused was on duty with one of them. These posts were in the the front line, were listening posts, in fact; that they were what were known as three-men posts, each man being on two hours and off one during the period from about 4 o'clock in the afternoon until daylight the next morning, and that while there were two men on post all the time, neither had authority to sleep, and, of course, were required to be on the alert.

4. For the defense the accused was sworn as a witness in his own behalf. He testified that he was on duty as a sentinel; that it was a three-man post, each man on two hours and off one between the hours stated by the witnesses; that at the time it is alleged he was asleep on post he was standing up beside Pvt. Clark, the other sentinel, with his head on his hands and his poncho on the top of his helmet to cut the wind; that his rifle was on the parapet immediately to his right; that he knew Corpl. Walentic came up and took his rifle off the parapet, and—

Q. You heard him when he came up?—A. I was drowsy, but not asleep.

* * * * *

Q. How much sleep did you have during the day previous?—A. No sleep at all.

Q. Did you do any fatigue duty the day before?—A. No, sir.

Q. What kept you from sleeping in this dugout?—A. Wood chopping on the inside of the dugout.

Q. How many nights had you been on post?—A. Six nights.

Q. During these nights did you get any sleep at all?—A. No, sir; not much.

Q. You did not get any sleep?—A. No, sir.

Q. You say you had not had any sleep for six nights?—A. No, sir.

Q. Had you been sleeping any during the day?—A. Not much, as it was too noisy.

He further testified that he heard Corpl. Walentic tell Pvt. Clark to step down off the fire step, that the corporal came up to him from behind and reached up and took the rifle off the parapet, and that he knew he was doing so at the time, and—

Q. What made you think he had it?—A. I realized when he was there that it was he that took it, and I had the poncho around my helmet and in my hand so I would not get cold, and I never knew he was going to take the rifle.

Q. Did you feel the corporal when he shook you?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Did you turn your head?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Did he have your gun in his hand?—A. No, sir; he had set it down.

The accused further testified that while he had never been on special sentinel duty before, he understood that it was his duty to remain awake and be on the alert.

5. Corpl. Walentic was recalled and questioned by the court. He described the character of the post, as did the other witnesses; said that the night was dark; again described how he took the rifle of the accused from the parapet, and—

Q. Did the accused have a poncho around his head?—A. I do not know.

That he was asleep at the time in question the accused denied. However, the circumstances described by Corpl. Walentic and Pvt. Clark reasonably supports the conclusion of the court that the accused was asleep.

6. In his review of the record, Lieut. Col. Blanton Winship, division judge advocate, states:

"While not in evidence, Col. J. L. Hines, the commanding officer of the accused, who forwarded the charges recommending trial by general court-martial, gave in his indorsement as 'extenuating circumstances: Youth and failure of soldier to take the necessary rest while off duty on first occupation of trenches.'"

7. It is alleged that the offense was committed on November 5. The charge sheet shows that the accused was placed in confinement on November 13. The court was appointed December 15, 1917, by General Order, No. 162, Headquarters, First Division. Nine officers were detailed as members of the court, with the following grades: One colonel, one major, one captain, and six first lieutenants. There was also appointed a judge advocate of the grade of first lieutenant and an assistant judge advocate of the grade of second lieutenant. When the court convened on December 29, 1917, for the trial of the case, there were present eight members, all of whom sat upon the trial, Lieut. Irwin, detailed as a member of the court, was absent, reported sick. No recommendation for clemency by any member of the court, by the reviewing authority, or the commander in chief appears in the record.

The court was lawfully constituted, the proceedings were regular, and the record discloses no substantial error. There is evidence supporting the findings and sentence.

8. It is recommended that the sentence be confirmed and carried into execution. With this in view there is herewith inclosed for your signature a letter transmitting the record to the President for his action thereon, together with an Executive order designed to carry this recommendation into effect, should such action meet with your approval.

EXHIBIT 119.

WAR DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE JUDGE ADVOCATE GENERAL,
Washington, April 4, 1918.

In the First Division, American Expeditionary Forces, France.

United States v. Pvt. Forest D. Sebastian, Company G, Sixteenth Infantry.
Review of record of trial by general court-martial, convened at Headquarters
First Division, American Expeditionary Forces, France, December 29, 1917.

1. Pvt. Forest D. Sebastian, Company G, Sixteenth Infantry, was tried at the headquarters of the Sixteenth Infantry, a part of the First Division, American Expeditionary Forces, France, by general court-martial, which convened December 29, 1917, charged with violation of the eighty-sixth article of war, which so far as here material reads:

"Any sentinel who is found * * * sleeping upon his post * * * shall, if the offense be committed in time of war, suffer death or such other punishment as a court-martial may direct."

The single specification laid under this charge is as follows:

"In that Forest D. Sebastian, private, Company G, Sixteenth Infantry, being on guard and posted as a sentinel in time of war and in the face of the enemy, at France, on or about the night of November 3 and 4, 1917, was found sleeping on his post."

The charge was signed by George T. Phipps, first lieutenant, Sixteenth Infantry.

Upon the trial Second Lieut. R. P. Clark, Sixteenth Infantry, appeared as counsel for the accused. Before being arraigned the accused was afforded an opportunity to challenge any member of the court and upon being asked if he objected to being tried by any member present answered in the negative. All members of the court, the judge advocate, and the assistant judge advocate were then sworn. The accused was then arraigned, pleaded not guilty, evidence was taken, and accused was convicted and sentenced to be shot to death with musketry.

The record was reviewed by Lieut. Col. Blanton Winship, judge advocate of the First Division, who recommended that the sentence be approved. From his review the following is quoted:

"This is the first death sentence imposed in this division for sleeping on post. We are in the face of a vigilant, relentless, and ingenious enemy. Realizing, as I do, that any lack of vigilance on the part of a sentinel in the front-line trenches may reasonably bring disaster and dishonor upon our military forces and death for the offending sentinel's comrades, I can not escape the conclusion that as a deterrent the sentence of the court is necessary."

The sentence was approved without comment by Maj. Gen. R. L. Bullard, commanding the First Division, and forwarded for action to the commander in chief of the Expeditionary Forces in France under the forty-eighth article of war.

Gen. Pershing reviewed this case in connection with three other cases, all arising in the Sixteenth Infantry, in which the death sentence had been pronounced by the same court, and after referring to these four cases in his communication of February 8, 1918, transmitting the records of the trials to this office, said:

"I recommend that the sentences in these cases be confirmed and that I be advised by cable of such action.

"The fact that these men are clearly guilty of offenses punishable under the law by death is not the only or, indeed, the principal reason for my recommendation. I believe that for purely military offenses the penalty of death should not be inflicted unless there is a military necessity therefor. It is absolutely necessary for the safety of our Army that sentinels on the outpost keep continuously on the alert, and it is just as necessary for our success as a fighting force that orders be obeyed, especially among troops in contact with the enemy. Indeed, I regard the two soldiers who willfully disobeyed orders without excuse or extenuation as more deserving of the extreme penalty than the two men who slept on post, and I believe the execution of the sentences is equally as necessary in their cases as in the others. I recommend the execution of the sentences in all cases in the belief that it is a military necessity and that it will diminish the number of like cases that may arise in the future."

2. The accused enlisted April 18, 1917, at Jefferson Barracks, Mo., with no previous military service. His age at that time was given on the enlistment paper as 19 years and 6 months, his address 502 Madison Street, Eldorado, Ill., care of his mother. No previous conviction for any offense, civil or military, was submitted to the court, and Corpl. A. T. Shotwell, principal witness for the Government, testified:

"Q. Have you known the accused for some time while in the service?—A. Quite a bit.

"Q. Have you known him as a poor or good soldier?—A. Always a good soldier."

Col. J. L. Hines, commanding officer of the regiment to which the accused belonged, in his indorsement under date of November 22, 1917, recommending trial by general court-martial, said:

"Extenuating circumstances: Youth and failure of soldier to take the necessary rest while off duty on first occupation of trenches."

3. The evidence in behalf of the Government may be thus summarized:

Corpl. Shotwell testified that the accused was in his squad on the night in question and at the time of the alleged offense was posted as a sentinel on one of the outposts in a front-line trench. Two sentinels were on duty at the same time and place. The sentinels were on duty for two hours and off for an interval, whether for one hour or two hours is not very clear, from late each afternoon until the following morning. The accused went on his first tour of duty about 6 o'clock in the evening. Between 7 and 8 o'clock Corpl. Shotwell visited the accused and his companion where they were posted as sentinels; the accused then had the appearance of being asleep; witness warned him of the danger he was in; again, between 10 and 11 o'clock, witness found the accused in the same condition, took his rifle from the parapet and carried it away, the accused later coming to witness and getting it; that witness visited the same post from time to time thereafter during the night and found accused awake and alert, and—

"Q. Can you swear on oath that this man was asleep?—A. I can say that I took his rifle, and the condition he was in, but I can not swear he was asleep."

Corpl. Shotwell further testified on cross-examination that the top of the trench would about strike his shoulder; that the natural position for a sentinel standing at this post would be to lean against the wall of the trench; that the position in which he found the accused was the natural position for one on duty, and that the sentinels who were on duty laid their rifles over the parapet. This was the position of the rifle of the accused when the corporal took it upon his second visit. Further, that when he visited a post he would lay his own rifle upon the parapet and take it down from the parapet when he left; that upon each visit the accused had his helmet on; that he did not ask the accused upon either occasion whether or not he was asleep, but came up and shook him; that the night was very dark.

Pvt. George Gladwell, a witness for the prosecution, testified that he was a sentinel on duty with the accused during the night in question; that Corpl. Shotwell visited the post between 7 and 8 in the evening; that witness was then standing beside the accused on the firing step at the time of the visit; that he said nothing to the accused on the approach of the corporal; that when the corporal came up accused was leaning forward on the top of the trench and the corporal took his rifle, shook him, and told him that lives were depending upon him; that the corporal came back two or three hours later and took the rifle of the accused, and—

"Q. Did he (the accused) say anything to you about being sleepy?—A. Yes, sir.

"Q. What did he say?—A. He told me he was on gas sentry the night before and that he was very tired.

"Q. Did he make any other statement?—A. No, sir.

"Q. In regard to sleep?—A. No, sir.

* * * * *

"Did you talk with Sebastian (the accused) while you were on post with him? Could you tell whether or not he was about all in that night?—A. He said he was pretty tired.

"Q. Did the corporal ever place his rifle upon the parapet?—A. Yes, sir.

"Q. Would you be willing to swear that Sebastian was asleep?—A. No, sir."

In answer to questions propounded by the court, the witness further testified:

"Q. Why did you tell him to keep awake if he could?—A. I did not want to see him get into any trouble.

"Q. You believe this man was asleep at any time?—A. I can not say.

"Q. You do not know whether or not he was asleep?—A. No, sir.

* * * * *

"Q. Did you try to shame him?—A. I told him the first time to keep awake if he could.

"Q. Did he say he was not asleep?—A. Yes, sir.

"Q. Said he was not asleep?—A. Yes, sir."

4. The only witness called by the defense was Pvt. Eggleston, of Company G. Sixteenth Infantry. He testified in substance that he was on gas guard the first night in the trenches and that the accused was on guard with him; that they went on gas guard about 8 o'clock; that they got no sleep that night, and—

"Q. The next day when you were off duty in the morning were you given a chance to sleep?—A. If we could find a place.

"Q. Were chances to sleep scarce?—A. Yes, sir.

"Q. Why?—A. Sergt. Klien said to let the men on outpost have a chance to sleep and we could not find bunks only just the best we could.

"Q. Do you know whether the accused had any sleep the day after he was on gas guard?—A. No, sir, he did not. Very little if any.

"Q. Did you get any sleep the next day?—A. No, sir.

"Q. Were you on post the next night?—A. Yes, sir.

It may be inferred from what appears elsewhere in the record that the accused was on gas guard the night preceding the night he is said to have been found sleeping on his post.

The accused did not testify or make a statement, sworn or unsworn, in his own behalf. The president of the court properly advised the accused of his rights to testify in his own behalf or to make a statement. Counsel for the accused and the judge advocate submitted the case to the court with very brief comments.

5. The specification alleges that the offense was committed on the night of November 3-4. The charge sheet shows that the accused was placed in confinement on November 14. The record shows that the accused, after the alleged offense, finished out his tour of duty as a sentinel.

The court was appointed December 15, 1917, by General Order, No. 162, of the First Division. Nine officers were detailed as members of the court with the following grades: one colonel, one major, one captain, and six first lieutenants. There were also appointed a judge advocate of the grade of first lieutenant, and an assistant judge advocate of the grade of second lieutenant. When the court convened on December 29, 1917, for the trial of the accused, eight members of the court were present and sat on the trial. Present also were the judge advocate and assistant judge advocate. One officer of the grade of first lieutenant, detailed as a member of the court, was absent, reported sick.

6. The court was lawfully constituted. The proceedings are regular. The record discloses no errors affecting the right of the accused. The evidence and the inferences which the court was authorized to draw therefrom supports the conviction.

7. It is recommended that the sentence be confirmed and carried into execution. With this in view there is herewith inclosed for your signature a letter transmitting the record to the President for his action thereon, together with an executive order designed to carry this recommendation into effect. should such action meet with your approval.

Judge Advocate General.

WAR DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE JUDGE ADVOCATE GENERAL,
Washington, April 5, 1918.

MY DEAR GEN. MARCH: Here are four cases from France involving the death sentence—two for sleeping on post, two for disobedience of orders. I regret that the reviews have been so long delayed, but I have had to go outside of the records for relevant facts.

The first paper that will encounter your attention is a brief memorandum prepared by the officer charged with the study of these cases, which will give you a survey of all four cases and will prepare you for a quick reading and understanding of the review prepared by this office in each case.

You will notice that I have not finished the reviews by embodying a definite recommendation.

It would be unfortunate, indeed, if the War Department did not have one mind about these cases. There is no question that the records are legally sufficient to sustain the findings and sentence. There is a very large question in my mind as to whether clemency should be extended. Undoubtedly Gen. Pershing will think, if we extend clemency, that we have not sustained him in a matter in which he has made a very explicit recommendation.

May we have a conference at an early date?

EXHIBIT 121.

APRIL 10, 1918.

Memorandum for Gen. Crowder.

Subject: Four cases from France involving death sentence.

1. In addition to what appears in the several reviews of these four cases, the following additional facts are called to your attention as bearing upon the justice and the expediency of carrying the sentences into effect:

(a) All these cases arose in the Sixteenth Infantry. Two of the accused were not brought to trial for 50 days and upward after their alleged offenses. All of these cases were tried with an expedition which does not give, on the face of the records, any appearance of deliberation. In each case the defense of the accused was so indifferent as to be practically no defense.

(b) Upon the trial of two of the cases but five officers sat—one colonel and four first lieutenants. These two trials lasted from 8 p. m. to 9.45 p. m.—that is, from the beginning of the first trial until the conclusion of the second trial there elapsed but 1 hour and 45 minutes. Counsel for the accused made no statement or argument in either of these cases.

In the other two cases eight members of the court sat. The first of these two trials began at 1.20 p. m. and the second was completed at 5.25 p. m. In the first of these cases counsel for the accused made an argument of six lines, and in the second an argument of eight lines.

(c) Two of the soldiers—Fishback and Ledoyen—were tried for willful disobedience of an order to go out and drill. It does not appear that their organization was near or in contact with the enemy. Both of these men were tried the same evening between 8 and 9.45 p. m.—two trials. Fishback was first tried, and it appears in the record of that case that both of the soldiers were together when the order was given. The lieutenant who claims to have given the order testified:

"Q. Did he (Fishback) make any reply to the order?—A. Either he or Ledoyen made the reply that they refused to go to drill."

The answer leaves it in doubt as to which refused. Clearly there was but one order given, apparently directed to both. Clearly also when the court passed upon the Fishback case it necessarily had, in practical effect, decided the Ledoyen case, which immediately followed. Notwithstanding this, counsel for the accused made no challenge.

It is alleged that the disobedience occurred on November 14. The charge sheet shows that each of these men was placed in confinement on November 13. There is evidence in the records that these men were both in arrest or under guard when the order was given. Why they were in arrest and by whom placed in arrest, and whether or not they were to be released from arrest to go out to drill in obedience to this order does not appear.

(d) With respect to the two men convicted of sleeping on post, one—Pvt. Sebastian—is alleged to have committed the offense on the night of November 3-4; Pvt. Cook, on the following night. Cook was put in arrest November 13 and Sebastian November 14.

The length of time which elapsed after the alleged offenses and before the men were brought to trial, the expeditious and seemingly formal manner in which they were tried, the lack of any apparent effort on the part of counsel for the accused to make a real defense, the circumstances of extenuation shown in the reviews—especially in the cases of the two men convicted of sleeping on post—all together, and coupled with the disposition made by the same court of other cases of like nature arising in the same organization about the same time, make up a record on which it will be difficult to defend or justify the execution of death sentences by way of punishment, or upon any ground than that as a matter of pure military expediency some one should be executed for the moral effect such action may have upon the other soldiers.

(e) The four convicted men entered the Army by voluntary enlistment—Ledoyen on February 3, 1917, age on enlistment papers, 18 years and 1 month; Sebastian, April 18, 1917, age 19 years and 6 months; Fishback, February 17, 1917, age 19 years and 2 months; Cook, May 11, 1917, age 18 years and 11 months. None had any previous military experience.

(f) Reference has already been made to other cases tried by the same court. These will now be more particularly referred to.

William Hindman, private, Company G, Sixteenth Infantry. This soldier was accused of sleeping on post in the front trenches on the night of November 5-6. This is the same night that Pvt. Cook, who was convicted, is alleged to have committed a like offense. In the Hindman case Corpl. Walenic, and Pvt. Clark were witnesses for the prosecution, as they were also in the Cook case. In each case it was said that Pvt. Clark was on duty when his comrades were found asleep. The story told by Corpl. Walenic concerning Pvt. Hindman is, in essential respects, very much like the story he told concerning Pvt. Cook. If anything, the evidence was stronger against Pvt. Cook, because Corpl. Walenic testified that the former was sitting down with his blanket around his head, and, as he believed, asleep, when discovered by the corporal. In the case of Pvt. Cook, who was convicted, the evidence clearly shows that he was standing on the firing step in a natural position, with his rifle resting on the parapet at the time of the alleged offense. Cook was convicted upon the testimony of the two witnesses referred to, and Hindman was acquitted in spite of the evidence of these same witnesses, by the same court.

Adam Klein, private, Company G, Sixteenth Infantry, was accused of sleeping on post November 3, 1917. This is the same night that it is alleged Pvt. Sebastian was found asleep. It will be noted that all these men belonged to the same organization. Lieut. D. S. McCune testified directly that he found Klein asleep. He was on duty in the front line trench. Klein was acquitted.

Dewey G. Brady, Company G, Sixteenth Infantry, was accused of sleeping on post on the night of November 5. This is the same night that it is alleged Pvt. Cook was found asleep. Again Corpl. Walenic was the chief witness for the prosecution. His story of how he came upon Brady, found him asleep, took his rifle, etc., is, in essential respects, a replica of the story he told in the Cook case, and the evidence in support of the charge against Brady is quite as strong, if not more convincing, than that in either the Cook or the Sebastian case, in which the men were convicted. Brady was tried by the same court and acquitted.

Pvt. Herbert Tobias, Company E, Eighteenth Infantry, was accused of sleeping on post in the front trenches on November 9. He was tried by a different court, appointed, however, by the same reviewing authority, viz., Maj. Gen. Bullard. The evidence was direct and positive that he was found sound asleep on his post. The accused did not take the stand and make any denial of the charge. He was tried December 15, was found guilty, and sentenced to be dishonorably discharged, with the usual forfeitures, and to be confined for three years. The reviewing authority returned the record for some clerical corrections, and with the suggestion that the court reconsider the case with the view to imposing a heavier penalty. Upon reconsideration the court increased the period of confinement to 10 years, and this sentence was approved.

(g) A number of cases have come from other organizations in France where men were convicted of sleeping on post or willful disobedience of orders. The following are some of the sentences:

Pvt. John L. Shade, United States Marine, convicted of sleeping on post November 19, 1917. The sentence as approved was six months' confinement and forfeiture of two-thirds of his pay for a like period. Maj. Gen. Bundy, reviewing authority.

Pvt. Aubroy LaLace, convicted of sleeping on post, January 14, 1918. The approved sentence was confinement for one year and one month, with total forfeiture during that period. Maj. Gen. Kernan, reviewing authority.

Pvt. William F. Glidia, convicted of sleeping on post October 31, 1917. The approved sentence was confinement for six months, and forfeiture of two-thirds of his pay for a like period. Gen. Coe reviewing authority.

Pvt. Enio J. Halonen, United States Marines, was convicted of sleeping on post December 7, 1917. The sentence as approved was confinement for three months and forfeiture of two-thirds of his pay for a like period. Maj. Gen. Bundy was the reviewing authority.

Pvt. Edward M. Wood was convicted of leaving his post before being regularly relieved on November 14. The sentence as approved provided for confinement for six months and forfeiture of two-thirds of his pay for a like period. Maj. Gen. Kernan reviewing authority.

Pvt. James Hadestron was convicted of leaving his post before being regularly relieved on December 29. The sentence as approved was confinement for six months with forfeiture of two-thirds of his pay for a like period. Maj. Gen. Bundy reviewing authority.

The records show with respect to some of these cases that the offenses were not committed in the front-line trenches. As to others the records do not show where the offenses were committed.

A number of cases have also come in from France where men were convicted of willful disobedience of orders under circumstances which do not distinguish them as to the locus of the offense from the cases of Fishback and Ledoyen, sentenced to death. The sentences run from a few months to several years.

Memorandum for Gen. Crowder.

Re: Death penalty in the four cases from France.

1. After reading these records I said to you the other day that were I the confirming authority, I would not confirm these sentences, and that for the same reason I could not, were I you, recommend confirmation. At your request I shall now state very briefly my reasons as I then stated them to you orally.

LEDOYEN'S CASE.

He was charged with disobeying the lawful order to fall in for drill, and was convicted upon his plea of guilty. After plea and before finding, the accused formally stated in his own behalf that he "could not go to drill" because of the extreme exposure to which he had been subjected the day before; that is, that it was physically impossible for him to drill. This statement was plainly inconsistent with his plea of guilty; accordingly the court should have directed a plea of not guilty and tried the case on that issue. Surely in a capital case a plea of guilty, especially when, as in all these cases, the accused has not had competent counsel, should be accepted only when it was made with the utmost comprehension of all legal implications and of all consequences and only when the plea stands finally as the full, complete, and unmodified intelligent answer of the accused to the charge. Obviously the record in this case does not meet the test, and the proceedings should be disapproved.

FISHBACK'S CASE.

This is in all respects a companion piece to Ledoyen's case; the military authorities have treated the two as on "all fours," and ask for the death penalty in both upon common ground. There is one difference, however. The accused in this case made no statement after his plea of guilty, and so the record does not show upon its face any statement inconsistent with the plea. Considered independently, then, the record gives no basis for the destructive opposition made to Ledoyen's case. The human facts do. The facts of the two cases are the same. The conditions and circumstances of the conduct denounced in both cases are the same. This is shown by the record and conceded and acted upon by the military authorities. Disapproval need not be based upon strict legalism. Other considerations are admissible. In view of what I have said, and following the facts of record in Ledoyen's case, I could not confirm the Fishback case.

SEBASTIAN'S AND COOK'S CASES.

The death penalty in each of these cases was awarded for sleeping on post after a plea of guilty. In capital cases extenuating circumstances are matters of defense. The defense in these cases set up, formally, and without force or persuasion, however, the fact that the accused had been in the front line trench for five previous nights from 4.45 in the evening until 6 o'clock in the morning, with an actual stand in the sentry post of two hours on and one hour off. Of course, little rest and no sleep could be had in such a brief respite. Night after night of vigilance, without opportunity for sleep, must rapidly bring exhaustion unless there be chance for rest and sleep during the day. The accused in one case testified that sleep was impossible in the dugout during the day, because of the chopping of wood therein. In the other case the accused testified that little or no sleep could be had because of noise, without speaking more specifically. These are matters of extenuation, the truth of which the court made no effort to prove or disprove. A competent statement made in defense and standing unimpeached ought to be taken as true. Furthermore, in one of the cases the evidence of exhaustion is rather convincing. The accused was found evidently asleep in the early evening, around 8 o'clock. He should have been relieved then by the corporal who observed his condition. He was not relieved until discovered asleep the second time in the early morning hours.

GENERALLY.

These cases were not well tried. The composition of the court in Ledoyen's case consisted of one colonel, one major, and four first lieutenants. The four first lieutenants could have had but little experience. I can not help recall the British rule which requires, I think, in such cases, three years' service to render an officer competent as a member of a court-martial. The same court that tried Ledoyen tried Fishback. The court that tried Cook was composed of the same members, except a captain (doubtless of considerable experience) and a first lieutenant (practically of none) were present. And the same court that tried Cook tried Sebastian.

The character of the record, with its brevity, is such as to leave the human understanding disturbed by the formal conviction that it carries. These were mere youth. Not one made the slightest fight for his life. Each was "defended" by a second lieutenant. Such defense as each had was not worthy the name. Were I charged with the defense of such a boy on trial for his life, I would not, while charged with that duty, permit him to make a plea that means the forfeit of his life. The Government should be made to maintain its case at every point in the trial of a capital crime. Court, judge advocate, and counsel should all endeavor to see that there is a full trial as well as a fair trial, and that no matter of defense, including extenuation, be omitted.

There is another matter that, finding lodgment in my conscience, I shall express: There is an insistence upon the part of Gen. Pershing which tends to prejudice these cases. He seems to have forgotten that he is not the reviewing authority. The relation between confirming authority and the President in these cases is judicial. I do not say that Gen. Pershing may not make general recommendations as to the maintenance of discipline in his command. I know he may. But his recommendation in these cases is a special thing, specially interposed in the course of justice, and characterized by great insistence. He asks that he be advised by cable of the act of confirmation, and makes a powerful argument, the gist of which after all is to be found in his view of the necessity of exemplary punishment in these cases. It may be the punishment made especially drastic for the purpose of example at times has its place and value. But exemplary punishment is dangerous to justice. The execution of all military offenders would very likely decrease the number of future offenses and offenders. But such Draconian methods would destroy justice without which all else in human society is of no worth.

It is only right for me to say to you that the military mind will in my opinion almost unanimously approve of confirmation in these cases. I do not say that the military view is to be ignored by the Commander in Chief of the Army. I myself would not ignore it. But when it offends against my well-considered sense of law and justice I can not follow it.

EXHIBIT 123.

APRIL 16, 1918.

Memorandum for Gen. March.

Subject: Four cases from France involving the death penalty.

1. Since our interview on the four cases from France involving the death sentence, at which interview we agreed that we would submit the cases with a recommendation that the sentences be carried into execution, my attention has been invited to certain facts of which I had no knowledge at the time of the interview and to which I think your attention should have been invited.

The following four cases of sleeping on post, three of which appear to have arisen in the same regiment, namely, the Sixteenth Infantry, on approximately the same date, and one in the Eighteenth Infantry four days later, were disposed of as follows:

(a) William Hindman, private, Company G, Sixteenth Infantry. This soldier was accused of sleeping on post in the front trenches on the night of November 5-6. This is the same night that Pvt. Cook, who was convicted, is alleged to have committed a like offense. In the Hindman case Corpl. Walenic and Pvt. Clark were witnesses for the prosecution, as they were also in the Cook case. In each case it was said that Pvt. Clark was on duty when his comrades were found asleep. The story told by Corpl. Walenic concerning Pvt. Hindman is in essential respects very much like the story he told concerning Pvt. Cook. If anything, the evidence was stronger against Pvt. Hindman than against Pvt. Cook, because Corpl. Walenic testified that the former was sitting down with his blanket around his head and, as he believed, asleep when discovered by the corporal. In the case of Pvt. Cook, who was convicted, the evidence clearly shows that he was standing on the firing step in a natural position, with his rifle resting on the parapet at the time of the alleged offense. Cook was convicted upon the testimony of the two witnesses referred to, and Hindman was acquitted in spite of the evidence of these same witnesses by the same court.

(b) Adam Klein, private, Company G, Sixteenth Infantry, was accused of sleeping on post November 3, 1917. This is the same night that it is alleged Pvt. Sebastian was found asleep. Lieut. D. C. McCune testified directly that he found Klein asleep. He was on duty in the front-line trench. Klein was acquitted.

(c) Dewey C. Brady, Company G, Sixteenth Infantry, was accused of sleeping on post on the night of November 5. This is the same night that it is alleged Pvt. Cook was found asleep. Again Corpl. Walenic was the chief witness for the prosecution. His story of how he came upon Brady, found him asleep, took his rifle, etc., is in essential respects a replica of the story he told in the Cook case, and the evidence in support of the charge against Brady is quite as strong, if not more convincing, than in either the Cook case or the Sebastian cases, in which the men were convicted. Brady was tried by the same court and acquitted.

(d) Herbert Tobias, private, Company E, Eighteenth Infantry, was accused of sleeping on post in the front trenches on November 9. He was tried by a different court, appointed, however, by the same reviewing authority, viz, Maj. Gen. Bullard. The evidence was direct and positive that he was found sound asleep on his post. The accused did not take the stand and make any denial of the charge. He was tried December 15, was found guilty, and sentenced to be dishonorably discharged, with the usual forfeitures, and to be confined for three years. The reviewing authority returned the record for some clerical corrections and with the suggestion that the court reconsider the case with a view to imposing a heavier penalty. Upon reconsideration, the court increased the period of confinement to 10 years, and this sentence was approved.

2. I think, perhaps, you would also like to know something of the state of discipline in other organizations in France as evidenced by the fact that in the following cases men have been convicted of sleeping on post, or of leaving post before being regularly relieved, with sentences adjudged which are, by comparison with the death sentence, almost trivial:

(1) Pvt. John L. Shade, United States Marines, convicted of sleeping on post November 19, 1917. The sentence as approved was six months' confinement and forfeiture of two-thirds of his pay for a like period. Maj. Gen. Bundy, reviewing authority.

(2) Pvt. Aubrey LeLace, convicted of sleeping on post January 14, 1918. The approved sentence was confinement for one year and one month, with total forfeiture during that period. Maj. Gen. Kernan, reviewing authority.

(3) Pvt. William F. Glidia, convicted of sleeping on post October 31, 1917. The approved sentence was confinement for one year and one month, with total forfeiture during that period. Maj. Gen. Kernan reviewing authority.
